untarily executed it, could be required. The certificate of acknowledgment, operating as the substitute for the attestation of a witness, when it is shown that it is legally impossible to produce the officer making it, by reason of his residence without the jurisdiction of the court, may be proved by evidence of his handwriting, and, when the evidence is given, may be read in evidence." The principle decided in these cases was afterwards reaffirmed in the case of Rogers v. Adams, 66 Ala. 602, in which it was held that a certificate of acknowledgment was fatally defective in not reciting that the grantor was known to the officer, yet it would operate as a substitute for the attestation of a witness; the court holding that "the justice himself thus becomes a witness, and his signature an attestation," and which may be proven by proof of his handwriting. In each of the foregoing cases the principle declared, that the signature of the person before whom the acknowledgment was made, or attempted to be made, should operate as the attestation of a witness, does not rest upon the fact that such person was authorized by the statute to take acknowledgments, or one whose official signature in proper cases would be judicially known by the court; nor are the recitals of the certificate considered as evidence. As stated in the case of Sharpe v. Orme, supra, "the acknowledgment and certificate is merely a substitute for an attestation by a witness, in which no affirmation by him of his knowledge of the parties, or of their acknowledgment of knowledge of the contents of the conveyance, could be required." Strike out from the certificate all that indicates that the person before whom it was taken was an officer, and a sufficient legal attestation remains to comply with the statute, and make the deed valid as a conveyance. It was proven that William J. Clark was dead. Proof of handwriting was admissible, and, upon such proof being made, the deed should have been admitted in evidence. Reversed and remanded.

SAVANNAH & W. R. CO. v. JARVIS.

RAILROAD COMPANIES—STOCK-KILLING—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Code, § 1144, provides that the engineer must, on perceiving any obstruction on the track of a railroad company, use all the means in his power known to skillful engineers, such as applying brakes and reversing engine, in order to stop the train. Section 1147 provides that, when stock is killed or injured, the burden of proof is on the company to show compliance with the statute. Held, that where, in an action for killing a cow, there was evidence that, when the engine was 40 yards distant, the animal ran upon the track from behind an obstruction in a cut; that the engineer could not have seen her sooner; and that he could not then by any means have averted the collision,—an instruction that "the burden was upon the defendant to show a compliance with the requirements of the statute as to reversing the engine and applying the brakes after discovering or seeing the cow on the track" was error, since, if the evidence was true, the engineer needed not to comply with the statute.

2. An instruction that the jury must find for defendant, if they believed that the animal came down the side of a cut from behind an obstruction about 40 yards in front of the approaching train, was properly refused, since it omitted a qualification that the engineer could not have sooner discovered the cow because of the obstruction.

Appeal from circuit court, Tallapoosa county; J. R. DOWDELL, Judge.

Action by M. P. Jarvis against the Savannah & Western Railroad Company for the alleged wrongful killing of plaintiff's cow. Plaintiff's evidence, which was directly in conflict with that of defendant, tended to show that, if the engineer in control of the engine which ran over the cow had been on proper lookout, he could have seen the cow in time to avoid the collision. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, assessing his damages at $20. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Geo. P. Harrison, for appellant.

CLOPTON, J. The statutes provide that the engineer must, on perceiving any obstruction on the track of a railroad company, use all the means within his power known to skillful engineers, such as applying brakes and reversing engine, in order to stop the train; and also, when stock is killed or injured, the burden of proof is on the company to show a compliance with the statutory requirement. Code, §§ 1144, 1147. The duty, however, to apply the brakes and reverse the engine does not arise unless the obstruction is on the track and perceived by the engineer. Railroad Co. v. Bayliss, 77 Ala. 429. In a suit against a railroad company for injury to stock, proof of the mere fact that the stock was killed by a moving train casts, under the statutory provisions, the burden on the company to acquit itself of the negligence presumed by the law in such cases, and, unless the burden is lifted, entitles the plaintiff to a verdict. Notwithstanding, under a literal construction of its imperative and unqualified terms, the statute may be regarded as commanding observance of the statutory requirement in all cases, and under any circumstances, where an obstruction is perceived on the track, it has been repeatedly and uniformly construed not to exact strict observance, when there is no reasonable possibility of averting the disaster by any amount of diligence; such a contingency being considered without the reason, spirit, and policy of the statute. Under this construction the presumption of negligence arising from the fact of injury is overcome when the defendant shows that the failure to discover the obstruction sooner was not owing to a want of care and watchfulness, and that, when discovered, the use of all means known to skillful engineers would have been powerless to stop the train in time to prevent a collision. Railroad Co. v. Caldwell, 83 Ala. 196, 3 South. Rep. 445; Railroad Co. v. Deaver, 79 Ala. 216; Railroad Co. v. McAlpine, 80 Ala. 73. In the general charge the court instructed the jury "that the burden was upon the defendant to show a compliance with the requirements of the statute as to reversing the engine and applying the brakes after discovering or seeing the cow on the track." There was testimony tending to show that the cow, being in a wash in a cut, was obscured from view, and was not, and could not have been, discovered until she ran from the wash on the track about 40 yards in front of the engine, and that, when discovered, reversing the engine and applying the brakes could not possibly have prevented the injury. If these be the facts, the engineer need not attempt to stop the train, and, if satisfactorily shown, defendant is not required to show a compliance with the requirement of the statute as to reversing the engine and applying the brakes; the defense is complete without showing such compliance. When referred to the evidence, and construed in connection with its tendencies, the proposition of the charge implies that it was the duty of the engineer to reverse the engine and apply the brakes on perceiving the obstruction, though the cow suddenly ran on the track in such close proximity to the engine as to leave no room for a reasonable possibility of avoiding a collision by the use of all the means in the power of the engineer. The charge may assert a correct general proposition, but, when applied to each phase of the facts which the evidence tended to show, it is incomplete, in that it ignores and draws from the consideration of the jury the testimony tending to show that, without fault on the part of those in charge of the engine and train, the cow was not, and could not have been, discovered until no skill or diligence could have prevented the disaster. In Railroad Co. v. Hembree, 85 Ala. 481, 5 South. Rep. 173, the charge given at the instance of the plaintiff was as follows: "If the jury are reasonably satisfied that plaintiff's mare was killed by defendant's train at the time alleged, then, unless defendant has reasonably satisfied them that its agents or servants in charge of the train did all in their power to avoid the killing, they must find for the plaintiff;" substantially asserting the same principle as the charge under consideration, except that the latter requires specific proof of compliance with the requirements of the statutes in particular respects. In view of the testimony the charge was held to be erroneous. It is said: "Engineers are not required to do all in their power, nor to do anything, when it is manifest that nothing they can do can possibly prevent the injury. The charge would have been correct if it had contained this additional clause: 'Unless the jury are reasonably convinced that there was no fault in not sooner discovering the mare, and that, when discovered, no amount of diligence could have prevented the collision.'" A similar qualifying clause would have rendered the charge we are considering complete and correct.

The charge asked by defendant in the following language, "If the jury believe from the evidence that the animal came down the side of a cut from behind an obstruction about 40 yards in front of the approaching train they must find for the defendant," is too meager. That the engineer could not have sooner discovered the cow because of the obstruction should have been embraced in the hypothesis. The affirmative charge requested by defendant was properly refused. Plaintiff, having proved the killing, made a prima facie case of negligence, which called for rebuttal. On the entire evidence, whether the presumption of negligence was satisfactorily rebutted was a question for the jury. Reversed and remanded.

NEW ENGLAND MORTGAGE SECURITY CO. v. POWELL, (two cases.)

MARRIED WOMAN—REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES—PETITION—MORTGAGES.

1. A petition which avers that the petitioner, a married woman, owns lands—her statutory separate estate—which she desires to incumber for the purpose of raising money, and prays that she may sue and be sued as a feme sole, mortgage, convey, and otherwise dispose of her separate estate as fully as if she were a feme sole, is insufficient to support a decree relieving her of the disabilities of coverture, under Code 1876, § 2731, which provides that such relief may be granted on a petition praying that the married woman be decreed a feme sole so far as to invest her with "the right to buy, sell, hold, convey, and mortgage real and personal property, and to sue and be sued as a feme sole." 6 South. Rep. 339, reaffirmed.

2. Where the wife, by reason of such void decree, executes a mortgage on her land, such mortgage is void, and a new and independent consideration is necessary to support an alleged ratification thereof, after the enactment of Act Feb. 28, 1887, giving a married woman the rights of a feme sole.

Appeal from circuit court, Montgomery county; JOHN P. HUBBARD, Judge.

Appeal from chancery court, Montgomery county; JOHN A. FOSTER, Chancellor.

Bill by the New England Mortgage Security Company against Virginia D. Powell. Defendant's demurrer thereto sustained. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ejectment by Virginia D. Powell against James Fitzpatrick. On motion of Fitzpatrick the New England Mortgage Security Company was required to come in and defend as landlord. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The appellant corporation loaned money to the appellee, Mrs. Virginia D. Powell, a married woman, after a decree had been rendered by the chancery court relieving her of the disabilities of coverture. The said loan company took a mortgage on the land which was a part of the statutory separate estate of Mrs. Powell, to secure the payment of the loan thus made. Mrs. Powell failing to pay the debt at maturity, the present bill was filed, on January 15, 1889, by the New England Mortgage Security Company, to foreclose the mortgage. The defendant interposed a demurrer to the bill, assigning, as grounds thereof, that the proceedings relieving her of the disabilities of coverture were void for want of jurisdiction in the court which rendered said decree, the petition not averring the proper jurisdictional facts, and the decree not following the requirements of the statute. The chancellor sustained this demurrer, and ordered the bill dismissed. The appeal is taken here from this decree of dismissal by the chancery court, and the same is assigned as error.

On October 16, 1889, the appellee, Mrs. Virginia D. Powell, brought a statutory action of ejectment against James Fitzpatrick and others, to recover possession of the land which was included in the mortgage made by her to the New England Mortgage Security Company. On motion of Fitzpatrick, who was the tenant of the Mortgage Security Company, the said New England Mortgage Security Company was required to come in and defend as landlord, and it pleaded the general issue. On the trial of the case, the evidence introduced showed that the plaintiff, having been relieved of the disabilities of coverture by the chancery court, mortgaged said lands to the defendant, the New England Mortgage Security Company, on November 17, 1881, to secure the payment of the loan made by said company to her; that on October 18, 1887, the said defendant was, by agreement with the plaintiff, let into possession of the land here sued for, and held possession thereof by its tenant at the time of the bringing of this suit; that the mortgage has since been declared void for the reason that the proceedings to relieve plaintiff of the disabilities of coverture were void, and ineffectual for that purpose. At the request of the plaintiff the court gave the following charge: "If the jury believe the evidence, they will find for the plaintiff for the land sued for; and if the defendant has been in possession of the said lands, under color of title, for more than one year before the suit was brought, then the jury will also find a verdict for the plaintiff for the value of the use and occupation of the land from one year before the commencement of suit down to the time of their verdict." The defendant excepted to the giving of this charge, and also separately excepted to the court's refusal to give each of the following written charges asked by it: "(1) The plaintiff can recover in this action no rents accruing since the commencement of this suit. (2) If the jury believe all the evidence, they will find a verdict for the defendant."

Semple & Gunter, L. C. Smith, and W. S. Thorington, for appellants. Watts & Son, for appellees.

McCLELLAN, J. These cases involve the same questions, and were submitted together. Those questions are—First, whether a decree rendered in 1878, having for its purpose the relief of Mrs. Powell from the disabilities of coverture to the extent and as provided in section 2731 of the Code of 1876, is void for insufficiency of the petition filed to that end; and, second, whether, conceding the invalidity of that decree, the mortgages, upon which the claim of the New England Mortgage Security Company is rested, were validated by an attempted ratification on the part of the married woman after the enactment of February 28, 1887, entitled "An act to define the rights and liabilities of husband and wife."

The first question stated came before this court on a former appeal in the chancery suit now again submitted; and it was then held that the petition filed by Mrs. Powell seeking to be relieved of disabilities of coverture was fatally defective, and insufficient to confer jurisdiction in the premises upon the chancellor, in that it did not ask for all the relief offered by the statute, and that, of consequence, the decree was coram non judice and void; and also that the decree, considered apart from the petition, was itself defective, for that, while broader than the petition, it yet did not grant the full measure of relief which the statute was intended to afford. Powell v. Security Co., 87 Ala. 602, 6 South. Rep. 339. The averments and prayer of the petition are as follows: (1) That Mrs. Powell "is a resident citizen of Montgomery county, Alabama, over 21 years of age, and the wife of James W. Powell; (2) that she is the owner of certain real estate, and an interest in lands, in Montgomery county, which are her separate statutory estate, and which she desires to incumber or mortgage for the purpose of raising money. * * * Wherefore your petitioner prays that your honor will relieve her of all the disabilities of coverture, to the end that she may sue and be sued as a feme sole, mortgage, convey, and otherwise dispose of her separate estate as fully and freely as if a feme sole." The expression of petitioner's desire to incumber or mortgage her property to raise money, and of the ends to the effectuation of which she prayed relief from the disabilities of coverture, was considered by this court on the former appeal as operating a limitation upon that part of the prayer which sought the removal of all disabilities to contract incident to the marital relation of the petitioner; so that, taking the petition as a whole, it asked for relief only in so far as was necessary to enable Mrs. Powell to sue and be sued, and mortgage, convey, and otherwise dispose of her separate estate, as a feme sole. If this construction be the correct one, the petition was, of course, insufficient to authorize any decree, since it did not ask for the relief which the statute offers, and which must be prayed and granted as an entirety, as held in numerous decisions of this court. It is now strenuously insisted for appellant that this construction is unsound, and that the true meaning of the petition is that the petitioner be relieved of all the disabilities of coverture,—nothing more or less; and that what is stated therein as to the petitioner's desire to incumber or mortgage her property, and to the effect that she prays the removal of all the disabilities of coverture, "to the end that she may sue and be sued as a feme sole," etc., is but the "garrulous disclosure of the immediate uses to be made of the liberty to be obtained under the prayer to relieve her of all the disabilities of coverture," and that all this should be disregarded as the merest surplusage. This position of the appellant may be fully granted and conceded—for my own part, I consider it eminently sound—without disturbing the conclusion reached when the case was here before,—that the petition was insufficient, and the decree void. Applying the proposition of appellant to the proceeding, we have, as a result, a petition which prays relief, not to the extent that relief is afforded by the statute, but from all the disabilities of coverture,—a measure of relief far in excess of that provided for by the statute,—and a decree which undertakes to grant this entire and unauthorized emancipation from the law's limitations upon the contracting capacity of the feme covert. With respect to the decree, the further concession may be made that, though too broad, it would be good to the extent the statute authorizes relief, and its operation would be confined to such relief if the petition was sufficient. But is there any basis for a like concession in respect of the petition? We think not. It is, of course, not to be doubted that, ordinarily, a pleader's right to particular relief is not prejudiced by a prayer for larger relief, including that to which he is entitled. It is equally true that, ordinarily, the pleader will not be denied all relief because he asks only for less than he is entitled to. And if an argument may be predicated on the first proposition favorable to the granting to this petitioner the relief intended to be afforded by the statute, though she asks for more, that argument is wholly parried by the legal fact, as to which no controversy exists, taken in connection with the second proposition, that the pleader in this proceeding must ask for all that she is entitled to or she gets nothing. In other words, to hold that the petitioner is entitled to no relief, because she asked for more than the law offers, is no more in the teeth of general rules of pleading than to hold, as this court has frequently done, that she cannot be awarded any relief unless she prays for all contemplated by the act. The truth is that the ordinary rules of pleading have no application to this matter, and for very cogent reasons. In actions inter partes, the effort always is to enforce some obligation resting on the defendant. It is always to the interest of the complaining party that his claim shall be effectuated in full, or to any less extent to which he is entitled to relief on the facts adduced. Hence the law assumes that he assents to, in fact demands, not only the full relief he prays, but any part of that relief to which he may show himself entitled; and his prayer, essentially, is for the whole relief, and for every part of it. But this is not a suit inter partes. No right is asserted against anybody. No relief is sought through the operation of the court's process upon any party. The effort involved is simply one to change the legal status of the petitioner, to give her a different attitude before the law than she before sustained, and this purely for her own benefit. Before the court can act, she must affirmatively assent to whatever change of status is made,—to whatever new attitude she is decreed to bear. This has been decided. Not only so, but her husband also must assent in writing to the proposed change of status. This the statute specifically provides; and her assent, as well as his, must be expressed. It is a jurisdictional fact. Now, there is no presumption of law that it is to the benefit of the petitioner that this change of status shall take place. The general policy of the law is against such change, and this on the theory that the wife's inability to contract tends to conserve her interests, and save her from the evil results which might spring from the dominant will of her husband. And the same is true in respect of the husband. The court cannot know that any change of status will be of benefit to him, or meet with his approval, except as may appear from the terms of his assent, or, rather, from the terms of the petition to which he does assent. There is, therefore, no basis for a presumption to be indulged by the court that either the wife or the husband has assented to any other change of status, or to the investiture of the wife with any other rights, than she has expressly asked, and he has expressly assented to. The court cannot say, and the law does not presume, that she desires and he has assented to the grant of any integral part of the relief which she prays. It might well be that a married woman would desire to be freed from all the disabilities of coverture, and thus put upon the vantage ground of a feme sole for all contractual purposes, and yet not desire to be absolved from the law's limitations only in respect of her statutory and other separate estates. Cases might be imagined in which complete emancipation would, in a sense, be necessary to the proper management of the separate estate of the wife, and in which the mere grant of power to buy, sell, hold, convey, and mortgage property, and sue and be sued, as a feme sole, without capacity to make all other contracts which may be made by one sui juris, would not be conservative, from any point of view, of the wife's welfare, or her separate property; and, similarly, there might be good reasons actuating the assent of the husband to the removal of all marital disabilities which could have no force by way of inducing him to consent that only those disabilities specified in the statute should be removed. Hence it is that we cannot say, there being no presumption and no basis for any presumption as to what the parties desire and have assented to, proceeding on the idea of their interests or the benefits to accrue to them, that the petitioner here desired any other relief than that for which she expressly prayed, or that her husband assented to the granting of any other relief than that thus expressly asked for. The relief so asked was not the relief the statute authorized the chancellor to grant. There was nothing before him to show the assent of either the petitioner or her husband to the granting of the relief offered by the statute. In the absence of such showings, he was without jurisdiction, and his decree, whether it follows the statute or not, is a nullity.

The decree being thus without efficacy, Mrs. Powell was under all the disabilities of coverture at the time she executed the mortgages under which appellant claims, and without any capacity in that behalf. The mortgages were therefore not voidable, but merely void. Granting that she might have ratified the execution of the instruments, with the assent of her husband, after the passage of the act of 1887 above referred to, such ratification required a new and independent consideration to support it. It is not pretended that the ratification attempted to be set up by an amendment to the bill in the chancery case, and relied on in evidence in the suit at law, was supported by any consideration whatever. Each court properly ruled that the alleged ratification could avail nothing to the Mortgage Security Company. 14 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 619; Hetherington v. Hixon, 46 Ala. 297. We find no error in either record; and the judgment of the circuit court and decree of the chancery court are respectively affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. HARPER.

APPEAL—DISMISSAL—DEFECT OF PARTIES.

An appeal from an order of the probate court overruling a motion to set aside proceedings in which exemptions out of the estate of a decedent were allotted to his widow will be dismissed, where the record fails to show that notice of the motion was served on the widow, or any citation or notice of appeal was served on any adverse party, as required by Code, §§ 3631, 3634.

Appeal from probate court, Calhoun county; E. F. CROOK, Judge.

Motion by Jimmie T. Williams against Lodusky Harper to set aside certain probate proceedings. Motion denied. Williams appeals. Dismissed.

Savage & Coleman, for appellant.

WALKER, J. The appellant, as one of the heirs of James Harper, deceased, made a motion in the probate court of Calhoun county to have set aside and declared null and void certain proceedings had in that court at a previous term, which purported to effect an allotment of exemptions out of the estate of said decedent to his widow, Lodusky Harper. There is nothing in the record to indicate that notice of that motion was served on the widow, or that she appeared to resist it. An order was made, however, overruling the motion. The appeal is from that order. The record fails to show that any citation or notice of appeal was issued or served upon any adverse party, (Code 1886, §§ 3631, 3634;[1]) and no appearance is entered in this court by or for any one as appellee. There is not before this court any adverse party against whom judgment could be rendered in the event of a reversal. Miller v. Parker, 47 Ala. 312. The proceeding has been purely ex parte throughout. Under our statute, no appeal can be maintained without an appellee. The appeal must be dismissed because of the absence of a necessary party.

Appeal dismissed.

[1] Code, § 3631, provides that, upon an appeal being taken, the register, or clerk of the circuit or city court, or the judge of probate, must issue a citation to the adverse party, notifying him of the appeal, which must be served on him at least 10 days (unless otherwise provided for) before the day to which the appeal is returnable. Section 3634 provides that the register, clerk, or judge of probate must deliver to the appellant a complete transcript of the record, including the citation.

JOSEPH et al. v. SOUTHWARK FOUNDRY & MACH. CO.

PARTNERSHIP—NOTICE OF DISSOLUTION—ACCOUNT STATED—WORK AND LABOR—ASSUMPSIT—EVIDENCE—CONTRADICTORY STATEMENTS—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Although contradictory statements, when unexplained, may affect the credibility of the witness making them, the contradiction does not of itself render the statements incompetent as evidence.

2. Where a partnership has been dissolved, constructive or implied notice of the dissolution will be sufficient as to those who have had no previous dealings with the firm, but as to those who have had previous dealings it is requisite that actual notice be given, or that such steps be taken as to warrant the inference that notice was received.

3. Where a debtor to whom an account is rendered either admits its correctness or retains it, and makes no objection within a reasonable time, he will be bound by it as an account stated; and, where he objects to certain items only as being incorrect, this is an admission of the correctness of the other items, to which no objection is interposed.

4. Where one performs labor for another with the knowledge and consent of the latter, and the latter accepts it, it is not necessary that there should have been an express contract.

5. In an action to recover the price of four presses built by plaintiff, the material issue was as to whether the contract for the said presses was made with defendant partnership or with a corporation formed after the dissolution of the partnership. One witness testified directly that the partnership employed plaintiff to build the four presses, and another testified as to the time the contract was made. Held, that an instruction that the evidence proved that the contract for the last three presses was made with the corporation, and that there was no evidence as to when the said contract was made except the testimony of plaintiff, and a certain bond which had been introduced in evidence, was properly refused.

Appeal from circuit court, Montgomery county; JOHN P. HUBBARD, Judge.

This was an action brought by the Southwark Foundry & Machine Company against Joseph, Gaboury & Co. to recover for the making of certain presses. The defendants pleaded the general issue, payment, and that the defendants, E. B. Joseph and J. A. Gaboury, never made any contract with the plaintiff as a partnership, and that, if the presses were made by the plaintiff, they were made under a contract entered into between plaintiff and the Simplex Compress Manufacturing Company. The plaintiff replied to the plea denying the partnership, and set up as a defense that the defendants, Joseph and Gaboury, did business as a firm under the firm name of Joseph, Gaboury & Co., and it was with that firm that the contract for the presses was made. The evidence tended to show that in April, 1886, Joseph, Gaboury & Co. contracted with the plaintiff to build for them a trial press. This press was built and completed in June, 1886, and was accepted and paid for by the defendants. The plaintiff's testimony tended to show that in June, 1886, Joseph and Gaboury made another contract with the plaintiff to build for them three more presses. This contract, it is contended by the defendants, was made, not by them as a partnership, but with the Simplex Compress Company, a corporation. It is not shown in the evidence when the partnership of Joseph, Gaboury & Co. was dissolved, if ever dissolved, or that the plaintiff corporation was ever informed that said partnership was dissolved. For answer to the ninth interrogatory propounded by plaintiff to one Mirkil, Cornelius, and Creager, as to how many presses the defendants employed the plaintiff to build for them, and how many were built, the witness Mirkil answered: "There appeared orders on the shop-book for four presses,—one original press and three subsequent. We built the original press complete before the other presses were ordered. Then we built and shipped two of the other three. * * * But the fourth press ordered is still in the yard, in an incompleted state." To this same ninth interrogatory the witness Cornelius answered: "The defendants employed the plaintiff to build four presses for them, three of which presses were completed, and the fourth press was about three-fourths completed, and is in this present unfinished state now at the Southwark Foundry & Machine Company. The presses were built in the summer of 1886." The court charged, as requested by the plaintiff, "(8) that a contract may be implied as well as expressed, and that, if the plaintiff did work and labor for the defendants with the knowledge and assent of the defendants, and they accepted it, it was not necessary that there should have been an express contract." The court refused to charge, as requested by the defendants, that "(1) there is no evidence before the jury as to when the contract for the last three compresses was made except the testimony of the witness Joseph Gaboury and the bond introduced in evidence, and, if the jury believe the evidence, it proves that the contract for the last three compresses was made with the Simplex Compress Manufacturing Company." There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jones & Falkner, for appellants. Arrington & Graham, for appellee.

COLEMAN, J. The suit is in assumpsit against appellants as a partnership. The material issues of fact presented by the pleadings were whether the contract, the foundation of the suit, was made with the defendant partnership, or made with the Simplex Compress Manufacturing Company, a corporation formed after the dissolution of the partnership, and which succeeded it, and, if made after the dissolution of the partnership, whether plaintiff had notice that the partnership had been dissolved. There was evidence which tended to sustain the special plea of defendants, and there was evidence which tended to support plaintiff's replication to the plea. There was no error in overruling the motion to exclude the answer of the witness Cornelius to the ninth interrogatory. Contradictory statements made by a witness, unexplained, may affect his credibility, but do not render the statements incompetent as evidence. In the case of Mauldin v. Bank, 2 Ala. 502, it was held that "a dissolution of a partnership may take place inter partes, and yet the connection continue as it respects the rest of the world. In respect to all persons who have had no previous dealings with the concern, a constructive or implied notice of its dissolution will be sufficient; but, as to persons who have had dealings with the firm during its continuance, it is requisite that actual notice be given, or that such steps have been taken as to warrant the inference that it was received by the creditor." The rule rests upon the principle that, the partnership being once known to exist, its continuance will be presumed in favor of third persons, who have had dealings with it as a partnership, until notice of its dissolution has been brought home to them. In the case of Burns v. Campbell, 71 Ala. 286, it is held that "if a debtor to whom an account is rendered either admits its correctness, or retains it, and makes no objection within a reasonable time, he will be bound by it as an account stated, his silence, in the latter case, being presumptively construed into an acquiescence in its justness;" citing Langdon v. Roane, 6 Ala. 518. It is further held in the same opinion that if one item only is objected to, this is an admission of the correctness of the other items, to which no objection is interposed. These principles of law sustain the first seven charges given for plaintiff. The eighth charge needs no citation of authority to sustain it. In reply to the ninth interrogatory the witness Cornelius testified directly that the defendants employed the plaintiff to build four presses for them, and the witness Mirkil testifies as to the time the contract was made. The first charge asked for by defendants was therefore properly refused. We find no evidence in the record which would have authorized the giving of either of the charges requested by defendants. The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

MOBILE SAV. BANK et al. v. BURKE et al.

MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—AMENDMENT OF BILL—DISTINCT CAUSES OF ACTION—PARTIES.

1. Complainants filed a bill to foreclose a mortgage, and restrain a sale of the property to satisfy a judgment obtained against it by another. The holder of the judgment thereupon filed an answer and cross-bill alleging that the mortgage had been withheld from record in fraud of creditors, and praying that the property be sold to satisfy the judgment. The complainants filed an amendment alleging that, previous to the recovery of the said judgment, they themselves had recovered a judgment upon an indebtedness separate and distinct from the mortgage indebtedness, and that if their mortgage was invalid they had a prior lien under their judgment. Held, that the bill was demurrable for multifariousness.

2. The fact that a cross-bill in foreclosure makes the trustee a party in his individual capacity as well as in his capacity of trustee does not render the bill demurrable.

Appeal from chancery court, Mobile county; W. H. TAYLOE, Chancellor.

This was a bill by the Mobile Savings Bank and William J. Hearin for the foreclosure of a mortgage. From a decree sustaining demurrers to the original bill as amended, and overruling demurrers to the cross-bill, complainants appeal. Affirmed.

Hamilton & Gaillard and Overall & Beston, for appellants.

CLOPTON, J. The appeal being taken from a decree sustaining demurrers to parts of the original bill as amended, and overruling demurrers to the cross-bill, a proper understanding of the questions raised calls for a brief statement of the character, purposes, and substantial allegations of the original bill and amendment and of the cross-bill. The Mobile Savings Bank and William J. Hearin filed the original bill, for the foreclosure of a mortgage on real estate in the city of Mobile, executed June 15, 1885, by Peter Burke and wife to Hearin, as trustee, to secure the payment of a note for $14,000 made by them to the bank. It having been ascertained that a part of the property was the statutory separate estate of Mrs. Burke, complainants abandoned any claim to subject that portion to the mortgage. After making appropriate allegations in respect to the mortgage, the bill avers that P. J. Lyons, one of the defendants, recovered, July 10, 1889, a judgment against Burke for over $15,000, upon which he had caused execution to be issued and levied upon the mortgaged property, and was threatening to sell it, claiming that the purchaser at the execution sale would be entitled to hold the property against complainants and any person purchasing at a sale of foreclosure. One purpose of the bill is to restrain Lyons from selling under his execution. His demurrer to the original bill having been overruled, Lyons fileid an answer, which he made a cross-bill. It avers that Burke, being indebted to the bank in a large sum,—$100,000,—was induced to execute, in October, 1884, a mortgage on the most valuable piece of his real estate to Hearin as trustee to secure the indebtedness, upon an agreement or understanding that it should not be recorded, but kept secret, and renewed at short intervals, until his indebtedness was paid, or until some complication in his affairs should arise which necessitated making the transaction public. The cross-bill further avers that this course of dealing was continued, and new notes and mortgages made, from time to time, every 60 or 90 days, the present mortgage being the last renewal, until the failure of Burke, July 25, 1885, on which day he made a deed of assignment; whereupon, and on the second day thereafter, the bank and Hearin caused the mortgage to be recorded. Also that the divers mortgages were withheld from record, and the indebtedness concealed for the purpose of enabling Burke to maintain his credit, and to obtain the indorsements of his friends upon paper, which, by pre-arrangement, was afterwards given to the bank as security for part of his indebtedness. The cross-bill prays that the mortgage be declared fraudulent and void, and that the property be condemned and sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of his judgment. Upon the filing of the answer and cross-bill, complainants amended the original bill. The amendment avers that Burke owed the bank an indebtedness separate and distinct from the mortgage debt, on which it instituted suit, and recovered, July 29, 1887, a judgment against him for over $10,000, and that the judgment was filed in the office of the judge of probate in pursuance of "an act to provide for the registration and lien of judgments and decrees for the payment of money," approved February 28, 1887. It further avers that Little, Wilkinson & Co. recovered a judgment against Burke, July 10, 1889, for a large sum of money, upon which it is claimed there is still due and unpaid about $2,000, with interest; and that Little, as surviving partner, had filed the judgment in the office of the judge of probate in accordance with the provisions of the act above mentioned; and had also filed a bill in the chancery court, seeking to have the mortgage declared fraudulent and void as to him. It also avers that, even if the mortgage could be held for any cause invalid as against Lyons and Little, as surviving partner, or either of them, still the lien of their respective judgments is inferior to the lien of the recorded judgment of the bank. The amendment prays that the lien of the judgment in favor of the bank be decreed and declared superior to the lien of the judgments in favor of Lyons and Little, Wilkinson & Co., and that the mortgaged property be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of the liens on the same according to the principles of law and equity. Lyons and Little each demurred to so much of the amended bill as sets up the existence of any lien arising upon the judgment of the bank, and as prays for any relief based upon such lien. The grounds of demurrer are (1) that the allegations and prayer of the amendment are inconsistent with and repugnant to the allegations and prayer of the original bill; (2) that the amendment constitutes a radical departure from the case made by the original bill; (3) that complainants are estopped by its averments from contending that Burke had any interest in the mortgaged property to which the lien of the judgment could attach.

A bill may be amended so as to present the case of the complainant in the alternative, provided the rule that the same defense must be applicable to each alternative, and must entitle the complainant to the same relief or relief of the same character, is observed. The purpose of the rule allowing a bill to be framed in a double aspect, is to enable the complainant, where his title to relief depends on the truth of one or another state of facts, to state them in the alternative, thus adapting the relief to the premises, so that, if the court should decide against him on one state of facts, it may yet grant him relief on another. The introduction of new matter or a new cause of action is not the office of an amendment. When the alternative allegations are introduced, they must relate to the cause of action and subject-matter presented in the original bill. Inconsistent titles or claims to relief cannot be introduced, nor a new and different right preferred, which would vary the relief, if granted, essentially in character from the relief which could have been obtained on the original bill, nor can separate and distinct causes of action be blended, by amendment. Rapier v. Paper Co., 69 Ala. 476; Ward v. Patton, 75 Ala. 207. The cause of action and subject-matter of the original bill are the mortgage and its foreclosure; of the amendment, the judgment and enforcement of its lien. By the bill as amended complainants seek—First, special relief based on the validity of the mortgage,—a foreclosure and sale of the property for its satisfaction; and, second, relief based on the invalidity of the mortgage,—the enforcement of the lien of the judgment, and a sale of the property for its satisfaction, in the event the mortgage is held invalid for any cause. It is manifest the amendment introduces a new and distinct cause of action, and prefers a new and different right, on which, if relief were granted, it would be substantially different from, and inconsistent with, the only relief which could be obtained on the original bill, and constitutes a radical departure from the case made by it. The amended bill reduces itself to a disjunctive statement of distinct causes of action. This is not regarded as good pleading in law or in equity, because calculated to impart uncertainty, to embarrass the defendant in making defense, and to produce inextricable confusion. In one aspect of the bill, complainants sue in the character of a mortgagee, and in the other, of a judgment creditor; attempting, in the first aspect to make a case in which the mortgage, and in the second a case in which the judgment, will be held superior to any claim or lien of the other judgment creditors. Complainants sue on distinct causes of action in different characters and rights, and the kind of relief in the respective aspects is dissimilar. Corrugating Co. v. Thacher, 87 Ala. 458, 6 South. Rep. 366.

The contention that the amendment setting up the judgment is consistent with the claim to foreclose the mortgage presented by the original bill is rested on the proposition that the amended bill makes the case where the same party, holding two lien securities, both created by the contract of the defendant Burke, and not alleged to be superior to the lien of either of the defendants Lyons and Little, is seeking to have them enforced on the same property. It may be that several liens, created by contracts, express or implied, dealing with or relating to specific property, can be consistently set up in one bill, and relief granted as to both; but in such case both must be sought to be enforced conjunctively on the particular property as valid liens; not the enforcement of one contingent on the other being held invalid; not of one or the other. But the case made by the bill is not a case where both liens are created by contract. The lien of a judgment is not the subject of, and has none of the properties of, a contract. It is the creature of legislation, and may be taken away without impairing the obligation of contracts,—a statutory lien. Curry v. Landers, 35 Ala. 280; Martin v. Hewitt, 44 Ala. 418. The general rule is that equity will not lend its aid to enforce a statutory lien, unless there exists some special or controlling equity which justifies the interposition of the court, such as the necessity of removing a fraudulent conveyance or other impediment to the full execution of the judgment. Machine Co. v. Miner, 28 Kan. 441; 13 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 613. The statutes fix the priorities of liens of judgments and executions, and the mode of collection. The remedy at law is adequate and complete. The amendment does not show any legal obstacle to the enforcement of the lien at law. Besides, if it were permissible to adopt the form of pleading resorted to, when a bill sets forth alternatively or disjunctively distinct causes of action, no relief can be granted unless each branch presents a case of equitable cognizance, by analogy to the well-settled rule that alternative averments are insufficient unless each alternative shows a good cause of action. Lucas v. Oliver, 34 Ala. 626. So much of the amended bill as seeks to enforce the judgment lien contains no equity. Neither do the complainants jointly hold both liens. Hearin had no connection with or interest in the judgment, or right to the enforcement of its lien. In respect to the judgment, there is no community of interest in the complainants. The bill as amended seeks to enforce rights unconnected, and having no relation to each other; such a bill is multifarious. Bean v. Bean, 37 Ala. 17. Hearin, being trustee, is a necessary party to a bill to foreclose the mortgage, but is not even a proper party to a bill to enforce the lien of the judgment, and cannot recover on that branch of the bill. The complainants having joined, unless they are both entitled to relief, neither can recover. The demurrer was properly sustained. The only objection assigned as ground of demurrer to the cross-bill of Lyons is that Hearin is made a party as an individual. The legal title to the premises is vested in him by the mortgage, and he may properly be made a party defendant individually as well as trustee. Another and different person is not brought in, but the same person in different characters. There is nothing in this objection. Affirmed.

BOGACKI et al. v. WELCH.

DISSOLUTION OF INJUNCTION — LIMITING DAMAGES — JURISDICTION.

Where, on dissolving an injunction, the chancellor limits the damages defendant is entitled to recover on the injunction bond, there was nothing in the decree injurious to defendant, as the question of the measure of damages was without the chancellor's jurisdiction.

Appeal from chancery court, Montgomery county; JOHN A. FOSTER, Chancellor.

Bill by Theodore Welch against C. T. Bogacki and others for injunction. Granted. From the decree of the chancellor subsequently dissolving the injunction, and limiting defendants' recovery on the injunction bond, defendants appeal. Affirmed Tompkins & Troy, for appellants. Jones & Falkner, for appellee.

STONE, C. J. The appellee, Welch, filed the bill in this case, and obtained an injunction. There were answers denying some of the averments of the bill on which relief was prayed, and also a demurrer to the bill for want of equity. The cause was submitted to the chancellor on two motions: First. To dissolve the injunction for want of equity in the bill and on the denials of the answers. The answers were sworn to. Second. To dismiss the bill for want of equity and on the demurrers. Bogacki, a contractor, was constructing a dwelling on a lot adjoining that on which Welch resided. Welch's child was dangerously sick,—so sick that continuing work on Coleman's house, it was charged, would endanger its life. To prevent such continuance, and the noise incident to it, were the purpose of the suit and of the injunction. Following are extracts from the chancellor's decree: "It is clear, taking their [defendants'] answers to be true, as we must on the motion to dissolve the injunction, the bill was filed under a misapprehension of the intention of the defendants. The injunction must therefore be dissolved; but it is apparent that complainant should not be required to pay more as damages for the suing out of the injunction than the amount of such damages the defendant may have incurred by reason of holding the injunction in force after the recovery of the child, when work on the building could have been resumed. In their answers defendants allege that, in any event, they would not have continued the work while it was hurtful and dangerous to the child's life or health, and consequently defendants should not recover damages during the time they would have voluntarily desisted from work. * * * The injunction must therefore be regarded as partially dissolved, to take effect as hereinabove stated. The necessity of the bill having passed away, and there being no further necessity for it, it is ordered that the bill be, and the same is hereby, dismissed out of this court, at the costs of complainant." We have copied all of the decree which is necessary to a proper understanding of the questions we propose to discuss.

There was no testimony taken in this case, and the chancellor made no decree, stating to what extent, if any, the injunction was retained. On the contrary, he stated the bill was filed under a "misapprehension of the intention of the defendants." This was equivalent to saying that the bill and injunction were unnecessary, and therefore wrongful. Unless there is some order of the court continuing in force an interlocutory injunction, either in whole or in part, a decree dismissing the bill dissolves it ipso facto. 2 High, Inj. §§ 1476. There being no such order in this case, when the bill was dismissed the injunction was dissolved absolutely. It may be an axiomatic truth that an injunction restraining Bogacki from doing what he had no intention of doing could have done him no injury, other than the expense it put him to in defending the suit. But this was a question not at all involved in the inquiry whether the injunction should be retained or dissolved. Nor was the chancellor's declaration in any sense a decree on the merits of the injunction, or in any manner affecting its restraining force. It was not raised by the pleadings, and could not be, for it was outside of the chancellor's jurisdiction. When he dissolved the injunction by a general dismissal of the bill, his jurisdiction and power in the premises ceased. The question of the measure of damages pertains to another forum; and what he said is in no sense a decree of which error can be predicated. Id. § 1657; 1 High, Inj. § 88; Zeigler v. David, 23 Ala. 127. Nothing was decreed injurious to appellants. Affirmed.

MITCHELL et al. v. DUNCAN.

ADMINISTRATION OF ESTATE — PROBATE PRACTICE — ORDER UPON APPLICATION TO ADMINISTER — APPEAL.

Two persons, one of whom belonged to the class entitled to priority in the grant of administration according to Code 1886, § 2014, and the other did not, applied for administration, which was granted,—the latter, while the application of the former was still pending. The former subsequently filed another petition, praying that the said administration be revoked, and that letters be granted to him as before prayed for; which petition the court overruled. Held, that this was an order on an application to administer, within the meaning of section 2841, and an appeal should have been taken therefrom within the time limited by such section.

Appeal from probate court, Madison county; THOMAS J. TAYLOR, Judge.

This is a motion by William T. Duncan to dismiss an appeal taken by Ralph Mitchell and others from an order appointing the said Duncan administrator of the estate of Charles E. Harris, deceased. Appeal dismissed.

Wm. Richardson and Robt. E. Sprugins, for appellant. D. D. Shelby and Wm. L. Clay, for appellees.

WALKER, J. Charles E. Harris died on the 5th day of December, 1889, leaving property in Madison county, in this state. On the 13th day of the same month, certain persons, describing themselves as heirs at law of said decedent, filed a petition in the probate court of said county praying that letters of administration upon the estate of the decedent be issued to Ralph Mitchell, who was one of the petitioners. So far as the record discloses, it does not appear that any order was made upon that petition. On the 15th day of March, 1890, Sallie W. Carroll, who had joined in the first petition, filed another petition in her own name alone, asking that William P. Duncan be appointed administrator of the estate of said decedent. On the 4th of April, 1890, Duncan was appointed administrator. On the 19th day of June thereafter, Ralph Mitchell and others, describing themselves as heirs at law, filed another petition, praying that the letters of administration issued to Duncan be revoked and recalled, and that letters of administration be granted to Ralph Mitchell, in accordance with the application of December 13, 1889, to this effect. On July 8, 1890, an order was made overruling and denying this last petition. The appeal from that order was taken January 9, 1891. A motion has been made in behalf of the appellees to dismiss the appeal because it was not taken within 30 days after the date of the order or decree sought to be reviewed.

The contention of the appellants is that Duncan, who did not belong to either of the classes of persons entitled to priority in the grant of administration, should not have been appointed administrator while the application for the appointment of Mitchell, who is an heir at law of the decedent, was pending in that court, and had not been disposed of; that application having been made within 40 days after the death of the intestate. Code 1886, §§ 2014, 2016. The claim is that the right of preference asserted by that application had not been abandoned, but was duly maintained, and that it should not have been ignored. The purpose in seeking the revocation of the letters issued to Duncan was to get rid of an obstacle in the way of the application for Mitchell's appointment. The claim that Mitchell was entitled to be appointed administrator in preference to Duncan was the substantial matter of controversy. The relief sought was the recognition and enforcement of that claim. The contest was between the conflicting claims to the administration. The disposition of the matter depended entirely upon the recognition of the one or the other of those claims. In making the order appealed from, the probate court was passing upon an application to administer on an estate. The appeal from a decree or order made on such an application must be taken within 30 days from the hearing and decision of the same, unless the application was denied because of the unfitness of the applicant, in which case the appeal must be taken in 10 days. Code 1886, § 3641, subd. 2. The appeal in this case not having been taken within the time limited by the statute, the motion to dismiss must be granted. Appeal dismissed.

HENDERSON v. STATE.

ENACTMENT OF STATUTES—AMENDMENT—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

Const. art. 4, § 19, providing that no bill on its passage shall be so altered or amended as to change its original purpose, is not violated by increasing by amendment the localities where a local bill shall take effect. Hall v. Steele, 2 South. Rep. 650, 82 Ala. 564, followed.

Appeal from circuit court, Chambers county; JAMES R. DOWDELL, Judge.

Indictment against John W. Henderson for violating the liquor prohibition law. There was judgment of conviction, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. D. Denson and Watts & Son, for appellant. Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

COLEMAN, J. The defendant was indicted and convicted for a violation of the liquor prohibition law found in the acts of 1890–91, p. 85, which prohibits the selling or giving of spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors at various designated places, and also "within five miles of La Fayette College, in La Fayette, Chambers county, Alabama." It is contended that an inspection of the senate and house journal discloses the fact that the act was not passed in accordance with the constitutional requirements, and is therefore null and void. It is well settled that courts can and will, if deemed necessary, examine the legislative records to see whether a printed statute has a legal existence. Jones v. Hutchinson, 43 Ala. 723. The act in question originated in the senate, and is denominated "Senate Bill No. 27." The bill was referred to a committee, and by the committee reported with an amendment. On page 85, senate journal, it is shown that the bill and pending amendment was adopted by a vote of yeas and nays, and the note duly recorded. In the house journal, page 236, it is shown that a substitute for the senate bill was adopted by yeas and nays, and the vote duly recorded. The substitute was a mere extension of the purpose of the original bill so as to include other places. On page 240 the vote by which the substituted bill was adopted was reconsidered, and the vote ordering the bill to a third reading reconsidered. The bill was then further amended by inserting in the title and body of the bill other places not mentioned in the substituted bill, and as thus amended was read the third time at length, and passed by a yea and nay vote, and the vote duly recorded. The senate did not agree to the bill as passed by the house, and a committee of conference was appointed by both houses. The committee further amended the bill by adding other places, and also by providing: "And, as to La Fayette College, it shall not take effect until January 1, 1891." As thus amended, the bill as passed by the house was adopted by the senate by yeas and nays, and the vote duly recorded, (see senate journal, pp. 216, 217;) and the conference report was also concurred in by the house by a yea and nay vote, and the vote duly recorded, (see house journal, p. 286.) The journals show that the bill was duly signed by the president of the senate and speaker of the house, and approved by the governor. We have cited the pages of the senate and house journals only on the points raised in argument, but have carefully examined both journals as to the respective and successive action of the senate and house upon the bill until its approval by the governor. We fail to discover that any constitutional requirement which should affirmatively appear upon the legislative records was not fully complied with. As to matters which are not required to be affirmatively shown, this court will indulge all reasonable presumptions in favor of the legality of the law. In the case of Stein v. Leeper, 78 Ala. 517, it was declared "that the original purpose of the bill, being local prohibition, was not altered or changed by increasing by amendment the localities in which the act should have operation; that such were extensions and not changes of the purpose." The rule was reaffirmed in the case of Hall v. Steele, 82 Ala. 564, 2

South. Rep. 650. We are satisfied with the rule of construction declared in these decisions. By the written agreement of the appellant filed with the record the court is asked to determine only the constitutionality of the law, and not to consider any objection which might be urged against the sufficiency of the indictment. We pronounce the law to have been legally enacted, and to be valid. Affirmed.

DUNTON et al. v. KEEL.

APPEAL—PRESUMPTIONS—EJECTMENT — EVIDENCE —PLEADING AND PROOF.

1. It will be presumed on appeal that a deed, offered in an action for the recovery of land, by defendant, as a link in his chain of title, was inadmissible, where the record fails to reveal its contents, or the ground of its exclusion.

2. Where a deed forming a necessary link in the title of a defendant in an action for the recovery of land has been properly excluded, the exclusion of a mortgage, forming a prior link, to a person not in privity with him, if erroneous, is harmless.

3. Where the complaint in an action for the recovery of land describes the land sued for only by section, township, and range, and the proof only shows that plaintiff is entitled to the possession of "the upper place," and "the lower place," the variance is fatal.

Appeal from circuit court, Jackson county; JOHN B. TALLY, Judge.

Action for the recovery of land, by Moses B. Keel against F. W. Dunton and others. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

Martin & Bouldin, for appellants. J. E. Brown, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This is a statutory action, in the nature of ejectment, for the recovery of the possession of land, and damages for the detention thereof. The plaintiff undertook to sustain his case by proof of prior actual possession under a claim of ownership. The defendant offered in evidence the record of a deed to himself from the American Mortgage Company of Scotland, Limited, and also the record of a mortgage from the plaintiff and his wife to that company. In offering the record of the mortgage the defendant's counsel stated that he claimed through said mortgage under the deed which had been already offered in evidence. On objection interposed by the plaintiff, the court excluded the records of both the deed and the mortgage. The record of the deed which was excluded is not copied in the bill of exceptions. We are not informed in any way of its contents, nor does the record disclose upon what ground it was excluded. In the absence of any showing to the contrary we must presume that it was properly excluded. Hutcheson v. Powell, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 170; Beadle v. Davidson, 75 Ala. 494.

The exclusion of the deed left the defendant in the position of failing to connect himself with the title under which he claimed. The deed was the link connecting him with the title conveyed by the mortgage. The defendant could not set up the outstanding title of the mortgage without connecting himself with it, (Allen v. Kellam, 69 Ala. 442;) and could not be injured by the exclusion of a mortgage to a third party standing in no relation of privity with him. His privity with the mortgagee, or the title conveyed by the mortgage, was proposed to be shown only by the deed, the proof of which had already been rejected, and properly so, we must presume. The mortgage without the deed would not tend to show the record title under which defendant proposed to hold the land, and no injury could result to him from the exclusion of the mortgage alone, as he failed in the proof of the deed. For this reason there cannot be a reversal because of that ruling, however insufficient may have been the grounds suggested in support of it.

The complaint describes the lands sued for only by the numbers of section, township, and range. The plaintiff offered evidence only as to his prior possession of "the upper place," and "the lower place," and as to the rental value thereof. All the evidence is set out in the bill of exceptions, and we find nothing at all in the record tending to show that the lands referred to by the witnesses are the identical lands described in the complaint. The witnesses do not, in any way, locate the lands of which they speak. It is not made to appear that there is any correspondence between the proof and the plaintiff's pleading. For aught that appears the testimony may have referred to other lands than those sued for. It certainly cannot be affirmed that the proof clearly showed that the plaintiff was entitled to or had had prior possession of the lands described in the complaint. The circuit court erred in giving the general charge in favor of the plaintiff. To say the least of it, the evidence was not sufficiently clear and free from doubt to warrant that charge. Tabler v. Coal Co., 87 Ala. 305, 6 South. Rep. 196; Alabama Gold Life Ins. Co. v. Mobile Mutual Ins. Co., 81 Ala. 329, 1 South. Rep. 561. Reversed and remanded.

REED LUMBER CO. et al. v. LEWIS.

DAMAGES—REMOTE CAUSE—COVERTURE—EXEMPTIONS—PARTNERSHIP.

1. A plea in recoupment alleged that the notes sued on were given for mill machinery which plaintiff, knowing the purpose for which it was intended, failed to deliver until two months after the agreed time, and that the delay caused idleness of defendants' mill, and prevented the fulfillment of certain contracts, resulting in a loss of profits to defendants. Held, that the alleged loss was too remote and speculative to constitute recoverable damages.

2. It is in the discretion of the judge of the city court of Anniston to allow or to refuse to allow a special plea of coverture to be filed after the expiration of the 30 days limited for filing pleas by the act creating such court; and his ruling refusing to allow such a plea cannot be reviewed or controlled on appeal.

3. In an action on promissory notes against a partnership and the members thereof the complaint charged "that in each of said notes defendant waived all homestead exemptions as against this debt." Held, that there was no allegation of a waiver of exemption of personalty.

4. When a partner executing a firm note waives exemptions, and signs the firm name, the waiver is confined to the partner signing.

Appeal from city court of Anniston; B. F. CASSADY, Judge.

Action by E. M. Lewis against the Reed Lumber Company as a firm, and its individual members. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

The action was brought on three notes, in which were waived all homestead exemptions. In addition to the plea of the general issue filed by the defendants, they also filed a special plea of recoupment in which all of the defendants joined except Emily Farrar, the wife of W. T. Farrar. The plaintiff demurred to this plea of recoupment on the ground, among others, that the damages claimed by way of recoupment were too remote. The court overruled this ground of demurrer. The defendant Emily Farrar, after the ruling upon the other defendants' pleas, offered to file her plea of coverture, but the court refused to allow it done. Upon the hearing of the evidence the court rendered judgment for the plaintiff, and in said judgment declared that the defendants were entitled to no exemptions of personal property.

Gordon McDonald and Caldwell & Johnston, for appellants. Matthews & Whiteside, for appellee.

MCCLELLAN, J. This action is on promissory notes executed by the Reed Lumber Company, which is alleged to be a partnership composed of W. T. Farrar, Emily Farrar, the wife of W. T. Farrar, and C. W. Burrows. The suit is against the company and the individuals composing it. The company, W. T. Farrar, and Burrows pleaded in recoupment that the notes were given for the price of certain machinery to be presently delivered; that it was not delivered for two months afterwards; that the machinery was a part of a saw-mill, without which the mill could not be run; that plaintiff knew the uses to which it was to be applied, and that the mill was stopped in consequence of its non-delivery; and that as a result of this enforced idleness of the mill defendants were unable to fill certain contracts for lumber which they had with various parties, and lost the profits they would have made had they been able to supply the lumber, and that these profits amounted to $500. There is no averment that plaintiff contracted to deliver the machinery in contemplation of these contracts on the part of defendants to supply lumber to others, or that he knew of their existence.

The plea is bad upon two grounds, if not more. The plaintiff was not liable for the profits defendants would have made out of these contracts unless such damages, manifestly not being the natural consequences of plaintiff's mere failure to deliver the machinery, but depending on the contractual relations between defendants and others, could be said to have been in the contemplation of the parties without knowledge on the part of plaintiff of those relations, and hence, without his engagement, having any reference to them. Devlin v. Mayor, etc., 63 N. Y. 26; Daughtery v. Telegraph Co., 75 Ala. 168; Telegraph Co. v. Way, 83 Ala. 542, 4 South. Rep. 844; Griffin v. Colver, 16 N. Y. 489, 69 Amer. Dec. 718, and notes. Moreover, the profits which might have been realized by the defendants but for plaintiff's dereliction are, as alleged in this plea, entirely too speculative and conjectural, incapable of that clear and satisfactory proof which the law requires, to constitute recoverable damages. Authorities supra; Bell v. Reynolds, 78 Ala. 511; Street v. Sinclair, 71 Ala. 110. The action being prosecuted not only against the partnership, but also against each of its members, including Mrs. Farrar, individually, and judgment sought which would not only go against the partnership property, but against the property of each individual, Mrs. Farrar had the right to make any defense which would protect her from individual liability and save her individual property from subjection to the debt, without denying the partnership or in any way attempting to defeat the collection of the notes out of her interest in the partnership property. To this end she had a right to plead coverture; and we are of opinion that the court below erred in refusing to allow her to do so. Le Grand v. Bank, 81 Ala. 123, 1 South. Rep. 460. It is not claimed in the complaint that either of the defendants waived their exemptions of personal property as against the notes sued on. The averment is "that in each of said notes defendants waived all homestead exemptions as against this debt." Manifestly, upon such a waiver, there could be no judgment declaration of a waiver of exemption of personalty; and, even were this otherwise, the declaration in this judgment should have been confined to W. T. Farrar, who, it is alleged, signed the partnership name to the notes. Terrell v. Hurst, 76 Ala. 588. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

ON REHEARING.

Upon further consideration, in response to the application for rehearing, we are of opinion that it was within the discretion of the trial judge to allow or refuse to allow the plea of coverture to be filed when it was offered, the 30 days prescribed by the act creating the city court of Anniston for the filing of pleas having elapsed; and that his discretion in that regard cannot be reviewed or controlled on appeal. It results that the only error in the judgment below lies in the declaration of a waiver of exemptions which is embodied in it. That error will be corrected here, and the judgment modified by striking out the declaration in question. As thus modified, the judgment of the city court is affirmed.

SMITH et al. v. COLLINS et al.

WRONGFUL LEVY — LIABILITIES OF SHERIFF — FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—BURDEN OF PROOF —WHAT CONSTITUTES INSOLVENCY — EVIDENCE OF FRAUD—INSTRUCTIONS—DEPOSITIONS.

1. In an action against a sheriff and the sureties on his bond for the wrongful levy of attachments against C. & Co. on goods which, at the time of the levy, were claimed by plaintiffs, plaintiffs alleged that they had bought the goods from C. & Co. Defendants' testimony tended to show that the sale was fraudulent. The court charged that, after plaintiffs showed a prima facie title to the property, it devolved on defendants to show that plaintiffs' vendors were in failing circumstances, and notice of that fact to plaintiffs, when they became the purchasers; and that then plaintiffs must show that they bought those goods for a valuable consideration. Held, that such charge was erroneous, because, when it was proven that the attaching creditor's debts existed prior to the sale, the burden was on plaintiffs to prove the payment of the consideration, and, when this was done, then the burden would have been shifted to defendants to show plaintiffs had knowledge of the fraudulent intent or the insolvency of the vendor.

2. Such charge is wrong also because it impliedly asserts that the purchase would be valid, if an adequate consideration was paid, even if the purchasers had notice of the fraudulent intent or insolvency of the vendors.

3. Where the vendors in such case were closely related to the vendees, the court properly charged that the jury were the sole judges of the weight to be given to such relationship, and that fraud could not be presumed therefrom.

4. Where the consideration was in part the cancellation of a note signed by the vendors, it was error for the court to charge that, unless the vendors were insolvent at the time of the sale, and plaintiffs had notice thereof, the payment of such note would not render the sale fraudulent, since it ignores the fact that a solvent debtor may be guilty of fraud in the sale of his goods, and since it ignores a want of notice of facts, if such were proven on the trial, which would have put a reasonable man on inquiry, and which, if followed up, would have led to the discovery of fraud or insolvency.

5. It was proper to charge that all the assets belonging to C. & Co. (the vendors) "were liable to the payment of the firm debts, and, as against creditors of the firm, neither of the parties could claim any of the property as exempt from the payment of debts."

6. It was proper to charge that "insolvency" means an insufficiency of assets to pay debts, and if the jury believe from the evidence that the assets of the vendors in such case liable to the payment of their debts, at the time of the sale to plaintiffs, exceeded in value the amount of the claims against them, then they were not insolvent.

7. The charge that fraud must be proven, and that evidence merely showing a suspicion of its existence was insufficient to prove its existence, was properly given.

8. The court properly charged that before the jury find plaintiffs guilty of fraud in the purchase from C. & Co. defendants must show facts which are not fairly and reasonably reconcilable with honesty of purpose.

9. The court charged that if the jury believed that plaintiffs bought the goods and paid therefor a reasonable price, and that defendant, as sheriff, seized the goods under attachment, then defendants were liable for the goods so seized, unless defendants show that at the time of the sale C. & Co. were insolvent, and that plaintiffs had notice thereof. The court further charged that the burden of proving these facts was on defendants. Held, that such charge was erroneous, because, when it was proven that the attaching creditor's claim existed prior to the sale, the burden was on plaintiffs to prove the payment of the consideration, and, when this was done, then the burden would have been shifted to defendants to show that plaintiffs had knowledge of the fraudulent intent or insolvency of the vendor.

10. The court properly refused to charge that if C. & Co. were insolvent, and plaintiffs had notice thereof, the burden of proof was on plaintiffs to show that their purchase of the goods was bona fide and for valuable consideration, and, if the purchase was in part antecedent debts due one of plaintiffs from C. & Co., plaintiffs must clearly establish the existence of such debts; and, there being a close relationship between C. & Co. and plaintiffs, more vigilant and jealous scrutiny should be made, and clearer and more convincing proof required, than if the transaction was between strangers.

11. Defendants requested the court to charge that if the jury believed that the trade was gotten up in haste and completed at night; that the firm of C. & Co. ceased to exist by a sweeping sale of all the stock in the night; that there was near relationship between one of plaintiffs and C. & Co.; that the inventory was taken in the absence of plaintiffs, who never examined the goods with a view of purchasing,—these facts are to be considered in determining whether inquiry should have been made into C. & Co.'s financial condition; and, if the jury found that such inquiry should have been made, and which, if fairly conducted, would have disclosed the insolvency of C. & Co., and that C. & Co. were insolvent, and plaintiffs, having notice thereof, paid money to C. & Co., thereby enabling them to get their property out of reach of creditors, the sale was void, and plaintiffs cannot recover. Held, that such charge was properly refused, because argumentative.

12. The court properly refused to charge that if C. & Co., at the time of the sale to plaintiffs, "were unable to pay their debts in money in the ordinary course of trade, then they were insolvent," since a debtor cannot be said to be insolvent merely because he has not money enough on hand to meet his liabilities as they fall due in the course of trade.

13. It was proper for the court to refuse to charge that partnership assets of a falling firm cannot be applied to the debts and expenses of the individual partners until the partnership debts have been provided for; and if, at the time of the sale to plaintiffs, C. & Co. were in failing circumstances, and they received money in part payment for the goods sold, and without providing for the partnership debts one of the firm used part of the money to defray his family expenses, then this was a fraud on the creditors of C. & Co. whose claims were not provided for, since the validity of such sale would not be affected by the use made by the vendors of the purchase money, apart from facts connecting the purchasers with fraud.

14. The court properly refused to charge that, if the sale to plaintiffs was made when C. & Co. were insolvent, "for the purpose of putting their property beyond the reach of creditors, or was made to hinder, delay, or defraud their creditors, which preference was to be exercised after proceeds of sale had come into their hands," then the jury, in determining whether plaintiffs had knowledge of facts sufficient to put them on inquiry as to the insolvency of C. & Co., might consider the character, relationship, and intimacy of the parties, etc., since such charge was confused and uncertain.

15. Defendant's testimony tended to show that the sale was fraudulent, and he requested the court to charge that if C. & Co., at the time of the sale to plaintiffs, were insolvent, then, in determining if the sale was made with intent to defraud creditors, the jury could consider any unusual circumstances connected therewith, if such are shown to exist, such as great haste in completing the sale; the fact that it was made at night; that all the stock was sold; that it would result in C. & Co. going out of business, etc.; and that the jury might also consider these circumstances, if they exist, in determining whether plaintiffs had knowledge of such fraudulent intent, or had knowledge of facts that should have put them on inquiry; and, if such inquiry was excited, then it was not enough to direct such inquiry to the sale, but they should have gone further, with the view of learning C. & Co.'s real intent in making the sale. Held, that such charge was properly refused, because it is altogether improper for the court to weigh the facts and draw inferences for the jury.

16. The court properly refused to charge that at the time of the sale to plaintiffs C. & Co. were insolvent or in embarrassed circumstances, as these were questions of fact for the jury.

17. The court properly refused to charge that the jury, in considering the bona fides of the sale, must take into consideration the fact that one of the firm of C. & Co. was not introduced by plaintiffs as a witness in this case, as it was predicated on nothing to render it legal.

18. It was proper to refuse to charge that if the jury believed the evidence in the case they should find for defendants, as the question of the sufficiency of the evidence was entirely for the jury.

19. The court properly refused in such case to charge that, if the jury believed that C. & Co. were insolvent at the time of the sale, plaintiffs had notice of such insolvency, and that the four hogs (part of the property sold) mentioned in the inventory, under a private agreement between C. & Co. and plaintiffs, were not to pass under the bill of sale, then this was a fraud on the creditors of C. & Co., and rendered the sale void as to them, and the jury should find for defendants, since, if plaintiffs had notice of the insolvency, the sale would be invalid, without reference to the hogs, and, if they had no such notice, the question growing out of the sale of the hogs did not render the sale void.

20. The writ of attachment under which the levy was made was not evidence of the firm's indebtedness.

21. The court properly refused to charge that plaintiffs at the time of the sale had knowledge of facts calculated to arouse their suspicion, and to stimulate inquiry as to C. & Co.'s financial condition, as this was a question of fact for the jury.

22. An incomplete charge, from which the intention of the pleader can only be conjectured, will not be considered.

23. The circuit court cannot compel the production of a deposition in the hands of a commissioner taken by him under a commission from the chancery court, without an order authorizing it from the court from which the commission issued.

24. Defendants sought to show the insolvency of C. & Co. at the time of the sale, and had given legal notice to produce the books of the firm. They were not produced, and defendants then sought to introduce evidence of their contents. Held, that such evidence was admissible.

25. Testimony which is competent against one party cannot be excluded by the trial court because not competent against another party to the suit.

26. Plaintiffs in an action have a right to be present during the trial, notwithstanding their examination as witnesses.

27. Continuances are in the discretion of the trial court.

28. Where plaintiffs alleged that they had bought the goods from C. & Co., and defendant sought to prove that the sale was fraudulent, it was competent for him to show, as bearing on the question of fraud, that C. & Co., just before the sale to plaintiffs, ceased to make deposits of the proceeds of sales of goods, and that one of the firm withdrew all cash on deposit.

29. It was also competent to show, as explanatory thereof, the circumstances which induced the cessation and withdrawal of the deposits.

Appeal from city court of Birmingham; H. A. SHARPE, Judge.

Action by Collins & Griffith against J. S. Smith and others. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

This was an action of trespass brought by the appellees, Collins & Griffith, against the appellant J. S. Smith, as sheriff, and his bondsmen, and sought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful and unlawful levy of certain attachments against J. D. Collins & Co. upon property which was, at the time of the levy, claimed by plaintiffs. The defendants pleaded the general issue and justification under the authority of said attachments which were placed in the hands of the sheriff for execution. On the trial of the cause, after the plaintiffs had announced ready for trial, two of defendant's witnesses, upon whom a subpœna duces tecum had been served, asked the court not to compel them to produce certain depositions and account-books thereto annexed, which depositions had been taken in another cause pending in the chancery court. The court refused to compel the production of said depositions and books, and to this ruling the defendants duly excepted. The defendants then offered, in support of the motion to require the production of said books and depositions, to show the materiality and importance of the same as testimony in this case; but the court refused to allow this evidence, and defendants duly excepted. The court also overruled the defendants' separate motion to compel the production of the books, and the defendants duly excepted. The defendants then asked the court that the case be continued so as to allow them the opportunity to get the benefit of the testimony, but the court refused to grant the continuance, and the defendants duly excepted to said refusal. The plaintiffs then introduced evidence to show that the said J. S. Smith, at the time of the grievance complained of, was sheriff of Jefferson county, Ala., and that his co-defendants were sureties on his official bond; that said Smith, as such sheriff, by his deputy, took charge of the goods involved in this suit on the evening of December 27, 1889; that he came to the store in Warrior, Ala., which had been occupied by J. D. Collins & Co., but was, at that time, occupied by plaintiffs, and levied upon the goods in said store as the property of J. D. Collins & Co. under two attachment writs in his hands in favor of Carter Bros. & Co. and Henry Bernstein; that said sheriff sold the goods so levied upon, and satisfied those attachment writs and other writs of attachment which were in his hands against J. D. Collins & Co. The testimony for the plaintiffs further tended to show that the goods so levied upon and removed by the sheriff had previously to such levy been sold by J. D. Collins & Co. to the plaintiffs for $4,800, which purchase price was the fair market value of the goods bought, less the value of a safe at $75, which had been charged twice in the inventory, and the value of hogs, $60, which were included in the bill of sale, but which were redelivered to J. D. Collins & Co.,—it having been agreed that the hogs should not be included in the bill of sale. Robert Collins, of the plaintiff firm, on being introduced as a witness, testified that on December 23, 1889, after some negotiations with J. D. Collins, of the firm of J. D. Collins & Co., he and one Griffith agreed upon the purchase of the stock of goods from J. D. Collins & Co., agreeing to pay him the purchase price above stated; that said sale was made according to the invoice which J. D. Collins had with him at the time of the agreement to purchase, and which was attached to the bill of sale made by J. D. Collins & Co. to the plaintiffs; that at the time of the consummation of the sale said Robert Collins paid to J. D. Collins & Co. in checks $601, and on the next day, said Collins & Griffith having gone to Warrior, the bill of sale was signed by J. A. Collins, and $1,043 of the purchase price of the goods was paid by the plaintiffs to him. The evidence for the plaintiffs further tended to show that the purchase price was paid by the cancellation of an antecedent indebtedness by J. D. Collins & Co. to Robert Collins, by cash in hand paid, by checks on certain banks, and by promissory notes; and that the transaction was in every respect bona fide, and free from collusion. The testimony for the defendants tended to controvert the bona fides of the contract between Collins & Griffith and J. D. Collins & Co., by which they pretended to purchase the latter's stock of goods. Among other evidence, the defendants introduced the president of the bank at Warrior, Ala., who testified that J. D. Collins & Co. had for a long time been customers of his bank, and deposited therein about $1,500 per month, until about the middle of October, 1889, when they ceased to make any deposits; and that said witness Davidson asked J. D. Collins why he ceased to make deposits with him, to which Collins replied "that they were getting very little money, and were putting what they got in cotton." The plaintiffs objected to this conversation with J. D. Collins, and moved to exclude it from the jury. The court sustained the motion, excluded the testimony, and the defendants duly excepted. There was much testimony introduced on the part of both plaintiffs and defendants, but it is not deemed necessary to set it out in detail.

The defendants excepted to the following part of the court's oral charge to the jury: "To render a conveyance made with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors void, it is necessary that bad intent must exist on the part of the purchaser as well as the seller. It is not sufficient that property be sold with the intent on the part of the seller to injure his creditors, but, in order to render it void, both parties to the conveyance must participate in the bad intent, so that a purchaser who, without any knowledge of the intent on the part of the seller, buys property and pays for it, or pays a part and gives his notes for the remainder, is protected. The sale cannot be rendered void even at the instance of creditors who may be prejudiced thereby." The court, at the request of the plaintiffs, gave the following charges in writing: (1) "The jury are sole judges of what weight shall be given to the relationship of the parties in determining the question involved in the case. No presumption of fraud is drawn from relationship." (2) "Unless J. D. Collins & Co. were insolvent at the time of the sale, and Collins & Griffith had notice thereof, the payment of the note signed by J. D. and J. A. Collins would not render the sale fraudulent." (3) "I charge the jury that all the assets belonging to the firm of J. D. Collins & Co. were liable to the payment of the firm debts, and, as against creditors of the firm, neither of the partners could claim any of the property as exempt from the payment of debts." (4) "I charge the jury that insolvency means an insufficiency of assets to pay debts; and if the jury believe from the evidence that the assets of J. D. Collins and J. A. Collins liable to the payment of their debts on the 23d and 24th of December, 1889, exceeded in value the amount of the claims against them, then they were not insolvent at the time." (5) "Fraud must be proven like any other fact. Evidence which merely shows a suspicion of its existence is not sufficient to show its existence." (6) "Before the jury find that the plaintiffs, Collins & Griffith, were guilty of fraud in the purchase from J. D. Collins & Co., defendants must show facts and circumstances which not only cast a suspicion on the transaction, but they must show a state of facts which are not fairly and reasonably reconcilable with fair dealing and honesty of purpose; and until this is done the jury cannot find that plaintiffs were guilty of fraud." (7) "If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiffs, Collins & Griffith, on or about the 23d day of December, 1889, bought of J. D. Collins & Co. the stock of goods in controversy, and paid therefor the agreed price, with cash, and by the transfer of a mortgage on one's self, and in the satisfaction and payment of bona fide indebtedness of J. D. and J. A. Collins, and of J. D. Collins & Co., and by a resale of the hogs described in the bill of sale, and by executing their notes for the balance; and if the jury further believe that the amount so paid in this way was a reasonable value of such goods; and that afterwards Joseph S. Smith, as sheriff, by his deputy, seized and took possession of such goods under the writs of attachment given in evidence,—then the defendants are liable to the plaintiffs for the stock of goods so seized, unless the defendants have satisfied the jury by the evidence—First, that at the time the purchase was made and closed J. D. Collins & Co. were insolvent or in embarrassed circumstances; and, second, that the plaintiffs, Collins & Griffith, at that time had actual or constructive notice that J. D. Collins & Co. were insolvent or in embarrassed circumstances. The burden of proving each of these last-named facts is upon the defendants, and the plaintiffs are entitled to a verdict, unless these facts are proven."

The defendants separately and severally excepted to each of said charges as given, and separately excepted to the court's refusal to give each of the following written charges requested by them: (1) "If the jury believe from the evidence that J. D. Collins & Co. were insolvent or in a failing condition, and that Collins & Griffith knew this, or were in possession of facts sufficient to put them on inquiry as to the financial condition of J. D. Collins & Co., the burden of proof is on the plaintiffs to show that the purchase of the stock of goods from J. D. Collins & Co. was not only bona fide, but that they paid a valuable consideration for the goods; and the purchase price consisting, according to their claim, in part of debts due to Robert A. Collins, one of the purchasers, from said J. D. Collins & Co., the plaintiffs must establish the existence of such debt due to Robert Collins by clear and satisfactory evidence; and it being undisputed that near relationship exists between the purchasers and sellers, more vigilant and jealous scrutiny will be exacted, and clearer and more convincing proof required, than if the transaction was between strangers." (2) "The jury should look to all the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction in deciding upon the bona fides of the sale from J. D. Collins & Co. to Collins & Griffith. If the jury believe the trade was gotten up in haste; that the trade was consummated at night; that the mercantile firm of J. D. Collins & Co. ceased to exist by a sweeping sale of the entire merchandise in the night-time; that there was a near relationship between one of the plaintiffs and the sellers; that the inventory was taken in the absence of the purchasers, and that the plaintiffs had never examined the stock of goods with a view of purchasing the same,—these are facts to be considered by the jury, in connection with all the other evidence in the case, in determining whether or not inquiry into the financial condition of J. D. Collins & Co. should have been made. And if the jury find, from the foregoing facts, viewed in the light of the other evidence in the case, that inquiry should have been made, which, if fairly and honestly conducted, would have disclosed the existence of debts due from J. D. Collins & Co. and unprovided for; and if the jury further find that J. D. Collins & Co. were in failing circumstances at the time of the trade, and that the plaintiffs, knowing this fact, or having good reason to believe it, paid money to J. D. Collins & Co., and thereby enabled them to shuffle their property out of sight of creditors,—the sale was void, and plaintiffs cannot recover." (3) "The court charges the jury that if they believe from the evidence in this case that J. D. Collins & Co., at the time of the sale by them to Collins & Griffith, were unable to pay their debts in money in the ordinary course of trade, then they were insolvent." (4) "The court charges the jury that partnership assets of a failing concern cannot legally be applied to the debts and expenses of the individual members until the partnership debts have been provided for; and if the jury believe, at the time of the alleged sale of goods from J. D. Collins & Co. to Collins & Griffith, that the former was in failing circumstances, and they received money in part payment for said goods; and that, without paying or providing for the partnership debts, Julius A. Collins used a part of said money to defray his family expenses,—then this was a fraud upon those creditors of J. D. Collins & Co. who were unpaid or unprovided for, if there were such creditors." (5) "The court charges the jury that if J. D. Collins & Co. were insolvent or in an embarrassed financial condition at the time of the sale to Collins & Griffith, and that the said sale was made by them for the purpose of putting their property beyond the reach of their creditors, or was made to hinder, delay, or defraud their creditors, which preference was to be exercised at their election after proceeds of sale had come into their hands, then the jury, in determining whether Collins & Griffith, or either of them, had sufficient information to stimulate inquiry into the transaction and embarrassed financial condition of J. D. Collins & Co., they may consider the character, surroundings, and relationship of the parties to the transaction, their intimacy, if any is shown, their connection with that particular transaction, and their facilities for obtaining correct information." (6) "The court charges the jury that, if J. D. Collins & Co. at the time of the sale to Collins & Griffith were insolvent or in a failing condition, then, in determining if said sale was made with the intent of placing their property beyond the reach of creditors, or to hinder, delay, or defraud their creditors, the jury are authorized to consider any unusual circumstances outside of the ordinary routine commercial or mercantile business, if such are shown to exist, such as great haste in consummating the sale, the unusual time, to-wit, night-time, the fact that the sale embraced the entire stock of goods, and the further fact that it would result in the firm of J. D. Collins & Co. going out of the commercial business, and also the fact that they conveyed their store-house and lot at the same time to Imogene Collins; and the jury may also consider these circumstances, if they exist, in determining whether or not said Collins & Griffith, or either of them, had knowledge of such fraudulent intent or such purpose to place the property beyond the reach of creditors, or whether they had notice or knowledge of such facts as would stimulate inquiry on their part into the validity of the sale; and, if such inquiry was excited, then it was not enough that said inquiry should have been directed simply to the sale, but they should have gone further, with the view of ascertaining the real intent on the part of J. D. Collins & Co. in making such sale." (7) "The court charges the jury that if J. D. Collins & Co. were unable at the time of the sale to Collins & Griffith to pay their debts in money as they fell due in the ordinary course of trade, then they were insolvent." (8) "The court charges the jury that the evidence in the case shows that J. D. Collins & Co. were insolvent at the time of the sale to Collins & Griffith." (9) "The court charges the jury that the evidence in the case shows that J. D. Collins & Co. at the time of the sale to Collins & Griffith were in embarrassed financial circumstances." (10) "The court charges the jury that, in considering the fairness and bona fides of the sale of J. D. Collins & Co. to Collins & Griffith, they must take into consideration the fact that J. D. Collins, of the firm of J. D. Collins & Co., was not introduced by the plaintiffs as a witness in this case." (11) "The court charges the jury that if they believe the evidence in this case they will find for the defendants." (12) "The court charges the jury that if they believe from the evidence in this case that, when the sale of J. D. Collins & Co. was made to Collins & Griffith, that J. D. Collins & Co. were insolvent, or in an embarrassed financial condition, and that Collins & Griffith, or either of them, knew of such insolvency, or had notice or knowledge of facts which would put a reasonably prudent man on inquiry in relation thereto, which, if honestly and faithfully pursued, would have disclosed their insolvent condition; and if the jury further believe that the four hogs mentioned in the inventory, under a private agreement between J. D. Collins & Co. and Collins & Griffith, were not to pass under said bill of sale to Collins & Griffith, but were to remain the property of J. D. Collins,—then this was a fraud on the existing creditors of J. D. Collins & Co., and rendered the sale void as to them, and the jury will find for the defendants." (13) "The jury may look to the attachment writs produced in evidence on the trial, and the returns of the sheriff thereon, and consider the same, in connection with the other evidence in the case, in determining whether or not J. D. Collins & Co. had property liable to be levied upon to satisfy the debts of said J. D. Collins & Co." (14) "The court charges the jury that the evidence in this case shows that Collins & Griffith, at the time of the sale of the goods by J. D. Collins & Co. to them, had notice or knowledge of facts or circumstances which were calculated to arouse suspicion or stimulate inquiry as to the real financial condition of J. D. Collins & Co." (15) "The court charges the jury that if they believe from the evidence in this case that J. D. Collins & Co., at the time of the sale by them to Collins & Griffith, were unable to pay their debts as they matured and became due in the ordinary course of business, as persons carrying on such business usually do, in that currency which is made by the United States government legal tender." (16) "The court charges the jury that the evidence in this case shows that Collins & Griffith had notice of facts or circumstances at the time of the purchase of the goods by them from J. D. Collins & Co. which were calculated to arouse suspicion as to the insolvency or failing financial condition of J. D. Collins & Co." (17) "The court charges the jury that the evidence in this case shows that Collins & Griffith at the time of the sale of the goods by J. D. Collins & Co. to Collins & Griffith had notice or knowledge of facts or circumstances which were calculated to arouse suspicion or to stimulate inquiry as to the intent or purpose of J. D. Collins & Co. in selling their goods to them." (18) "The court charges the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the four hogs mentioned in the inventory were not intended to be sold to and passed to Collins & Griffith, but were, under the arrangement or agreement between said J. D. Collins & Co. and Collins & Griffith, to remain the property of J. D. Collins & Co., then this rendered the sale fraudulent and void as to creditors of J. D. Collins & Co., and the jury will find for the defendants."

There was verdict for the plaintiffs, assessing their damages at $3,466.93, and the defendants made a motion for a new trial, and to have the verdict set aside, assigning as ground thereof the ruling of the court on the evidence, and the charges given and refused. The court overruled this motion; and, upon judgment being rendered for the plaintiffs, the defendants prosecute this appeal, and assign as error the various rulings of the lower court.

Lane & White, for appellants. Gillespy & Meyer and Smith & Lowe, for appellees.

COLEMAN, J. Creditors of J. D. Collins & Co. sued out certain attachments against the firm, which were levied by the sheriff upon a stock of goods as the property of the defendants in attachment. The plaintiffs in this suit, Collins & Griffith, brought the present action against the sheriff and his sureties in trespass, claiming the goods as their property under a purchase from J. D. Collins & Co., made prior to the suing out of the attachments. The bona fides and validity of the sale to plaintiffs by J. D. Collins & Co. was the issue in the trial court. Robert A. Collins, of the firm of Collins & Griffith, is a brother of J. D. Collins, and son of J. A. Collins, composing the firm of J. D. Collins & Co. There seems to be no contest as to the validity of the debts of the plaintiffs in attachment and of their existence at the time and prior to the sale of the goods. The evidence tends to show that the consideration paid by plaintiffs principally consisted in cash and a debt due Robert A. Collins from J. D. Collins and J. A. Collins jointly, but not as partners. There was one item of four hogs, valued at $60, in the inventory. These hogs were returned to the vendors, and the agreed price for the whole purchase was credited with the amount of the $60. There are some general principles of law applying in such cases which have been repeatedly declared by this court, but, as they seem not to be fully apprehended, we venture to repeat some of them again. When a creditor attacks a sale of property made by his debtor as fraudulent, and proves the existence of his debt prior to the sale thereon, the burden devolves upon the purchaser to show that he paid a fair and adequate consideration. After the purchaser makes this proof, then the burden shifts back upon the creditor to show that the sale was made with a fraudulent intent, and that the purchaser knew of and participated in this intent. The law declares that an insolvent vendor, or one in embarrassed circumstances financially, who disposes of his property which is liable for his debts, and places it beyond the reach of legal process, and withholds the purchase money from his creditor, is guilty of fraud; and a purchaser for a cash or present consideration of substantially all his property, who knows that his vendor is insolvent or financially embarrassed, or who has knowledge of such facts as would put a reasonable man upon inquiry, and which, if followed up, would lead to a discovery of his insolvency or financial embarrassment, is a guilty participator in the fraud, and acquires nothing by his purchase available against the creditors of his vendor. The general charge of the court is not consistent with itself, and not in accord with these principles in several particulars. We specify only one. The court, after correctly instructing the jury as to the effect a knowledge of the insolvency of the vendor on the part of the vendee would have upon the purchase, in another part of the charge instructed the jury that, after plaintiffs showed a prima facie title to the property, "it devolves upon the defendants to show that plaintiffs' vendors were in failing circumstances or insolvent, and to show notice of that fact to the plaintiffs when they became the purchasers. When they have done that it devolves upon the plaintiffs to show that they bought these goods for a valuable consideration; to show to the reasonable satisfaction of the jury what they have paid for them." This is error in two respects. First, in requiring the defendants to show that plaintiffs had knowledge of the insolvency of their vendors before the plaintiffs were required to prove the payment of a valid consideration. The rule is that, when the proof shows that the attaching creditors' debts existed prior to the sale, the burden of proving the payment of the consideration devolves upon the purchaser, and, after this proof is made, then the burden is shifted back upon the attaching creditors to prove that the purchaser had knowledge of the fraudulent intent or insolvency of the vendor, or of his failing condition.

The charge is also radically wrong in principle, in this: that impliedly it asserts that the purchase would be valid, if an adequate consideration was paid, although the purchasers had notice of the insolvent condition or fraudulent intent of their vendors.

The court holds that there is no reversible error in the charge to the jury in reference to the fact of relationship of the parties, and in giving charge No. 1 at the request of plaintiffs, in which it was declared that the jury are the sole judges of the weight to be given to the fact of relationship. The charge asserts no incorrect proposition of law, and if deemed misleading as falling short of the entire rule, the court holds that it was the duty of the complaining party to have asked for an explanatory charge. In the case of Reeves v. Skipper, 10 South. Rep. 309, (at present term,) this question was considered at length, and the rule which governs in such cases settled.

That J. D. Collins & Co. were largely indebted at the time of the sale to plaintiffs, and that the sale tended to hinder and delay their creditors in the collection of their debts, is not seriously controverted. A debtor possessed of ample means to satisfy all demands against him, as well as an insolvent debtor, may be guilty of a fraudulent intent in the sale of his property. He may convert his property into money for the express purpose of putting it beyond the reach of his creditors, and a vendee who purchases with a knowledge of such fraudulent purpose, for a cash consideration, in law is a participator in the fraud. Charge 2 given for plaintiffs ignores this contention, and is further objectionable, in that it does not hypothesize a want of knowledge or notice of facts, if such were proven on the trial to the satisfaction of the jury, calculated to put a reasonable man on inquiry, and which, if followed up, would have led to a discovery of either a fraudulent intent, or insolvency or failing condition of their vendors.

Charge No. 7 is subject to the first objection pointed out to charge No. 2. Furthermore, it fixes the burden of proving knowledge or notice of insolvency upon defendants absolutely, without reference to the fact that the jury must be satisfied that plaintiffs paid a fair and adequate consideration before this burden is shifted on defendants.

We find no error in charges 3, 4, 5, and 6. Charge 6 is substantially the same as that approved in Keller v. Taylor, 90 Ala. 290, 7 South. Rep. 907. Charge 4 may have called for an explanatory charge, but there is no error in the proposition asserted.

Charge No. 1, requested by defendants, was properly refused.

Charge No. 2 went too far, and was also argumentative, and there is no reversible error in its refusal. If the jury believed the facts predicated in this charge, they were suggestive of fraud, and should have led to inquiry on the part of the purchasers, and, if the charge had stopped here, it ought to have been given. Near the conclusion of the charge it becomes argumentative.

Charges Nos. 3 and 7 were properly refused. A debtor who has a sufficiency of property acceptable to legal process to satisfy all legal demands cannot be said to be insolvent, although he may not have money in hand to meet his liabilities as they fall due in the course of trade.

Charge 4 was misleading, and properly refused. The validity of the transaction in this case is not affected by the use made of a part of the purchase money by the vendor after the consummation of the sale, disconnected from any other facts implicating the purchasers in a fraudulent intent.

The following statement in charge 5, "which preference was to be exercised at their election after proceeds of sale came into their hands," renders the charge confused and uncertain. We fail to perceive its connection and bearing to the remainder of the charge.

Charge 6 was properly refused. It is entirely legitimate for counsel to group facts and press them with reasonable inference in argument upon the jury, but altogether improper for the court to weigh the facts and draw the inference for the jury. The charge is argumentative and objectionable in other respects.

Charges Nos. 8, 9, 11, 14, 16, and 17 involved disputed questions of fact, to be determined by the jury, and not the court.

Charge 10 was properly refused. It was predicated on nothing to render it legal.

Charges 12 and 18 were properly refused. The latter declares the sale to have been fraudulent and void, without reference to the financial condition or fraudulent intent of the vendors, or any knowledge or notice of their intent or condition on the part of plaintiffs. The charge, to be correct, necessarily involves the assumption that the purchasers were chargeable with notice of these facts. We do not see the importance which has been attached to the matter of the hogs, except as argument for the jury. If the purchasers knew of a fraudulent intent on the part of their vendors, or were chargeable with knowledge or notice that they were insolvent or in failing circumstances, or if culpably negligent in not making inquiry and following it up, the greater part of the consideration paid being a present consideration, and not the satisfaction of an antecedent debt of J. D. Collins & Co., the sale would be invalid as to the injured creditors, independent of and without reference to the sale of the hogs. On the other hand, if the purchasers were not thus chargeable, the question growing out of the sale of the hogs, as a matter of law, did not render the sale void. It was for the jury to say whether the explanation given was consistent with fair dealing, when considered in connection with the other evidence.

Charge 13 asserts the proposition that the writ of attachment may be considered by the jury as evidence tending to show the financial condition of the defendant debtor, in other words, that the writ of attachment was evidence of their indebtedness. The rule which prevails in this respect in a trial of the right of property rests upon different principles and practice than when the suit is in trespass by a vendee of the defendants in attachment. The issue is not the same. Pulliam v. Newberry, 41 Ala. 174.

Charge No. 15 is incomplete, and we are left to conjecture as to the intention of the pleader. Many of the charges give evidence of hasty preparation.

There is no power in the circuit court to compel the production of a deposition which is in the hands of a commissioner, taken by him under a commission from the chancery court, without an order authorizing it from the court from which issued the commission. We do not decide that a court of law has any authority to compel a party at any time to produce his books in court, that they may be used in evidence against him. The rule is different in a court of equity.

A failure, after legal notice, to produce books or other written documents in a court of law which may furnish legal evidence in proper cases, authorizes the introduction of proof of their contents. In testing the bona fides of a sale made by a partnership, it is competent for an attaching creditor to show the insolvency or embarrassed condition financially of the partnership debtor. For this purpose the books of the partnership may contain competent evidence, and, if furnished to him, may be introduced in evidence, or, upon a proper showing, the creditor may introduce evidence of the contents of the books. Whenever the financial condition of the debtor is material, whatever throws light on this question is admissible. To make such testimony available as against the purchaser, there must be additional proof, such as knowledge or notice of the condition of the vendor, (debtor,) or of facts suggesting further inquiry, and which, if honestly followed up, would lead to a knowledge of his condition.

The court should not exclude testimony which is competent against one party because not competent against another party to the suit. The testimony should be received, and its bearing limited and explained to the jury.

The plaintiffs had the right to be present during the trial, notwithstanding their examination as witnesses.

Continuances are in the discretion of the trial court.

It was competent, as bearing on the questions of a contemplated fraud, to show that J. D. Collins & Co., just before the sale to plaintiffs, ceased to make deposits of proceeds of sales of merchandise, and that J. D. Collins withdrew all cash on deposit.

It was also competent, in a legitimate way, as explanatory thereof, to show the circumstances which induced the cessation and withdrawal of the deposits. The record is unduly incumbered with merely cumulative exceptions, and many which involve merely elementary questions. There are 54 assignments of error. Less than half the number may be selected, which raise every material question reserved by them all. Reversed and remanded.

MATHIS v. CARPENTER, Sheriff, et al.

SHERIFFS — DEPUTY — PROOF OF AUTHORITY — LIABILITY ON BOND — EVIDENCE.

1. Evidence that a person acted as deputy-sheriff in the presence of the sheriff; that he was in the habit of receiving all kinds of process; that he receipted for executions in the name of the sheriff as his deputy; that he collected money on executions; that he was generally understood to be the deputy-sheriff,—is sufficient to show that such person was recognized by the sheriff as his deputy.

2. Under Crim. Code, § 3951, imposing a penalty on an officer required by law to take an oath of office, who enters on the duties of his office without taking and filing such oath in the proper office, a sheriff is not relieved of his liability for the acts of a deputy because such deputy filed his oath of office with the clerk of court instead of the probate office.

3. Where a sheriff's bond has been replaced, because insufficient, by a second bond, and defendant's pleas in an action against the sheriff and the sureties on his bonds are framed jointly for all defendants, the first bond was improperly excluded, although some of defendants were sureties on one bond, and not on the other.

4. Where it appears, in an action against a sheriff for failure to levy an attachment, that the attachment issued, and property in possession of defendant in attachment prima facie proven to be subject to levy was pointed out and an indemnifying bond given, testimony by the sheriff that the property was not subject to attachment is properly admitted.

Appeal from city court of Anniston; B. F. CASSADY, Judge.

Action by C. H. Mathis against L. P. Carpenter, sheriff, and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Plaintiff demurred to defendants' second plea, on the ground that it presented no material issue, and that in the execution of a writ of attachment it is immaterial whether defendants are solvent or insolvent. This demurrer was overruled. The principal part of the controversy, as is shown in the opinion, is whether or not Porter was a duly-appointed deputy-sheriff. Plaintiff offered to introduce in evidence what purported to be an oath of office as deputy-sheriff taken by Porter before the clerk of the city court and filed with him. On defendants' objection, the court refused to allow the oath to be introduced in evidence, to which ruling plaintiff duly excepted. Plaintiff also offered to introduce in evidence two bonds of the sheriff, the first of which had been replaced by the second, as it had been declared insufficient; but, on defendants' objection to the introduction of the first of said bonds, the court refused to allow it to be introduced in evidence, and plaintiff duly excepted. On the examination of defendant in attachment, C. Roberts, as a witness for defendants in this suit, Roberts was asked the following question: "Did you have any property at the time subject to the levy of said attachment?" Plaintiff objected to this question, and duly excepted to the court's overruling his objection. The witness said that he had no property at the time subject to the attachment, as the household furniture which was in the house rented by him belonged to his wife. The cause was submitted to the court, without the intervention of a jury.

Matthews & Whiteside, for appellant. Caldwell & Johnston, for appellees.

COLEMAN, J. Appellant, as plaintiff, moved for a summary judgment against the defendant Carpenter, as sheriff, and his sureties, for failing to levy an attachment. The averments of the motion are that the writ of attachment was placed in the hands of the sheriff, property pointed out to him as belonging to the defendant in attachment, and that the sheriff was duly indemnified to make the levy. The defendants' pleas were three in number: (1) That the writ was not received by him or any one authorized to receive it; (2) that defendant had no property subject to levy under the attachment; and (3) the same could not have been executed by the exercise of due diligence.

The proof is ample to show that the sheriff, Carpenter, was liable for the acts of C. F. Porter as his deputy. The testimony of the clerk of the court showed that Porter acted as the deputy-sheriff, in the presence of the sheriff; that he was in the habit of receiving all kinds of process; that in fact he receipted for executions in the name of the sheriff, by him as deputy, collected money on execution, made due return of the collections in the name of the sheriff, and was generally understood to be the deputy-sheriff. To the same effect is the testimony of certain attorneys who practiced in the court; and in regard to the particular writ of attachment, upon inquiry being made of Caldwell, whom the sheriff acknowledges to have been his regular deputy-sheriff, was referred by him to Porter as the officer who had the writ for execution. There is other evidence, also sufficient to satisfactorily show that Porter was recognized by the sheriff as his deputy.

The pleas are framed jointly for all the defendants, and there is no plea which justified the exclusion of either bond executed by the sheriff, although some of the defendants were sureties upon one bond who were not sureties upon the other.

Section 3951 of the Criminal Code imposes a penalty upon any officer required by law to file an oath of office who enters upon the duties of his office without first taking and filing such oath in the proper office. The fact that Porter filed his oath of office with the clerk of the court, instead of the probate office, did not relieve the sheriff of his liability for the acts of Porter as his deputy if the evidence otherwise satisfactorily showed that he (Porter) represented himself as a deputy-sheriff, and acted as such with the knowledge and consent and approbation of the sheriff, and, if the evidence is credible, there can be but little question of the existence of these facts. Joseph v. Cawthorn, 74 Ala. 414.

That property in the possession of the defendant, apparently subject to levy, was pointed out, and an indemnifying bond executed to the sheriff, is fully proven. The witness Roberts, the defendant in the attachment suit, testified that in fact the attachment was levied by the deputy-sheriff so far as to take control of the property, and for a consideration of $25 paid to the deputy by him the possession was released, but there was no entry of any levy entered on the writ of attachment or elsewhere.

The second and third pleas presented a good defense to the action. An indemnifying bond is intended for the protection of the officer. Under our statute, no additional duty is imposed upon the officer because he has been indemnified. A bond of indemnity does not devolve upon a sheriff to commit a trespass or do an illegal act. In no event can it do more than shift the burden on him to show that the property was not subject to levy. The evidence showed that the debt upon which the attachment issued was for rent of a dwelling; the property pointed out was furniture in the rented house, apparently in the possession of the tenant. Prima facie the officer was liable for not making the levy, but he was not absolutely liable. If the property did not belong to the tenant, if it was not subject to levy by attachment, the plaintiff suffered no injury, and sustained no damage. Under the facts proven by the plaintiff, prima facie the property was liable, and the burden rested upon the sheriff to prove his defense, by showing that the property was not subject to levy under the attachment. Mason v. Watts, 7 Ala. 705; Leavitt v. Smith, Id. 181; Minter v. Bigelow, 9 Port. (Ala.) 483; Smith v. Castellow, 88 Ala. 355, 6 South. Rep. 750; Abbott v. Gillespy, 75 Ala. 184; Wilson v. Strobach, 59 Ala. 493; Governor, etc., v. Campbell, 17 Ala. 569. There was no error in admitting such testimony. Section 12 of the act establishing the city court of Anniston (Acts 1888–89, p. 569) provides that, in cases of appeal, if there be error, the supreme court shall render such judgment as the court below should have rendered, or reverse and remand the same for further proceedings, as shall be deemed right. Although there is proof tending to show that the property pointed out to the sheriff may not have been subject to levy under the attachment, the real contest seems to have been rested upon other grounds. The rulings of the trial court were not in accord with the principle here declared, and we are of opinion that the ends of justice would be better promoted by a reversal of the case. Reversed and remanded.

MOORE et al. v. PENN et al.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES.

1. Where a bill of exceptions is signed by the judge, leaving blank spaces in which certain papers used in evidence are to be copied by the clerk, the clerk cannot incorporate papers of which there is no description in the bill, or of which the description is general and indefinite.

2. When a creditor purchases from an insolvent debtor his entire stock of goods, the consideration being the extinguishment of a pre-existing debt materially less in amount than the value of the goods, the sale is fraudulent as against attaching creditors.

Appeal from circuit court, Tallapoosa county; JOHN MOORE, Judge.

Action by Moore, Marsh & Co. against Penn & Co. on an attachment of plaintiffs against Spinks Bros. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. D. Bulger, for appellants. J. M. Chilton, for appellees.

CLOPTON, J. Under an order for a certiorari, the clerk of the circuit court returned a transcript of the bill of exceptions as signed by the presiding judge, from which it appears that blank spaces were left, in which some papers used in evidence were to be copied by the clerk. Appellees thereupon moved to strike from the bill of exceptions returned in the original transcript two notes and a deed of assignment copied in two of the blank spaces, on the ground that they were not incorporated when the bill of exceptions was signed by the judge, and are not so identified as to authorize their insertion by the clerk in making up the record. The rule is well settled that the incorporation of any paper read, or offered to be read, in evidence in the bill of exceptions before it is signed, or such description by identifying features as to leave no room for mistake by the transcribing officer, is indispensable. Pearce v. Clements, 73 Ala. 256. It being conceded that there is not even a pretended description of the notes, and that the description of the deed of assignment is general and indefinite, the motion to strike them from the bill of exceptions is granted. The present proceeding is a statutory trial of the right of property to a stock of goods, levied on by an attachment sued out by the appellees against the estate of Spinks Bros., to which appellants interposed a claim. On the evidence, the court gave the affirmative charge in favor of plaintiffs.

The first objection urged to the charge is that the bill of exceptions, which purports to set out substantially all the evidence, does not show any proof that plaintiffs were creditors of Spinks Bros. at the time of the sale of the goods to claimants or at any other time. The objection is based on the fact that a blank space was left in the bill of exceptions signed by the judge, which is filled in the first transcript by the insertion of copies of an affidavit and attachment. On the settled rule that the corrected transcript returned in obedience to an order for certiorari must be regarded as the true and correct record, so far as there is any repugnance between the contents of the first and second records, it is insisted that the principle on which the notes and deed of assignment were stricken out should be extended so as to prevent the attachment from being considered, on this appeal, as a part of the evidence set out in the bill of exceptions; and that if the attachment be excluded there is no evidence that Spinks Bros. were indebted to plaintiffs. Whether there is any repugnancy between the contents of the two bills of exceptions depends on the question whether the description in the bill signed by the judge sufficiently identifies the affidavit and attachment to justify their insertion in the blank space. The proper issue on the trial of the right of property is an affirmative one on the part of plaintiffs, that the goods levied on are subject to the attachment, and a denial by the claimants. There was but one attachment issued and levied on the goods, the same attachment mentioned in the affidavit and claim-bond made by the claimants, which is the foundation of the trial of the right of property and of the issue joined,—a part of the record. We are unable to see how any mistake could have been made by the transcribing officer. This is the certainty of identification required by the rule. If the attachment be regarded as a part of the bill of exceptions, it is sufficient evidence, on the trial of the right of property and for the purposes of such trial, of the indebtedness of the defendants in the attachment to plaintiffs, which cannot be questioned by the claimants. Pulliam v. Newberry, 41 Ala.

163. While the bill of exceptions states, "the foregoing is substantially all the evidence in the case," it also states the attachment as a part of the foregoing evidence. If, then, the contention of appellants be conceded, and the attachment regarded as stricken out, we have a bill of exceptions showing that the attachment was in evidence, and not furnishing the document itself or a statement of its contents. In this state of the record we are bound to presume, not being informed to the contrary, in favor of the ruling of the circuit court that the attachment evidenced a debt due from the defendants therein to the plaintiffs. Glass v. Pinckard, 56 Ala. 592; Hosea v. Talbert, 65 Ala. 173. The consideration paid for the goods by the claimants was the payment of two notes which they alleged had been made by Spinks Bros. A transaction by which an embarrassed or insolvent debtor sells his property to a creditor, the payment of an antecedent debt being the sole consideration, is without the scope of the usual inquiries, in cases of fraudulent conveyances on a present consideration in whole or in part, as to the existence of badges of fraud, or the intent of the debtor to hinder, delay, or defraud his other creditors, and participation therein or knowledge thereof on the part of the purchasing creditor. As we have repeatedly said, the material inquiries, when such transactions are assailed as fraudulent, are directed to the existence and validity of the debt, the sufficiency of the consideration, and the reservation of a benefit to the debtor. Hodges v. Coleman, 76 Ala. 103; Knowles v. Street, 87 Ala. 357, 6 South. Rep. 273; Harmon v. McRae, 91 Ala. 401, 8 South. Rep. 548. This limitation upon the general rule is rested on the principle that a debtor, devoting his property to the payment of an honest debt, performs a lawful act which can cause no legal injury to another creditor. In order, however, that the purchaser may bring himself within the protection thus afforded to a preferred creditor, he must satisfactorily prove the existence, amount, and bona fides of the debt, and the adequacy of the consideration, and also show that no benefit was reserved to the debtor. If he fails to establish, either the existence and validity of his debt, or that its amount is not materially less than the fair and reasonable value of the property, the law stamps the transaction as fraudulent as against other creditors. This repetition of principles, so repeatedly and uniformly declared, is made because of their applicability to the evidence, shown by the bill of exceptions, as constituting a basis of the affirmative charge. The evidence shows that the goods purchased were worth, as testified by two witnesses, 60 cents, and by another 80 cents, on the dollar of the invoice price, which was about $4,300. Taking the lowest estimate as most favorable to claimants, the value of the goods was about $2,580. Perryman, a member of the firm of Moore, Marsh & Co., testified, without objection, that Spinks Bros. were indebted to claimants "in the sum of $2,938.40, as shown by two promissory notes made by them," and that the consideration of the note calling for $1,369.25 was money loaned by the claimants to Spinks Bros. The bill of exceptions recites that the notes were read in evidence against the objection of plaintiffs, but, as the notes appearing in the original transcript are stricken out, neither the notes nor statement of their contents are given, otherwise than that the amount of one is incidentally mentioned as above stated. It further appears that the note last mentioned and all the witness said as to its consideration were subsequently excluded. As this ruling constitutes an assignment of error, we may remark that there was no error in excluding the evidence, the witness having testified, on cross-examination, that he knew nothing about the loan of the money except as informed by his partners. It was not permissible for the witness to testify to the amount and consideration of the indebtedness from what his partners told him; they should have been examined. The exclusion of the note and the testimony as to its consideration leaves no evidence of the consideration and bona fides of any part of the indebtedness. But, if the existence and validity of the balance of the indebtedness testified to by Perryman, after deducting the amount of the excluded note, were conceded, and the inferences most favorable to the claimants as to the value of the property allowed, the bill of exceptions presents the case where a creditor purchases from an insolvent debtor his entire stock of goods, the sole consideration being the extinguishment of a debt materially less in amount than the reasonable value of the goods. The claimants having failed to produce evidence tending to show the existence and validity of a large part of the indebtedness, which it is alleged constituted the consideration paid for the goods, it must be regarded as, in fact, simulated, at least to the extent of the indebtedness. Such a sale is fraudulent in fact as against the existing and subsequent creditors of Spinks Bros. Gordon v. McIlwain, 82 Ala. 247, 2 South. Rep. 671. In the state of evidence shown by the bill of exceptions, the court was justified in giving the affirmative charge for plaintiffs. This dispenses with consideration of the other rulings of the court. We are not prepared, however, to say there is error in any of them, but, if erroneous, they worked no injury to appellants. Affirmed.

McKINNON v. PIKE COUNTY GUANO CO.

EQUITY JURISDICTION.

A bill in equity, averring that complainant shipped goods to defendant; that defendant was to deliver to complainant as collateral security therefor the notes he took from his customers in payment for the goods; that defendant delivered to complainant certain notes, which were turned over to defendant for collection; that he collected some of them, and failed to pay over to complainant the proceeds thereof; and that defendant 's insolvent; and asking for a receiver, and that the notes in defendant's hands be turned over to him,—states a clear case for equitable interposition.

Appeal from chancery court, Bullock county; JOHN A. FOSTER, Chancellor.

Action by the Pike County Guano Company against Edward T. McKinnon. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The bill in this case was filed by the appellee, the Pike County Guano Company, against the appellant, Edward T. McKinnon, and prayed to have a discovery of the assets in the hands of defendant for the payment of a debt due by him to complainant, and that defendant be required to account for certain sums collected by him on collaterals which he held in trust for complainant. It was further averred in the bill that, under a written contract between complainant and defendant, complainant had shipped to defendant a large quantity of guano and other fertilizers; that by said agreement defendant was to deliver over to complainant as collateral security for the payment of said goods the notes he took from his customers in payment of the fertilizers sold; that, according to the agreement, he had transferred to complainant certain notes as collateral security, and that these notes had been delivered to him for collection, and that he had collected some of said notes, but had failed to pay over the proceeds therefrom to complainant. The bill also averred the insolvency of defendant. Defendant interposed a plea to the bill of complaint, in which he alleged that the said commercial fertilizers were not properly tagged, as required by the statute of this state. The principal part of the contention of the present case was on the issue as made by him in this plea.

Tompkins & Troy and D. S. Bethune, for appellant. Gardner & Wiley, for appellee.

STONE, C. J. During the season of 1887-88 the Pike County Guano Company, a corporation located at Troy, Ala., sold and shipped to McKinnon, in Bullock county, between two and three hundred tons of fertilizers. The disputed question in this case is whether or not the fertilizers, when sold and shipped, had tags attached to the sacks or packages, as required by section 141 of the Code of 1886. Of the quantity sold and shipped, as we understand the testimony, about five-ninths was of the brand known as "Pike County Guano." The residue was made up of four different brands. The weight of the testimony leaves but little room for doubt that a considerable part of the entire bulk of the sale was properly tagged, although some of the witnesses go so far as to state that none of the sacks had tags attached to them when unloaded from the cars. There is great conflict in the testimony,—irreconcilable conflict,—and we must be pardoned for doubting the truth of a good deal of it. Courts, like juries, ought to look, and will look, at attendant facts, and will give more credit to some witnesses than to others. There is no mathematical rule for determining the credibility of human testimony. Henderson was the shipping agent, and testified that he shipped all the guano and other fertilizers which gave rise to this suit. He testifies with great positiveness that every package, when shipped, had the proper tag attached to it. McKinnon and the railroad agent at the depot of delivery testify that none of the Pike County guano was tagged when unloaded at the point of destination. Five witnesses—Lewis, Sellers, Braswell, Brooks, and Boyd—each give testimony more or less corroborative of Henderson's version. Several of them testify to seeing tags on Pike County guano after it had passed from McKinnon's custody. There are two other circumstances tending to corroborate Henderson. McKinnon resold all the fertilizers save a lot retained and used by himself, and we hear of no complaint from his customers that the packages were not properly tagged. The other corroborating circumstance is that during the altercations attending the efforts of the Pike County Guano Company to obtain a settlement from McKinnon we hear of no complaint from him that the fertilizers had been sold to him without proper tags attached. We concur with the chancellor in holding that this line of defense has failed in the proof. The original, written agreement entered into by McKinnon in reference to the notes, accounts, property, etc., received by him in the resale of the fertilizers, made him the agent and trustee thereof for the benefit of the Pike County Guano Company to the extent of the unpaid purchase money he owed the corporation. This, supplemented by his insolvency, makes a clear case for equitable interposition. There was no legal remedy adapted to the merits of the demand, because the company's claim was at most only a right to have the collaterals, then held by McKinnon as agent, placed in the hands of a receiver, and applied to the payment of McKinnon's debts. Affirmed.

JONES v. HAGLER.

BEST AND SECONDARY EVIDENCE—ATTESTATION OF DEED—SALE UNDER TRUST-DEED—SUFFICIENCY OF DEED—PLEADING.

1. Where plaintiff in ejectment claimed title through a sale made by a trustee, and testified that the deed had never been in his possession or under his control, and that he was not the legal custodian of it, it was proper to allow in evidence the original record-book in which the deed was recorded.

2. Under Code, § 1789, which provides that a conveyance of land made by one who can write shall be acknowledged or attested by one witness, who must write his name as a witness, an indorsement on a deed as follows: "I, B., acting as justice of the peace, * * * hereby certify that the above-named person signed this conveyance,"—signed by the justice, was sufficient as an attestation, though not good as an acknowledgment.

3. Where a deed of trust was given in consideration of the beneficiaries' indorsement of notes of the grantor, and authorized sale of the land to indemnify such beneficiaries for payment of any bill or note, but did not require that demand be first made by them for such sale, it was not necessary that they should demand of the trustee that he make sale.

4. Where taking possession of the land by the trustee was not a condition precedent to his right to sell, it was not necessary that he have possession at the time the sale was made.

5. Where the sale was made in pursuance of the power in the trust-deed, it was not necessary for the trustee to recite in his deed the exact date of such sale.

6. Though the trustee's name was not mentioned in the body of his deed, yet it was sufficient where it recited the date of the trust-deed, named the beneficiaries therein, gave a description of the premises, and named the book and page where the trust-deed was recorded, an inspection of which record would have shown that he was the trustee.

7. Though the trust-deed required the sale to be for cash, and a beneficiary was the nominal bidder, and no cash passed, yet, where the grantor in the trust-deed obtained credit for the amount bid in pursuance of the contract of indemnity expressed in such trust-deed, defendant, not being a beneficiary under the deed, could not object that the sale was not for cash.

8. Though such sale was made in 1866, and the deed thereon was not executed until 1878, yet, where defendant was not a party to the sale, and did not show that he had any interest in the matter, his objection that the delay in making the deed was a badge of fraud was not well taken.

9. In the absence of fraud it was no objection that one of the beneficiaries bid off the land and afterwards directed that the deed be made to plaintiff.

10. Where judgment was entered against one of the beneficiaries as indorser for the grantor in the trust-deed, and under execution thereon his property was sold, the record of such judgment and execution and the returns thereon was properly admitted in evidence as tending to show such a breach of the trust-deed as would entitle such beneficiary to the execution of the power of sale for his indemnity.

11. By joining issue on defendant's pleas to the statute of frauds without questioning their sufficiency plaintiff assumed the burden of showing that at such sale he received from the trustee a note or memorandum signed and expressing the consideration, or that the purchase money, or some part thereof, was paid, or that he was put in possession by the trustee; and, having failed to make such proof, the court should have instructed the jury to find for defendant.

12. The benefit of such pleas not being available to defendant, on remandment of the case plaintiff may move the court below for a repleader as to such pleas.

Appeal from circuit court, Tuscaloosa county; S. H. SPROTT, Judge.

Ejectment by Edward I. Hagler against John W. Jones. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

The parties to this cause derive title from the same source,—from David G. Jones. Upon the trial the plaintiff introduced in evidence a deed of trust by said David G. Jones, executed on August 2, 1858, to Moses McGuire as trustee, and John W. Prewitt and John H. Spain as beneficiaries. The consideration of this deed of trust, as expressed therein, was the indorsement by said beneficiaries of certain notes and bills of said Jones, and the further agreement of said beneficiaries to indorse, for the purpose of extending them, certain bills and notes drawn by said Jones on himself, and accepted by him. Among the number there was one bill of exchange for $3,000, payable to R. K. Hargrove. On February 28, 1861, suit was begun by said Hargrove against said Prewitt as indorser for said Jones on said bill of exchange, and judgment was rendered in said suit against Prewitt for the amount of the bill and costs. The execution issued on this judgment was levied on real and personal property of Prewitt, which was sold in part satisfaction, the money arising from the sale being paid to Hargrove. In December, 1866, Moses McGuire, as trustee, sold the land in controversy under the power in the deed of trust to reimburse Prewitt. Prewitt nominally bought the lands at said sale, and directed the auctioneer to have a deed executed to the plaintiff in this suit, Edward I. Hagler. D. G. Jones, the grantor in said deed of trust, was present at said sale, and acquiesced therein. The said D. G. Jones died about the year 1873. The deed was not made by Moses McGuire to the purchaser at said mortgage sale until March 2, 1878, which recited that the sale of said land was made "about or on the 1st day of December, 1866." Upon the plaintiff's offering to introduce in evidence this deed to him from Moses McGuire as trustee, the defendant objected: (1) Because the deed was not acknowledged and attested as provided by law. The only thing which purports to be an acknowledgment is as follows: "I, J. W. Bagwell, acting as justice of the peace in and for said county, hereby certify that the above-named person signed this conveyance;" and is signed by said Bagwell as justice of the peace. The plaintiff introduced said Bagwell as a witness, who testified that said Moses McGuire signed said deed in his presence, and that that which professed to be an acknowledgment of McGuire was made by him, and his signature was attached thereto. The defendant objected to this testimony on the part of Bagwell. The court then overruled the plaintiff's objection to the introduction of said deed on the grounds that it was not properly acknowledged and attested. The defendant then interposed several other objections to the introduction in evidence of said deed, as follows: (2) Because it was shown by said deed that the said sale under the deed of trust had been made at the request of only one of the beneficiaries thereunder. (3) Because it was not shown that said trustee had taken possession of the land upon default being made, and at the time the same was sold. (4) Because it sets forth that the sale under said deed of trust was made on or about the 1st day of December, 1866. (5) Because the name of the grantor was not named in the body of the deed as conveying in the capacity of trustee and otherwise. (6) Because the consideration of the purchase of said property under said deed of trust was not paid in cash. (7) Because said delay in signing the deed was such a badge of fraud as devolved upon the plaintiff the duty to explain the delay before it could be introduced in evidence. The court overruled each one of these separate exceptions. The plaintiff introduced in evidence the record of the circuit court, which showed a judgment and execution, with the returns thereon, in the case of R. K. Hargrove v. John W. Prewitt. The plaintiff further introduced testimony tending to show that the sale under the deed of trust was regular in every respect. The defendant introduced testimony tending to show that D. G. Jones had remained on these lands up to the time of his death, claiming and holding them as his own, and that shortly thereafter a fire raged over the premises, and destroyed the improvements thereon, and from that time the lands "remained out" and unoccupied for a few years. The defendant was the son of said D. G. Jones, and claimed the lands for himself and the other heirs of said Jones; but it was shown by the testimony of the defendant that on several occasions he had, through his agent, cut timber upon said land, and had exercised other acts of ownership over said property. There was no evidence that at the said sale the auctioneer made any note or memorandum of the sale, nor that the purchase money was ever paid, or that the purchaser was ever put in possession of the premises. The evidence on the part of the defendant also showed that Moses McGuire, trustee, when he executed the deed to the plaintiff, was non compos mentis. Upon the introduction of all the evidence the defendant requested the court to give the following written charge: "If the jury believe the evidence, they must find for the defendant." But the court refused to give this charge, and the defendant duly excepted.

Wood & Wood and J. J. Mayfield, for appellant. Foster & Oliver, for appellee.

WALKER, J. The plaintiff claimed title through a sale and conveyance made by Moses McGuire as the trustee in a deed of trust in which David G. Jones was the grantor. To prove the deed of trust the plaintiff offered the original record thereof, as contained in one of the record-books of deeds kept in the office of the probate judge of Tuscaloosa county. Objection was made to this evidence on the grounds that the defendant had made demand on the plaintiff to produce the original of said deed of trust, and that a certified copy should have been offered, instead of the original record. The plaintiff testified, without contradiction, that the original of the deed of trust had never been in his possession or custody or under his control. He was not the legal custodian of the instrument. That being the case, it was not incumbent upon him to produce it or to account for its absence. The instrument could as well be proved by the original record as by a certified copy therefrom. Stevenson v. Moody, 85 Ala. 33, 4 South. Rep. 595; Miller v. Boykin, 70 Ala. 469. The objection to this evidence was properly overruled.

The several grounds of objection to the admission in evidence of the deed by Moses McGuire as trustee to the plaintiff will be considered in detail.

1. The plaintiff did not claim that the statement written upon the deed and signed by the justice of the peace was sufficient as a certificate of acknowledgment. It was relied upon as an attestation, and the justice of the peace was called as a witness to prove the deed. The statement certifies "that the above-named person signed this conveyance." This language fairly imports that the justice of the peace had knowledge of the fact to which he certifies,—that he was a witness to the signing. The execution of a conveyance for the alienation of land, when made by a person who is able to write, must be acknowledged or attested by one witness, who must write his name as a witness. Code 1886, § 1789. A proper attestation may be made by the mere signature of the witness. It is sufficient that the signature appears to be made for the purpose of attesting the execution of the conveyance. It has been decided that a defective acknowledgment may operate as a substitute for the attestation of a witness, and in such case the officer is treated as an attesting witness. Rogers v. Adams, 66 Ala. 600; Sharpe v. Orme, 61 Ala. 263; Carlisle v. Carlisle, 78 Ala. 544. The signature of the justice of the peace to the statement above referred to was sufficient as an attestation, and there was no error in overruling the objection to the introduction of the deed on the ground that it was not properly attested.

2. Objection was made to the introduction of the deed to the plaintiff on the ground that it was shown and provided by the deed of trust that John W. Prewitt and John H. Spain were joint beneficiaries thereunder, and that the deed to the plaintiff shows that the sale under the deed of trust was made at the request of only one of the beneficiaries. By the power of sale contained in the deed of trust the trustee is authorized to sell in the mode prescribed, and to "pay off any of the bills indorsed by them, [Prewitt and Spain,] and pay all and whatever may be necessary to indemnify said John W. and John H., or either of them, and save them harmless in the premises." This language authorizes the execution of the power of sale for the indemnification of either Prewitt or Spain for any loss sustained in consequence of any indorsement made in pursuance of the provisions of the deed of trust. There is no provision that one or both of the beneficiaries shall request the trustee to execute the power of sale. If Prewitt alone had sustained losses in consequence of the indorsements mentioned in the deed of trust, the power of sale could be executed for his benefit alone. The recitals of the deed to the plaintiff do not show a disregard of the terms of the power in the particular specified in the objection.

3. Taking possession of the land by the trustee was not, by the terms of the deed of trust, made a condition precedent to the exercise of the power of sale. The trustee was authorized, but not required, to take possession of the land before making a sale thereof. 2 Jones, Mortg. § 1782; Vaughan v. Powell, (Miss.) 4 South. Rep. 257; Kiley v. Brewster, 44 Ill. 186. The terms of the instrument which was construed in the case of Foster v. Boston, 133 Mass. 143, indicated that the execution of the power in the mode provided made it necessary for the trustee to acquire possession of the property before making a sale. In such a case possession by the trustee is properly regarded as a condition precedent. It does not seem that such a condition could be satisfied by a mere demand for possession, as was intimated in the case of Roarty v. Mitchell, 7 Gray, 243.

4. The deed to the plaintiff recites that the grantor therein, "after giving the notice required by said deed of trust, did, on or about the 1st day of December, 1866, at the court-house in said county, expose to sale," etc. If a sale had been made pursuant to the terms of the power, it was not material for the trustee to recite in his deed the exact date of such sale. After the sale was duly made he could with propriety execute a deed to the purchaser, though he was unable to state therein the exact date of the sale. If the defendant was entitled to require the plaintiff to prove a compliance with the provisions of the power as to the notice of the time and place of sale, on the ground that the recitals in that regard of the deed made by the trustee were not binding on a stranger, (Wood v. Lake, 62 Ala. 489; 1 Devl. Deeds, § 425; 2 Jones, Mortg. §§ 1830, 1895,) the consideration that the burden was on the plaintiff to make such additional proof would not justify the rejection of his deed as a link in his chain of proof.

5. The name of the trustee is not mentioned in the body of his deed; but the recitals thereof furnish the means of clearly identifying Moses McGuire as the grantor. The deed recites: "Whereas, on the second day of August, 1858, David G. Jones executed to me, as trustee for the benefit of John W. Prewitt et al., a deed of trust to the following described lands, to-wit, [here follows a description of the lands;] which deed is recorded in Book 5, page 138, of the records of deeds in the office of the judge of probate of Tuscaloosa county, Alabama." An inspection of the deed of trust, which is thus fully described, discloses that Moses McGuire is the trustee therein, and makes it manifest that he is the grantor in the deed to the plaintiff. This is a sufficient description and identification of the grantor. Madden v. Floyd, 69 Ala. 221.

6. The power in the deed of trust authorized the trustee to sell for cash. The payment of the plaintiff's bid was a matter between him and the beneficiary of the sale, and with which the defendant in this case had no concern. By the arrangement recited in the deed to plaintiff the grantor in the deed of trust obtained the credit and benefit of the amount bid. When this was done, neither he nor any other person who was not a beneficiary under the deed of trust could complain because the payment was not made in cash. Mewburn's Heirs v. Bass, 82 Ala. 622, 2 South. Rep. 520; Cooper v. Hornsby, 71 Ala. 62.

7. It was not incumbent upon the plaintiff, in offering the deed to himself, to explain the delay in its execution. The execution of the deed by the trustee in 1878 shows upon its face his recognition of the sale made by him in 1866, and that the purchaser at that sale had all along been entitled to a conveyance of the land sold. The defendant was not a party to that sale, and in making the objection that the delay was a badge of fraud he did not suggest any fact to show that he had any interest in the matter which would entitle him to complain of the delay. Broughton v. Atchison, 52 Ala. 62. None of the grounds of objection to the introduction of the deed to the plaintiff were well taken.

There was evidence tending to show that at the sale under the power, John W. Prewitt, one of the beneficiaries under the deed of trust, bid off the lands, and afterwards directed the deed to be made to the plaintiff. It often happens that one who bids at an auction sale is acting for another person, or transfers his bid to another. In the absence of fraud, there is no objection to such a transaction. If the ostensible purchaser directs the deed to be made to another, a stranger to the sale cannot complain that the real purchaser did not make his bid in person. 2 Jones, Mortg. § 1896. The motion to exclude the deed because it was not made to the purchaser at the sale by the trustee was properly overruled.

The record of the judgment and executions with the returns thereon in the case of R. K. Hargrove v. John W. Prewitt was admissible as evidence tending to show a breach of the condition of the deed of trust, and that Prewitt was entitled to the execution of the power of sale for his indemnity to the extent of the amount realized in proceedings against him on one of the bills of exchange which he indorsed for David G. Jones, as was recited in the deed of trust.

The plaintiff did not demur to any of the seven pleas interposed by the defendant, but joined issue on all of them. The question of the sufficiency of the sixth and seventh pleas as answers to the complaint was not raised in any manner. By joining issue upon them the plaintiff admitted that each of them stated a defense which, if sustained by the evidence, would defeat the action. A case must be tried on the issues developed by the pleadings. If a false issue is made up in consequence of a neglect to resort to the means provided by law for its elimination, the question thereby presented is one of fact for the determination of the jury, and, if the proof sustains such issue, the party setting it up is entitled to a verdict and judgment on it. Railway Co. v. Propst, 90 Ala. 1, 7 South. Rep. 635; Allison v. Little, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 388; Masterson v. Gibson, 56 Ala. 56. The sixth and seventh pleas are pleas of the statute of frauds. In joining issue thereon the plaintiff assumed the burden of showing facts which avoid the effect of the pleas. He put himself in the attitude of affirming that at the time of the sale by Moses McGuire to him a note or memorandum thereof was made, expressing the consideration in writing, and subscribed by the party to be charged therewith, or by some person thereto by him lawfully authorized in writing; and that the purchase money, or some part thereof, was paid; or that the purchaser was put in possession of the land by the seller. Jonas v. Field, 83 Ala. 445, 3 South. Rep. 893. The provisions of the statute of frauds which were referred to in the pleas were applicable to the sale made by McGuire. The objection that the benefit of those provisions was not available to the defendant (Lewis v. Wells, 50 Ala. 198; Cooper v. Hornsby, 71 Ala. 62; Mewburn's Heirs v. Bass, 82 Ala. 622, 2 South. Rep. 520) could have been raised by demurrers or replications to the pleas. No such objection having been interposed, and the plaintiff having failed to offer any proof that in the sale by McGuire there was a compliance with the statutory requirements referred to in the pleas, he failed to sustain the burden assumed by his joinder of issue thereon; and the result was that on those issues the defendant was entitled to a verdict and judgment. The charge in writing, requested by the defendant, should have been given.

On the remandment of the cause, the plaintiff may move in the court below for a repleader as to pleas presenting false or immaterial issues. Railway Co. v. Propst, 90 Ala. 1, 7 South. Rep. 635; Mudge v. Treat, 57 Ala. 1.

In the foregoing opinion we have considered such questions presented by the rulings of the circuit court on the admission and rejection of evidence as are likely to arise on another trial. Reversed and remanded.

JONES et al. v. BALL.

VENDOR'S LIEN.

In a suit to enforce a vendor's lien, the answer alleged that the consideration named in the deed was a gross price for the land and for certain personal property. The deed did not mention any personalty, and the vendor and one of the vendees testified that none passed, while they were contradicted by the testimony of the other vendee, by certain of his declarations, and by the testimony of a witness who swore to a declaration of the vendor that the transaction involved personalty. Held, that a lien for the price named in the deed would be enforced.

Appeal from circuit court, Crenshaw county; JOHN A. FOSTER, Judge.

Bill in equity by John Ball against R. M. Jones and Ratcliff Ball to enforce a vendor's lien. Decree for complainant. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Gamble & Bricken, for appellants. I. H. Parks, for appellee.

MCCLELLAN, J. The main, if not indeed the only, question in this case is one of fact, namely, whether there was other property than land embraced in the sale by John Ball to Ratcliff Ball and R. M. Jones for the consideration of $1,600, which the bill seeks to charge on the land described therein as purchase money secured by a vendor's lien in complainant's favor. The deed executed by John Ball and his wife, and which is exhibited in the bill, recites the consideration for the land alone as being $1,600. John Ball himself testifies positively that he sold nothing but the land. Ratcliff Ball, one of the defendants, with equal emphasis, testifies that he and Jones bought nothing but the land, and that they agreed to pay 1,600 for the land only. On the other hand, Jones' testimony is that he and Ratcliff purchased, not only the land, but also several items of personal property, which he specifies, for the consideration in gross of $1,600. One other witness swears that he heard John Ball say the personalty was included in the sale. Two or three others testify that Ratcliff Ball and Jones took possession of certain property which was on the place, and to declarations of Jones that it was embraced in the sale. And yet another says that the personalty was embraced in the sale, and that he knows this from having read the written contract of sale, wherein the personalty was specified. But this witness' testimony is utterly deprived of weight by the thoroughly established fact that there was no writing at all, except the deed, which not only does not mention personalty, but goes in preclusion of the idea that anything but realty constituted the consideration for the admitted indebtedness. This was all the evidence. We have, then, the deed; the testimony in interest of John Ball, and the testimony against interest of Ratcliff Ball, that there was no sale of personal property; while, on the other hand, we have the testimony in interest of Jones, certain declarations in interest of Jones, and one witness who deposes to a declaration on the part of John Ball that the transaction involved personal property as well as the land. On this state of case we see no alternative but to affirm the conclusion reached by the chancellor, that defendants have not shown that the $1,600 sought to be charged as a vendor's lien on the land was a price in gross agreed to be paid for the land and for the personalty. It is too clear for discussion that the complainant had no interest whatever in, or connection with, or relation to, the partnership existing between the defendants, and that the cross-bill of Jones exhibited against complainant and the other defendant, which sought a settlement of this partnership, was properly dismissed. Affirmed.

MULLOY v. COOK.

PUBLIC LANDS—CONTRACTS—PUBLIC POLICY.

Where C. makes a homestead entry on public land, pays the entrance fee, and then abandons the entry, but an act of congress permits him to purchase the land at $1.25 per acre, less the entrance fee, a contract whereby M. agrees to furnish the money, and C. agrees to purchase the land and convey it to M., does not violate any statute or the public policy of the federal government.

Appeal from chancery court, Cleburne county; S. K. MCSPADDEN, Chancellor.

Bill in equity by Hiram Mulloy against Duncan Cook to enjoin an action of ejectment and to enforce a contract to convey the land. Decree for respondent. Complainant appeals. Reversed.

The bill averred that on January 23, 1874, the said Duncan Cook entered upon 80 acres of government land, paying the entrance fee therefor, and obtained the receiver's receipt, and that afterwards said Duncan Cook abandoned his homestead entry; that under the provisions of an act of congress the said Cook was allowed to purchase said land at $1.25 per acre, less the amount of the entrance fee; that on September 20, 1888, under an agreement between said Cook and the complainant, by the terms of which said Cook was to purchase the land, taking title in his own name, but was to convey to the complainant the title to said land as soon as he received the patent from the government, the complainant furnished said Cook with the money necessary to purchase the said land from the government; that said Cook used said money in the purchase of said land, and received the certificate and receipt of said purchase from the United States government, which he delivered to the complainant, who thereupon entered into possession of said land; and that complainant afterwards secured a patent to be regularly issued to the said Cook. The bill further avers that the complainant was in quiet possession of the land on December 29, 1889, when the said Cook instituted the action of ejectment to recover possession of said land. The bill then prays to have the statutory action of ejectment enjoined, and that the chancellor decree a trust in said land for the complainant. The defendant demurred to the said bill, on the ground that it seeks to enforce a contract contrary to public policy, and therefore void. Upon the submission of the cause on the demurrer, the chancellor sustained it.

James Savage, for appellant. Kelly & Smith, for appellee.

MCCLELLAN, J. We do not think the present bill is open to the objection urged against it by the demurrers. It cannot be said that the contract sought to be specifically enforced is violative of the public policy of the United States. We know of no statute, nor of any general policy deducible from the statutes of the federal government, which would authorize or admit of a distinction being made in favor or against the right of any citizen to purchase public land. Had nothing been done by the respondent looking to the entry of the land in controversy as a home, the complainant could have purchased it under section 2357 of the Revised Statutes for $1.25 per acre. The effort to homestead it having failed, the land again became public in every sense, and purchasable by the complainant under that section. The government had no interest and no policy to be subserved in securing to the would-be homesteader a prior right to purchase, as against the complainant or any other citizen. No pre-emption or homestead right of the individual or policy of the government is involved at all. The land, once purchased by and patented to either the person who made the entry or to another, may be alienated in all respects as any other real property. Since the purchaser is not charged with any of the duties as to occupancy, cultivation, and the like which would have been imposed upon him as a homesteader, and since the land itself has none of the exemptions from incumbrances and prior personal obligations which would attach to it as a homestead, it is a matter of no consequence to the government or its policy that, even before the purchase, a contract had been entered into on the part of the purchaser to convey it to another upon patent issuing. Every governmental purpose would be equally conserved, whether the purchaser intended, and did in fact continue, to hold the land, or intended to convey, and had made a contract to convey, and did in fact convey, it to another. The only change in existing law effected by section 2 of the act of June 15, 1880, was to allow any purchaser who had made the payment or homestead entry required by Rev. St. § 2290, or any person to whom he had by written instrument attempted to transfer the rights conferred on him by such entry, a credit on the sum otherwise payable in purchase of the land, to the amount paid on the entry. If no such transfer is executed by the entryman, none but he is entitled to this credit, though any other person may purchase, paying the full price. If such instrument has been executed, the nominal transferee alone is entitled to the credit. In either event, the government not being interested in the uses to which the land is devoted, nor in respect of the persons who shall own it, no previous contract to convey it, or subsequent conveyance, whether in consonance with a previous contract or not, can in any degree be said to violate any statute or the public policy of the United States. In the case at bar it may be true that the complainant will ultimately get the benefit of the credit in amount equal to the sum originally paid by the respondent, but that is a matter between the parties to this suit, and having, we conceive, no bearing upon the question of public policy presented by the demurrers. The decree sustaining the demurrers is reversed, and a decree here rendered overruling them. The cause is remanded.

CROFFORD et al. v. VASSAR.

ATTACHMENT—ACTION ON BOND—PLEADING—DAMAGES.

1. Where the complaint, in an action on a bond in attachment sued out for the collection of rent, claims damages of $100, in that plaintiff was put to expense of employing counsel to defend the suit, but does not deny that the rent was due, and fails to show the determinaion of the attachment suit, but does not show what sum was paid or promised for counsel fee, it is insufficient on demurrer.

2. In such action, the allegation that "said attachment was wrongfully, vexatiously, and maliciously sued out, in that no statutory ground existed either for the enforcement of any existing lien or for the purpose of creating a lien," was sufficient to support a recovery of actual damages, but did not authorize vindictive damages.

3. In such action, where the complaint was not for the recovery of exemplary damages, it was error to allow plaintiff's witness to testify that defendant had stated that he "intended to get everything plaintiff made on the plantation that year for nothing."

Appeal from city court of Anniston; B. F. CASSADY, Judge.

Action on an attachment bond by Robert Vassar against H. S. Crofford, as principal, and others, as sureties. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

The complaint as amended, after stating the claim of the plaintiff, assigned the following breaches: (1) Said attachment was wrongfully and vexatiously sued out, and without the existence of any of the statutory grounds for the issuance thereof, as the facts alleged in said affidavit for said attachment were entirely untrue. (2) Said attachment was wrongfully, vexatiously, and maliciously sued out, in that no statutory grounds existed either for the enforcement of any existing lien, or for the purpose of creating a lien, and the alleged facts in the affidavit for said attachment are untrue. (3) Said attachment was wrongfully, vexatiously, and maliciously sued out, in that the facts alleged in the affidavit for said attachment, that the defendant in attachment (plaintiff in this suit) had removed a part of the crop grown on the rented premises without the consent of the landlord, and without paying the rent, shows that it was a special attachment, or one issued for the enforcement of a landlord's lien for rent, and was levied in part on certain cotton, the property of the plaintiff in this suit, on which the landlord, the plaintiff in attachment, had no lien whatever. (4) The plaintiff claims special damages in the sum of $100, in that by the levy of said attachment he was put to the expense of employing counsel to defend him in said suit. (5) The plaintiff claims further special damages because said attachment was wrongfully levied on plaintiff's cotton, on which defendant had no lien, and which was therefore not subject to the attachment. The defendants demurred to the amended complaint, and assigned as grounds therefor: (1) That said complaint fails to allege whether the attachment was sued out to enforce a landlord's lien for rent or for advances, and in assigning the first breach of the bond fails to set out that there was no statutory ground for the issuance of an attachment to enforce a landlord's lien for rent, and fails to state that plaintiff was not a tenant of the defendant, and fails to set out the contents of the affidavit, or show wherein the facts alleged are untrue; and the allegations that the facts alleged in the affidavit are untrue is too vague, uncertain, and indefinite. (2) The complaint fails to allege whether the attachment was sued out to enforce a lien or to create a lien, and fails to state the allegations of the affidavit which are alleged to be untrue. (3) In assigning the third breach of the bond, the complaint is insufficient, in that it purports to set out the facts in part as shown by the affidavit, but fails to deny the truth of the statements of the affidavit, and simply avers that the attachment writ was levied upon cotton upon which the landlord had no lien. (4) That said amended complaint fails to allege what would be a reasonable attorney's fee for defending the attachment suit, or whether there was a contract for a certain sum, or whether the plaintiff paid or agreed to pay a reasonable fee. (5) That said complaint, as amended, sets out two separate and distinct causes of action, one for the wrongful issuance of the attachment, and the other for a tortious act of the sheriff. (6) That part of the complaint which claims damages specially for the wrongful levy of the attachment fails to aver that the attachment was levied on property not subject to an attachment for rent, and that it was levied upon property not grown on the rented premises. The court, upon considering the demurrers, sustained the 5th ground, and overruled the 2d, 3d, 4th, and 6th grounds of demurrer. Issue was then joined on the plea of the general issue, and that the facts which were set out in the affidavit for said attachment were untrue. The rulings upon the evidence to which exception was taken are sufficiently stated in the opinion. The cause was tried without the intervention of a jury. Upon the hearing of all the evidence, the court rendered judgment for the plaintiff, assessing his damages at $75.

E. H. Hunna, for appellants. Matthews & Whiteside, for appellee.

STONE, C. J. The present suit was for wrongfully and vexatiously suing out an attachment for rent. Code 1886, § 3060 et seq. The suit is on the attachment bond. We will first determine the pleadings and issues on which the suit was tried. There was a demurrer to the original complaint, which was sustained to such extent that it appears to have been abandoned. An amended complaint was then filed, setting forth the substance of the attachment bond, and assigning breaches, some five in number. The fifth breach assigned was and is that the attachment was levied on cotton not grown on the rented premises. This assignment of breach was abandoned, and rightly so. Bank v. Jeffries, 73 Ala. 183; Jackson v. Smith, 75 Ala. 97. The sureties on the attachment bond were not liable for such abuse of the process, if it was perpetrated. It was not within the purview of their bond. The defendants demurred to the amended complaint, assigning six grounds of demurrer. The complaint was then amended a second time, and the court overruled the first four grounds of demurrer, and sustained the fifth. We need not consider the sixth ground, for the plaintiff, as we have seen, struck out the assignment of breach, against which that was leveled. The plaintiff sought to recover damages for attorney's fees incurred and expended in defending the attachment suit. The assignment of breach in reference to this claim is in the following language: "Plaintiff claims special damages in the sum of $100, in that by the said attachment he was put to the expense of employing counsel to defend said attachment suit." This was demurred to, being the fourth ground of the demurrer to the amended complaint. The court overruled this ground of demurrer, and the claim therein set forth became one of the issues on the trial. It is nowhere denied in the amended complaint that Vassar owed the rent for which the attachment was sued out, nor is it anywhere shown that the attachment suit has been determined, or, if determined, what that determination was. Nor does the assignment of breach show or state any sum as paid or promised for defending the attachment suit. Assignment of breach No. 4 is scarcely sufficient. Possibly it should have stated some amount incurred or promised as attorney's fee for defending the suit. Flournoy v. Lyon, 70 Ala. 308. Each of the assigned breaches 1 and 2 avers that none of the statutory grounds for attachment existed. This was a sufficient assignment of breach to authorize a recovery of actual damages. The demurrers to these assignments were rightly overruled. McLane v. McTighe, 89 Ala. 411, 8 South. Rep. 70. The averments of breach in the several assignments 1 and 2 are as follows: (1) "Said attachment was wrongfully and vexatiously sued out, and so sued out without the existence of any of the statutory grounds for the issuance of such attachment." (2) "Said attachment was wrongfully, vexatiously, and maliciously sued out, in that no statutory grounds existed either for the enforcement of any existing lien or for the purpose of creating a lien." Now, each of these breaches, properly interpreted, simply negatives the existence of a cause for suing out the attachment. In Durr v. Jackson, 59 Ala. 203, it is said an action like the present one, "so far as the nature and character of the evidence necessary to sustain it is to be considered, bears a closer resemblance to an action for malicious prosecution than to any other action at common law." In Bank v. Jeffries, 73 Ala. 183, speaking of the different counts of the complaint in that case, we said that, "as claims for exemplary damages, they are further faulty in not averring that the attachment was sued out without probable cause for believing the alleged ground to be true." McLane v. McTighe, 89 Ala. 411, 8 South. Rep. 70. The first and second assignments of breach, though sufficient for the recovery of actual damages, did not authorize the recovery of vindictive damages. The third ground of demurrer ought to have been sustained. Bank v. Jeffries, supra. It would seem, however, that this error was cured by the act of plaintiff in "striking out claim for special damages on account of wrongful levy." The witness Brownlee, against objection of defendants, was permitted to testify "that in the spring, and before the crop was planted, he heard Crofford say, after some difficulty between Crofford and Vassar, that he intended to get everything that Vassar made on the plantation that year for nothing." We think, under appropriate pleadings, this testimony would be competent on the inquiry of exemplary damages. We have shown, however, that the complaint does not claim such damages. The city court erred in receiving this evidence. There was no error in allowing proof that the cotton was damaged by being allowed to remain in the field. If true, that was actual damage resulting from the attachment and its levy.

Reversed and remanded.

ATTACHMENT—LEVY BY CONSTABLE—INDORSEMENT OF WRIT.

Under Code, § 2956, which provides: "When an attachment is issued by a justice of the peace, if the amount of the debt does not exceed the penalty of the constable's bond, the justice may, by indorsement on the process, direct it to be executed by the constable of the precinct," etc., a writ addressed to the sheriff "or constable of beat 8," etc., was sufficiently indorsed by the justice, and the levy by such constable was valid.

Appeal from circuit court, Henry county; J. M. CARMICHAEL, Judge.

Action in attachment by Leinkauff & Strauss against O. W. Pearce. Plaintiffs had judgment and sale of the property. From an order to turn the proceeds of the sale over to plaintiffs, J. W. Drewry, as intervener, appeals. Reversed

On December 15, 1890, J. W. Drewry sued out an attachment before a justice of the peace in Henry county against one O. W. Pearce. The said writ of attachment was headed, "to any sheriff or constable of beat 3," and, under the direction of said writ, the constable of beat 3 of said county levied the said attachment upon the personal property of said Pearce. This writ was returned to the circuit court of Henry county, to which court it was made returnable by the justice of the peace who issued it. On December 15, 1890, but subsequent to the issuance of Drewry's attachment, Leinkauff & Strauss also sued out an attachment against said Pearce, which was levied on the same property the said Drewry attachment was levied upon. The property levied upon was sold by the sheriff, and the proceeds of said sale were held in his hands for distribution. On February 25, 1891, said Leinkauff & Strauss spread a motion upon the motion docket of Henry county to have the court issue an order requiring the sheriff to pay over to them, as plaintiffs in the case of Leinkauff & Strauss against O. W. Pearce, the proceeds from the sale of the personal property levied upon and sold under the attachment. In support of said motion the said plaintiffs, Leinkauff & Strauss, read in evidence the paper in their said attachment suit against said Pearce, showing the affidavit and bond for attachment, and the issuance and levy of the writ upon the goods of the defendant, and the record of the judgment recovered by them against said Pearce. The said Drewry introduced in evidence the papers in his attachment suit against the defendant Pearce, which showed the facts as stated above. Upon the consideration of the motion and the evidence, the court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, Leinkauff & Strauss, and said J. W. Drewry duly excepted to said judgment, and on this appeal assigns said ruling as error.

G. L. Comer, for appellant.

MCCLELLAN, J. The Code of 1876 (section 3279) provided that a constable might, by the direction of a justice issuing an attachment returnable to the circuit court, execute the writ, when the amount involved was not in excess of the constable's bond, upon an affidavit of necessity therefor being made by or on behalf of the plaintiff. This section was amended by the act of January 22, 1885, (Acts 1884–85, p. 95,) so as to authorize the justice to have such attachment levied by a constable without the affidavit of necessity. In the codification of 1886 this statute was again changed, so as to provide that in such case the justice "may, by indorsement on the process, direct it to be executed by the constable of the precinct, who shall return the same to the court in which it is returnable." Code, § 2956. It seems clear that the only purpose of this last amendment was to afford a more certain and definite method of proof of the fact, essential to the constable's authority, that the justice had directed the levy to be made by the constable. We take it that no set phrase or form of words, no particular expression of the direction to the exclusion of all others, is essential to constitute the statutory indorsement. Any writing signed by the justice, we apprehend, which clearly indicates the intent of the justice to have the writ executed by the constable, and evidences that he so directs, will fill the statutory requirement. Nor do we conceive it to be material on what particular part of the paper the written direction is inscribed. Like indorsements of bills and notes, it may as well be on the face of the writ as upon the back of it. In either case it is an "indorsement on the process." The process issued at the suit of the appellant here is directed to any sheriff of the state of Alabama, or to the constable of beat 3, Henry county, and commands the officers to whom it is so directed to levy the same upon the property of the defendant in attachment. It is signed by the justice. Now, the only proper direction of the writ was, "To any sheriff of the state of Alabama." Code, § 2941. The addition to this direction of the words, "or constable of beat 3" of said county, was unauthorized, so far as constituting a part of the address of the process, and in that connection may be considered as surplusage. But still these words are on the paper; they are signed by the justice; they import a command to the constable to levy the attachment; and they, in our opinion, applying to the statute the rule of liberal construction enjoined upon us by section 2998 of the Code, amount to the indorsement by the justice of the direction to the constable to execute the process required by section 2956 of the Code. It follows that, in our view of the law, the levy of appellant's attachment was a valid levy, and that the circuit court erred in directing the sheriff to pay over the proceeds of the property levied upon to the plaintiffs in a junior attachment, on the theory of its invalidity. Reversed and remanded.

CHANDLER v. VANDEGRIFT SHOE CO.

SHERIFF—FAILURE TO PAY MONEYS COLLECTED—SUMMARY JUDGMENT.

1. A constable, under a judgment recovered before a justice of the peace, levied execution on personal property subject to two attachments in the hands of a sheriff. The constable did not take possession of the property, the sheriff agreeing that the execution held by the constable should be third in point of levy. The property was sold for more than enough to pay the three claims, but the sheriff levied other attachments from the circuit court thereon. Held, that the court had no authority by statute, on motion of the owner of the judgment recovered before the justice, to order the sheriff to pay over the amount of such judgment.

2. Independently of the statutes, such order was improperly made, as the motion was not made in any cause pending in court.

Appeal from circuit court, Etowah county; JOHN B. TALLY, Judge.

Application by the Francis Vandegrift Shoe Company for an order compelling William Chandler, sheriff, to pay over certain moneys. Granted. William Chandler appeals. Reversed.

Abercrombie, Bilbro & Whatley, for appellant. James L. Tanner, for appellee.

WALKER, J. An execution was issued on a judgment recovered by the appellee before a justice of the peace against Gamble & Bro., and was placed in the hands of a constable, who made a return thereon stating that it had been levied on certain personal property, subject to two attachments in the hands of the sheriff. The constable did not take possession of the property claimed to have been levied on, but it was retained by the sheriff, and was sold by him for more than enough to pay off both the prior attachment claims and the judgment of the justice of the peace. The sheriff agreed with the constable that the execution held by him should be third in point of levy; but thereafter, on the same day, the sheriff levied other writs of attachment from the circuit court upon the same property. Appellee entered a motion in the circuit court against the sheriff alone for an order to require him to pay over the amount of the judgment of the justice of the peace, which, including the costs, was more than $100. The circuit court made the order moved for, notwithstanding the objections interposed by the defendant. The statutes authorize the circuit court to render summary judgments against a sheriff for certain specified defaults. Code 1886, §§ 3095–3113. Justices of the peace may also, on motion, render judgments, not exceeding $100, against a sheriff for certain like defaults. Id. §§ 3325–3329. These summary remedies are applicable only in the particular cases specified by the statutes, are not to be extended by construction, are grantable only in strict conformity to the statute, and the record must disclose every fact necessary to entitle the party to such remedy, and that it has been pursued according to the statute. 2 Brick. Dig. p. 464, §§ 1, 6; 3 Brick. Dig. 751; Warwick v. Brooks, 70 Ala. 412. There is no statutory authority for a summary judgment against the sheriff in a case like this one. The statutes above referred to authorize such judgments against sheriffs for certain acts of negligence or misfeasance in failing to do what is required of them by process coming to their hands. They are intended to afford prompt redress for certain delinquences in the discharge of particular ministerial functions. In each of the cases mentioned by the statutes the default authorizing a summary judgment consists in a failure to perform a duty imposed by process the execution of which has been intrusted to the officer proceeded against. Those statutes do not extend to the case of a breach of duty in regard to process in the hands of another officer. No case was made for a statutory summary judgment.

Nor did the court have authority, independent of statute, to entertain or grant such a motion. The application was not addressed to the inherent power of the court to control its own process, for the execution under which the money was claimed was issued, not from the circuit court, but by a justice of the peace. The motion was not made in any cause pending in the circuit court. There is no authority to proceed on such a state of facts by a motion against the sheriff. If the facts alleged give a cause of action in favor of the appellee against the sheriff, it should be asserted by suit in some regularly authorized mode. Furthermore, the other parties interested in the disposition of the money realized by the sheriff from the sale of the property levied on by him were not in any way made parties to the motion. In their absence, the matter sought to be presented could not be finally disposed of. Gusdorf v. Ikelheimer, 75 Ala. 148; Henderson v. Richardson, 5 Ala. 349. The circuit court was without jurisdiction to entertain the motion, and the defendant's objection on that ground should have been sustained. It is not decided that the constable could make a valid levy on goods, the possession of which was retained by the sheriff, or that what was done amounted to a levy, or that the agreement made by the sheriff was binding on him. If those questions shall be presented in a proper manner, the following authorities may be consulted: 1 Freem. Ex'ns, (2d Ed.) § 135; 2 Freem. Ex'ns, § 267; 7 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 126; Townsend v. Corning, 40 Ohio St. 335; Penland v. Leatherwood, (N. C.) 8 S. E. Rep. 284; Goode v. Longmire, 35 Ala. 668; Abrams v. Johnson, 65 Ala. 466; Ex parte Tilman, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 527. The judgment is reversed, and the motion is hereby dismissed in this court, at the cost of the appellee.

HANSON v. TODD.

TENDER—PAYMENT INTO COURT—LIABILITY FOR COSTS.

Where plaintiff elects to take and receives money paid into court by defendant on a plea of tender, judgment should be rendered against plaintiff for costs.

Appeal from city court of Anniston; B. F. CASSADY, Judge.

Action by George R. Todd against Fred Hanson for money. From the overruling of his motion to dismiss the suit at plaintiff's costs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Kelly & Smith and McLeod & Dunstall, for appellant. Blackwell & Keith, for appellee.

CLOPTON, J. The suit is for money due plaintiff for materials furnished and labor done in repairing the dwelling-house of defendant and an outhouse, and erecting a fence around his lot. The only disputed question of fact is the amount due. In answer to the suit, which was commenced August 18, 1890, defendant filed a plea of tender of the amount claimed by him to be due, accompanied by the delivery of the money into court. Plaintiff, without demurring to the plea, or taking issue thereon, received, February 2, 1891, the money from the clerk, under the order of the court, and struck from the complaint the amount so received. Thereupon defendant moved to dismiss the suit at the cost of plaintiff, which said motion was overruled. What is the legal consequence, when the plaintiff elects to take, and receives, the money brought into court upon a plea of tender before suit commenced? is the controlling question presented by the record, and the only one necessary to be considered. As a general rule, a debtor has no right to insist that his creditor shall, by the reception of the amount tendered, be precluded from claiming that a greater sum is due, and suing to recover the same. A tender on such conditions that its acceptance would constitute or clearly imply an admission by the creditor that it was in full of his claim is invalid, and may be refused. The only effect of a tender refused, if pleaded, and the truth of the plea established, is to stop the interest, and exempt the defendant from the costs of a subsequent suit. While a mere tender, though of the whole amount due, when unaccepted, does not operate to extinguish or satisfy the claim, yet, when made in full of the amount due, and accepted without protest as to its sufficiency, the debt becomes extinguished. The creditor may reject a tender on condition that he receive it in full of his claim, but if he accepts it he is bound by the condition, and will not be allowed to keep the money and repudiate the condition. Miller v. Holden, 18 Vt. 337. A tender, if accepted, is accepted as made. The statute (section 2685, Code) requiring a plea of the tender of money to be accompanied by a delivery of the money to the clerk of the court is declaratory of the general rule. A plea of tender, if in proper form, contains substantially the averment that the sum tendered and brought into court is the entire amount due plaintiff. The plea is in bar of, and, if proved, defeats, any recovery. Bringing the money into court on such plea has all the effect of a tender on condition that the plaintiff receive the amount in full satisfaction of his claim. It is disembarrassed of the principle that a tender cannot be made in such manner that the reception of the money satisfies the creditor's demand. The object of the statute in requiring a plea of tender to be accompanied by a delivery of the money to the clerk of the court is that it shall be placed in the custody of the court, so that it may be paid to plaintiff whenever willing to accept it, and put an end to the litigation, or may be awarded to the party to whom it is ascertained to belong rightfully. Frank v. Pickens, 69 Ala. 369. Though the money is produced and placed in the custody of the court, it remains the property of the defendant, until either the plaintiff accepts it or the truth of the plea is established. In either event the court may order it paid to the plaintiff. Foster v. Napier, 74 Ala. 393. So, also, where the plaintiff voluntarily accepts the money paid into court, without contesting the sufficiency or truth of the plea, it thereby becomes his property; but its acceptance is upon the terms of the plea,—that is, in full satisfaction and extinguishment of his claim. When the benefit of the tender is claimed in court, the plaintiff may elect to receive it, and put an end to the litigation; or he may take issue on the plea, and contest the fact, validity, and sufficiency of the tender. The voluntary reception of the money by plaintiff is tantamount to a confession or admission of the truth of the plea, equivalent to an acceptance of the money in satisfaction of his entire demand. He cannot afterwards say that it was accepted only as a payment pro tanto. Under the common-law rule, if the plaintiff take the money which has been brought into court on a plea of tender before suit, the proper judgment is eat inde sine die. 9 Bac. Abr. 339. The same result logically follows when the plaintiff withdraws the money brought into court under the statute. In such case, if the plaintiff elects to take the money, the proper practice is for the court to order it paid to him, and render judgment against him for costs. Haeussler v. Duross, 14 Mo. App. 103; Monroe v. Chaldeck, 78 Ill. 429. The motion of defendant should have been granted. We have not considered whether the proof shows a valid tender, as no such question is raised by the record. Reversed, and judgment rendered dismissing the suit at the costs of plaintiff.

CAPITAL CITY INS. CO. v. CALDWELL et al.

FIRE INSURANCE—TITLE TO PREMISES—AUTHORITY OF AGENT—EVIDENCE—NOTICE AND PROOF OF LOSS—WAIVER—FIXTURES.

1. Where an applicant for insurance represented that he owned the premises in fee, his recovery will not be defeated by proof that he has no written evidence of title, since an equitable title is a sufficient stimulus to the preservation of the property.

2. A finding by the jury that the insurance was effected by a duly authorized agent of the insurer will not be disturbed, where there was evidence tending to show his agency and the insurer's ratification of the policy.

3. Evidence of an agent's acts in receiving and forwarding an application for insurance was admissible to show his authority.

4. Objections to the timeliness and sufficiency of the notice and proof of loss were waived, where they were not raised by an adjuster, who visited the premises and made and submitted an estimate of the cost of rebuilding.

5. Counters and shelves were included in an application for insurance on a store-house, if they could not be removed without injuring the building, which was a question for the jury.

Appeal from circuit court, Madison county; H. C. SPEAKE, Judge.

Action on a policy of fire insurance by Caldwell Bros. against the Capital City Insurance Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lawrence Cooper, for appellant. Humes, Walker & Sheffey, for appellees.

STONE, C. J. All men know that, in cities and towns, business houses generally, and residences frequently, are constructed in such close proximity that the loss of one by fire endangers others. It is on this account that fire insurance companies, in placing their risks, take into the estimate what are called the "exposures," and regulate the premiums they charge for insurance in reference thereto. So, if the building proposed to be insured be very valuable, and the sum to be insured be large, it is not customary to place the entire risk in one company, but in several. This because, if loss is suffered, (and losses will be suffered,) the burden will be distributed among many companies, and not left entirely to one, which it might crush. And when many buildings are so nearly connected, one with the others, as that the burning of one of them would be likely to set fire to the others, it is neither customary, nor in accordance with business principles, to insure them all in one company. And this, at least, is but carrying into practical operation the economic philosophy of insurance,—the helpful participation and aid of the many in sharing the loss which casualty casts on one. A loss of $10,000 might bankrupt one trader, while, if it were distributed among a hundred or more, it would scarcely be felt. In theory, all the premium payers contribute their several contingents, which collectively make up the sum to be paid. This is the rationale of insurance. The Home Protection Insurance Company had its business office in Huntsville, Ala. The Capital City Insurance Company had its habitation in Montgomery, Ala. The former was the Huntsville agent of the latter. This is not uncommon. It furnishes to insurance companies the opportunity, when large insurance is sought, or when application is made for insurance of two or more buildings, or their contents, which are situated in one block, or in dangerous proximity to each other, to distribute the risk, and thus escape an individual heavy loss, which, if it fell on one company, might be very disastrous to its business aims. The foregoing reflections are common knowledge. We have given expression to them because, in our opinion, they shed light on several questions which the record before us presents for our decision. They tend to explain why it was that the store-house, the subject of insurance in this case, was insured in the Capital City Insurance Company, and why it was that the agent of the Home Protection Company was the agent or person through whom the insurance was obtained. The Home Protection Insurance Company, being a corporation, could not act as the agent of the Capital City Company, otherwise than through its officers or agents. Corporations cannot act in any other way. Caldwell Bros. were merchants, having their place of business in Scottsboro, Ala., not far from Huntsville. Stuart, a resident of Scottsboro, was the agent at that place of the Home Protection Insurance Company. The Capital City Company had no agent at that place. The Home Protection was the Capital City's agent at Huntsville. Caldwell Bros. had obtained insurance on their stock of merchandise, and they made application to Stuart for insurance on the store-house. We have no doubt that the preparation of the written application was largely participated in by him. Such is the usual custom. The merchandise, insured in the Home Protection, being in the store-house on which the insurance was sought, the burning of either would be apt to involve the destruction of the other. Hence the reasonable desire that the two risks should be assumed by different companies, in order that, if loss ensued, it should not fall entirely on one company. We think we are in safe bounds when we suppose that, when Caldwell Bros. applied to Stuart for insurance on the store-house, the latter preferred the risk should be assumed by the Capital City Company, rather than that the double loss should fall on one company, in case of its destruction by fire, and that it was at his instance the policy was taken in the Capital City Company. The circumstances of this case furnish ample evidence from which the jury could infer that Stuart was the authorized agent of the Capital City Insurance Company in receiving and forwarding the application. And, if there were doubt of this, the conduct of the Capital City, through its agents, after the fire, furnishes circumstances tending to show a ratification of the issue of the policy in this case. These, however, were questions for the jury. There was no error in receiving testimony of Stuart's agency in receiving and forwarding the application for insurance in this case, nor of any other act done by him, bearing on the merits of the present controversy.

When the application was made for insurance in this case, the general questions were propounded, and answered by one of the Caldwell Bros. One question propounded was, "Have you fee-simple title?" The answer was, "Yes." One clause of the application is in the following language: "Said answers are considered the basis on which insurance is to be effected, and the same is understood as incorporated in, and forming a part and parcel of, the policy, as well as the warranty of this applicant." A question was raised on the trial as to the title held by the Caldwell Bros. in the lot on which the store-house stood, and as to the manner of proving that title. The complaint filed by plaintiffs consists of a single count, which is a substantial copy of form 13 of the Code, p. 792. The case was tried on issues raised by four pleas. The first plea is a general denial of the averments of the complaint. The others are special pleas, but neither of them specially raises the question of title. One of the plaintiffs, while on the witness stand, was asked as to the ownership of and title to the lot on which the store-house stood. He testified that the building belonged to himself and brother,—Caldwell Bros. In the cross-examination the following questions were asked and answers given: "Question. You and your brother owned it? [this store-house.] Answer. Yes; Snodgrass and I built it, and then my brother took his place. Q. Did you do it in writing? A. No. Q. From whom did you buy the lot? A. A man named Hugh Bynum. Q. Did he make you and Snodgrass a deed for it? A. I don't remember. I gave him a horse for the lot. Snodgrass sold his interest to my brother George. Q. Was that contract in writing between Snodgrass and G. B. Caldwell? A. I am not certain. I think it was. Q. Have you the paper with you? A. No. Q. Where is it? A. I reckon it is at home, or destroyed. Q. What is your best recollection about it? A. I know that, when we traded for the accounts, there was a written contract between Snodgrass and myself, but, as to the lot, I don't remember whether there was or not. Q. If there was any deed made, you do not know it? A. So far as the house and lot were concerned, I could not say whether there was a scratch of the pen." The foregoing is substantially all the evidence bearing on the question of ownership in or title to the lot on which the store-house stood. The defendant corporation asked charges based on the question of title. One of them is in the following language: "It is not shown in this case that the plaintiffs had the fee-simple title to said property so insured, and for this reason they cannot recover in this case, and the verdict of the jury must be for the defendant." There was an exception reserved to the refusal to give this charge. There had also been objection and exception to Caldwell's testimony, "that the building belonged to himself and brother."

In a suit at law founded directly on land ownership, nothing less than what the law calls a legal title will sustain the action. Either a paper title, 10 years' adverse enjoyment, or something equivalent must be shown. But this suit does not bring the title to the property directly in issue. It is not necessary that the complaint shall aver a title. That question comes up collaterally and defensively. Ownership is a material factor in assuming insurance risk on improved real estate, not because the evidence of the ownership is considered. The extent of the ownership is the important element of inquiry. This, because the law, voicing common experience, presumes that the absolute owner of property will be more watchful of its preservation than would a mere tenant, or one owning only a partial interest. And this watchfulness would be scaled, not by the form of the title, but by the extent of ownership. One owning a perfect equity in improved real estate would feel the same solicitude in preserving it as he would feel if he held the legal fee. In Insurance Co. v. Bowdre, 67 Miss. 620, 7 South. Rep. 596, the defense attempted was the same as that relied on in this case. True, there was some writing in that case, but it fell short of creating an estate in fee-simple. The court said: "What is meant by the words 'absolute fee-simple title,' in this connection? It can only mean that the assured did not have a limited interest in the property, but that he claimed and held under a deed of conveyance, or other evidence of title, purporting to invest them with an estate in fee-simple. It can only mean that the assured held under a paper title conferring on them this sort of estate, as contradistinguished from any limited and inferior one. The reason for this distinction is obvious. The insurer will not deal with, or take the great risk of indemnifying against loss and damage, a mere tenant, leaseholder, or other person claiming and having only some qualified interest in the property; but this contract for indemnity will be made only with the person having the title,—the beneficial owner; the person having the absolute, i. e., the vested, as opposed to the contingent or conditional, title."

True, in the case from which we have quoted, there was some sort of paper title, but it did not convey the fee. It did not come up to the letter of the representation made in the application. It would not have supported an action of ejectment for the property. But we cannot suppose that the court rested, or intended to rest, its judgment on the fact that there was a paper. The true ground of the decision is expressed in the declaration by the court that "it [the assertion that the assured had a fee-simple title] can only mean that the assured did not have a limited interest in the property." We fully approve the following language of the Mississippi court, found in the opinion from which we have been extracting: "By the insertion of those words [fee-simple title] in the condition of its policies, can it be successfully maintained that the insurance company meant that every loss occurring under its policies, in which the assured should be unable to show a title indefeasible and good against the world,—a title free from every defect, real or seeming, and on which not the smallest cloud rested,—should be borne by the assured? To tolerate such an opinion would be equivalent to holding that the company had deliberately set a trap to ensnare the simple-minded and unwary. * * * We cannot believe that any honestly directed and fair-dealing company will deliberately undertake the management of its business on such basis." In the case before us we cannot know what the true state of the title was. The pleadings had given no notice that any question would be raised on the title to the lot on which the store-house stood. The main issue raised by the pleadings was whether the store-house had been destroyed by fire, in such manner as to fix a liability on the insurance company therefor. As we have said, the extent of ownership held by the assured in the building was the material inquiry, because such interest stimulates solicitude and watchfulness in its preservation. The interest, not the evidence of it, is the stimulus. We find no error in the rulings of the court on the question of the ownership of the property, or the testimony by which it was established.

Questions were raised on the sufficiency of the proofs of loss. We are not informed precisely what the proofs were. After they were furnished, the adjuster visited the premises, and made and submitted an estimate of the cost of rebuilding. It is not pretended that, either at that time or before, he made any objection for the want of timely notice of the loss, or that he complained of the insufficiency of the preliminary proofs, except on a single ground, which we think was untenable. The main objection he urged, when he visited the place, had reference to the counters and shelving, to be considered further on. This, under all the authorities, must be regarded as a waiver alike of notice of loss and of the insufficiency of the preliminary proofs. Insurance Co. v. Feirath, 77 Ala. 194; Badger v. Insurance Co., 49 Wis. 389, 5 N. W. Rep. 845; 7 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1054; 11 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 341; Insurance Co. v. Oates, 86 Ala. 558, 568, 569, 6 South. Rep. 83; Insurance Co. v. Allen, 80 Ala. 571, 1 South. Rep. 202.

The claim for the counters and shelving, testified to have been burned with the building, presents the only remaining question we need consider. The testimony is that they were framed and built with the building, and were not movable fixtures. They were not named separately, and were not insured, unless they constituted a part of the store-house. The primary meaning of the word "fixture" is "that which is fixed or attached to something as a permanent appendage." In law it takes a wider range. Anything fixed or attached to a building, and used in connection with it, is a fixture, whether it be a permanent appendage or not. Hence, in legal jurisprudence, there are movable fixtures and immovable fixtures. Whenever the appendage is of such a nature that it is not part and parcel of the building, but may be removed without injury to the building, then it is a movable fixture, and is a chattel. It is no part of the realty, and does not pass with a conveyance of the freehold. If, however, it be so connected with the building as that it cannot be severed from it without injury to the building,—a disturbance of its rounded completeness,—then it is part of the realty, and it passes with the conveyance of the soil. Of course these principles apply only when there is no agreement of parties varying these legal intendments. 8 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 43, 61; Rap. & L. Law Dict.; O'Brien v. Kusterer, 27 Mich. 289; Tillman v. De Lacy, 80 Ala. 103, and authorities cited. It is manifest that in this case, if the only testimony on the question be believed, a conveyance of the freehold would have carried with it the counters and shelves. The insurance company had a printed form of application for insurance. The one made and used in this case has been sent up for our inspection. It contains many questions to applicants, so framed as to suit the various kinds of property, of which insurance against loss by fire is sought and obtained. The applicant is required to answer such of the questions as are applicable to the insurance risk he seeks. In this instance the applicants sought insurance on a store building, which they valued at $2,300. The insurance obtained was $1,500. This is the only item of property to which any answer was made, although the form contained a blank for "counters, shelves, and drawers." Neither the policy, nor the conditions annexed to it, make any reference to these fixtures; but a pen-dash indicates that that question, together with many others, was regarded as immaterial. We hold the proper inquiry for the jury was whether the counters and shelves were movable or immovable fixtures. If the former, they were not insured; if the latter, they were part of the store-house, and were covered by the policy. We need not apply these principles to the charge given nor to the various charges refused. In none of its rulings did the circuit court err. Affirmed.

CROMWELL v. HORTON.

INTERESTED WITNESS—TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEDENT—OBJECTION TO EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

1. Under Code 1886, § 2765, providing that "there must be no exclusion of any witness because he is a party, or interested in the issue tried, except that neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other as to any * * * statement by any deceased person whose estate is interested in the result," a trustee, under testatrix's will, of property, part of which is in the hands of a firm of which he is a member, who is individually indebted to testatrix's estate, is competent, in an action to which he is not a party, for rent due said estate, to testify to testatrix's statements, since he is not "interested in the issue."

2. An objection to the exclusion of such evidence was properly based upon its insufficiency to show the witness' interest.

Appeal from circuit court, Shelby county; LE ROY F. BOX, Judge.

Action by John T. Cromwell, executor, against Scott Horton to recover arrears of rent due the estate of his testatrix, Mary P. Roper. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. P. Longhorn, for appellant. W. B. Browne and Peters, Wilson & Lyman, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This suit was brought to recover the amount alleged to be due as rent from the defendant as a tenant of the plaintiff's testatrix, Mrs. Mary P. Roper, deceased. The defendant denied that the land in question belonged to Mrs. Roper's estate, and alleged that he had never contracted to pay rent therefor to her or to the plaintiff as her personal representative. J. D. Mason, a witness for the plaintiff, stated that he made a settlement for Mrs. Roper, and that his best recollection was that the defendant was present; that Mrs. Roper then claimed of the defendant the sum of $57 for rent; that defendant did not deny that he owed rent to Mrs. Roper; that the balance due, after credits were given, was claimed by Mrs. Roper of the defendant for rent. The defendant moved to exclude that part of the conversation which was had with Mrs. Roper, on the ground that the witness was interested in the suit as a trustee under a codicil to Mrs. Roper's will, which was offered in evidence in support of the motion. The court sustained the motion, and excluded the testimony of the witness so far as it related to any transaction or conversation with the decedent. The plaintiff objected to this action of the court on the ground that the evidence did not show that the witness was interested in the result of the suit. The exception was to the action of the court in overruling this objection. The witness Mason was not a nominal party to the suit. He could not, therefore, come within the exception as to competency prescribed by the statute unless he was so beneficially interested in the result as to be within the spirit of the statutory prohibition, so that, in order to give effect to the policy of the law, he should be treated as he would have been if he had been named as a party to the cause. Code 1886, § 2765;[1] Boykin v. Smith, 65 Ala. 295; Drew v. Simmons, 58 Ala. 463; Hodges v. Denny, 86 Ala. 226, 5 South. Rep. 492; Sublett v. Hodges, 88 Ala. 491, 7 South. Rep. 296. It may be remarked that this case was tried before section 2765 of the Code was amended by the act approved February 10, 1891. Acts 1890-91, p. 557. By the codicil to the will the witness Mason was appointed trustee of certain property, which was directed to be used for the support and education of a great-grandson of the testatrix. Part of that property was money in the hands of a firm of which the witness was a member. There was also a direction in the codicil as to the disposition of the money due on a note of the witness to the testatrix. None of the property mentioned in the codicil was in any way involved in this suit. There was no evidence tending to show that the witness could have been at all affected by the result of the suit. It is suggested for the appellee that the witness was interested in the collection of all assets of the estate, so that no necessity might arise for using in the administration of the estate any of the property which he was to hold as trustee, and for the management of which, as trustee, he would be entitled to compensation so long as it was not required to pay debts of the estate. There was no proof that there were any debts against the estate, or that the assets of the estate, besides the claim involved in this suit, were not amply sufficient to meet all liabilities, if there were any, without looking to the property covered by the trust provided for by the codicil. A mere suggestion of a remote and contingent interest, of the existence of which there is no evidence, does not warrant the exclusion of a statement by one not a party to the suit. Huckaba v. Abbott, 87 Ala. 409, 6 South. Rep. 48. The evidence failed to show that the witness was pecuniarily interested in the result of the suit. It was improper to exclude his statement on a ground which was not shown to exist.

There is no merit in the criticism by appellee's counsel upon the manner of reserving the exception to the ruling of the court. The statement by the witness having been excluded on the specific ground that he was interested in the result of the suit, the plaintiff's objection to such exclusion was properly based upon the suggestion to the court that the evidence failed to show the existence of the fact of interest. If the exception had been directly to the action of the court in granting the defendant's motion to exclude, that exception would have been sustained here, because of the insufficiency of the evidence to show that the witness was interested.

[1] Code Ala. 1886, § 2765, provides that "there must be no exclusion of any witness because he is a party, or interested in the issue tried, except that neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other as to any transaction with or statement by any deceased person whose estate is interested in the result of the suit or proceeding, * * * unless called to testify thereto by the other party."

The exception which was reserved presents the same erroneous action of the court. The specified ground of the objection correctly stated wherein the error of the ruling consisted. The action of the circuit court in excluding the statement of the witness is duly and properly presented for the consideration of this court. For the error in that ruling the judgment must be reversed. The assignments of error as to the two charges given for the defendant do not seem to be seriously insisted upon. No error is discovered therein.

Reversed and remanded.

STATE ex rel. DAVIS, Mayor, v. POLICE JURY OF BOSSIER PARISH. (No. 297.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Oct. 22, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

SELECTION OF PARISH SEAT—DECLARATION OF RESULT—MANDAMUS—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

Where, in the selection of a parish seat, the police jury is authorized to ascertain the result of the election, and it makes a mere informal statement of votes, a mandamus will not issue to compel them to take this informal statement as the true result of the election. This would be divesting them of a judicial discretion devolving upon them by legislative act. If, after this informal statement, the police jury compiles the vote, and declares the result, it will be presumed they did their duty. The disregarding and setting aside of the informal statement is not in itself evidence of fraud. The police jury being authorized to declare the result of the election, it is invested with the power to investigate and to eliminate fraud, and this court, in the absence of legislative authority, has no power to review the findings of the police jury.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Bossier; J. T. BOONE, Judge.

Mandamus on the relation of J. J. Davis, mayor of Houghton, to the police jury of Bossier parish, to compel them to take the informal statement of votes at an election as the true result of such election. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

J. A. W. Lowry, Dist. Atty., Alexander & Blanchard, and Joannes Smith, for appellants.

(1) The proceedings of the police jury of the parish of Bossier of date November 27, 1888, under Act 33 of 1888, have been adjudged inoperative and without legal effect. Hence such proceedings are not conclusive on the jury, and cannot be made the basis of a mandamus. 42 La. Ann. 968, 8 South. Rep. 475; 43 La. Ann. 125, 9 South. Rep. 348.

(2) The police jury having ascertained and proclaimed the result of the election held under said act, and their decision having been carried into effect by the removal of the parish seat to Benton, mandamus will not lie to undo what has been done. High, Extr. Rem. § 49.

(3) All authority over said election was vested in the police jury by the act. The duties of the jury involved the exercise of discretion, and the courts will not interfere with its decision. 41 La. Ann. 851, 6 South. Rep. 777; 43 La. Ann. 125, 9 South. Rep. 348; High, Extr. Rem. § 57.

Watkins & Watkins and Land & Land, for appellee.

(1) The parish seat of a parish cannot be changed until an act of the legislature has been passed for that purpose, and this act adopted at a special election "by a majority of the votes of the parish cast at such election." Const. art. 250.

(2) Under this constitutional provision, Act 33 of 1888 was passed, granting the people of Bossier parish the right of holding a special election for the removal of their parish seat from Bellevue to one of the several designated points. By this act it was the duty of the police jury of the parish to order the election, to receive the returns, and proclaim the result of said election. Act 33 of 1888, §§ 2–6.

(3) Under this act, the duties of the police jury were specific and purely ministerial, giving them no discretion, and conferring on them no judicial powers; and hence a mandamus proceeding may be resorted to "to compel them to fulfill the duties attached to their office, or which may be legally required of them." Code Prac.; State v. Judge, 40 La. Ann. 393, 4 South. Rep. 50; 36 La. Ann. 828; 15 La. Ann. 334; 35 La. Ann. 637; State v. Police Jury, 41 La. Ann. 851, 6 South. Rep. 777; State v. Secretary of State, 32 La. Ann. 173, 579; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. pp. 832–841; Cooley, Const. Lim. 623; McCrary, Elect. §§ 151, 226, 229, 350.

(4) In this act it is stated as the plain duty of the police jury to receive the returns of the commissioners of election and to proclaim the result; and, "if they have made the compilation and promulgation upon other returns than those prescribed by law, they must make them over again, in a way to conform strictly to the statute. The writ of mandamus lies to compel them so to do." Quoted from State v. Secretary of State, 32 La. Ann. 579; Id. 173; State v. Houston, 40 La. Ann. 393, 397, 4 South. Rep. 50; State v. Mayor, 43 La. Ann. 95, 8 South. Rep. 893.

(5) Canvassers of election "cannot go behind the returns for any purpose." McCrary, Elect. 227, 226, 229, 350; 6 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 310; Cooley, Const. Lim. 623; 32 La. Ann. 173, 579.

MCENERY, J. Act 33 of 1888 authorized the voters of the parish of Bossier by election to select a parish site. The claims of the several towns to be recognised as the parish site, under the election held in pursuance of said act, have been frequently before this court. The facts are fully reported in the cases of State v. Police Jury, 41 La. Ann. 851, 6 South. Rep. 777; Davis v. Police Jury, 42 La. Ann. 968, 8 South. Rep. 475; Police Jury v. Judge, 43 La. Ann. 125, 9 South. Rep. 348. Under Act 33 of 1888, the police jury was vested with power to order the election, to appoint commissioners, to receive the returns, and to ascertain and proclaim the result of the election. The president of the police jury was required to issue a proclamation declaring the place which had been selected as the parish seat. On November 27, 1888, the police jury made an informal statement of the vote, but no result was ascertained, as no compilation had been made as required by Act 33 of 1888. This was so decided in the cases of Davis v. Police Jury, 42 La. Ann. 968, 8 South. Rep. 475, and Police Jury v. Judge, 43 La. Ann. 125, 9 South. Rep. 348. The present mandamus proceeding is a sequel to the suit of Davis v. Police Jury, above referred to. The petition for the mandamus recites the proceedings of the police jury on November 27, 1888, and alleges "that the table or a list of voters, as returned to them and received by them, did show, as they, the said police jury of Bossier parish, La., declared, on the 27th day of November, 1888, and which they ascertained to be, the vote as cast at the election which was held on the 23d day of November, 1888." The relator further alleges that "said table, as made by the police jury, the result of said election, was in favor of the town of Haughton, which is legally entitled to be declared the parish seat; and it is the duty of the police jury of Bossier parish, under Act 33 of 1888, to compile the returns as sent in by the commissioners, as ascertained and as shown by their proceedings to be as above stated." The prayer of the petition is that "the police jury be required to meet on or before the 24th day of November, 1890, and then and there to compile the returns of the election held on the 23d of November, 1888, as sent in to them by the commissioners of election, as shown by their proceedings of November 27, 1888, to be as stated in the above petition, and to proclaim the result as thus compiled." There were exceptions filed to the jurisdiction, and also one of no cause of action. These were referred to the merits.

In the case of Davis v. Police Jury we held that the pretended compilation of the vote of the parish of Bossier cast for the selection of a parish seat was barren of results. "The statement of the vote was informal. The result was not declared or proclaimed by any order or vote of the police jury." 42 La. Ann. 968, 8 South. Rep. 475. And again, in Police Jury v. Judge, 43 La. Ann. 125, 9 South. Rep. 348, in referring to that case, we said that "said proceedings [meaning the statement of votes] were inoperative, and did not constitute an ascertainment or proclamation of the vote." We are therefore asked to divest the police jury of that discretion vested in them by Act 33 of 1888, and to compel them to declare the result of the election from a designated statement of votes, in no way authentic, so far as the record discloses. This case in its present aspect is similar to that of State v. Police Jury, 41 La. Ann. 851, 6 South. Rep. 777, where the police jury it was declared, had ascertained and promulgated the result of the election in favor of the town of Haughton. The town of Benton proceeded by mandamus, and asked that the true result of the election be ascertained by going behind the returns and eliminating the alleged frauds from them. We said in that case that "the court is not asked in this case to compel officers to discharge ministerial duties. It was asked to take from them duties involving discretion, to discharge these duties itself, and to compel them to make a formal declaration of its edict." So, in this case, the relator, taking the informal statement of votes made by the police jury on the 27th November, 1888, as the actual returns of the election, asks this court to compel the police jury of Bossier to treat them as the true and actual statement of votes, and to declare the result as ascertained by their compilation; thus depriving the police jury of that quasi judicial discretion invested in them by the act of 1888. The police jury of Bossier, however, has ascertained and declared the result of the election. The town of Benton, under the election by virtue of said Act 33 of 1888, is declared to be the parish seat. That they disregarded the informal statement of votes on November 27, 1888, is no evidence of fraud. In the absence of evidences of fraud, we must presume that the police jury of Bossier did its duty. They were authorized to declare the result. They had a judicial power of investigation to ascertain it, and to eliminate fraudulent votes from the returns. In the exercise of this power, we have no authority to review their finding. The legislature vested them with it, and it belongs to the legislative power of the government to rectify the wrong, if any has been inflicted upon the town of Houghton or the inhabitants of Bossier. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be avoided and reversed; and it is now ordered that the relief prayed for by relator be denied, and the mandamus proceeding be dismissed, with costs.

DISSOLUTION OF INJUNCTION.

A writ of injunction having issued, the defendant filed a motion to dissolve it on bond. It being evident that the apprehended injury is compensable in money, and not irreparable, the application is granted, and the court a qua directed to accept bond and security dissolving the injunction.

Appeal from district court, parish of Bossier; J. T. BOONE, Judge.

Suit by A. Lattier and others against W. M. Abney, president of the police jury of Bossier parish, and others, to enjoin them from executing or carrying out a contract for the construction of a certain jail. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

J. A. W. Lowry, Dist. Atty., Land & Land, and Joannes Smith, for appellants.

(1) An appeal will lie from an order refusing to dissolve an injunction on bond. 32 La. Ann. 394; 38 La. Ann. 50.

(2) An injury is not irreparable when it can be made good or repaired by money. The sworn allegation of plaintiff in injunction to the contrary is not conclusive. 32 La. Ann. 1192; 33 La. Ann. 930; 37 La. Ann. 110.

(3) Order of dissolution is proper when the injury is compensable by money, and the bond covers the sum fixed by the plaintiff as damages. 36 La. Ann. 772.

(4) Right of police jury to dissolve on bond is the same as any other litigant, and has been recognized. 32 La. Ann. 1192. Any person bound by law or a judgment may execute a legal or judicial bond. Civil Code, art. 3064.

Watkins & Watkins, for appellees.

BREAUX, J. Plaintiffs allege that they are tax-payers of Bossier parish, in which they reside and own property, and as such have a common interest, exceeding $2,000, in preventing the illegal expenditure by the police jury of the money of the parish in building a jail. They also aver that the town of Benton is not the parish site of Bossier parish; that it is the temporary place for holding courts pending a litigation to determine where the parish site shall be; and that provision has been made for the safe-keeping of prisoners during the pendency of the suit. They also allege that under Act 33 of 1888 an election was held to determine the location of the parish seat, but that the police jury has failed to make legal compilations of the returns and to promulgate the result. They allege that the proceedings of the police jury favoring the recognition of Benton as a parish site are illegal and null, and they supplement the issues presented by a statement of the facts involved in the mandamus suit of State v. Police Jury, 10 South. Rep. 359, (decided during the present term of this court.) They enjoined the police jury and the Panly Jail Building & Manufacturing Company from entering into, executing, or carrying out a contract for the construction of a jail at Benton to cost $7,580. The defendants admit that the police jury has made a contract for the construction of a jail, as alleged. They allege that Benton is the parish seat. The district judge granted the order for writ of injunction to issue, as prayed for. The defendants filed a motion to dissolve the injunction on bond. An order was entered refusing motion to bond. Defendants appealed. Plaintiffs move to dismiss the appeal, on the grounds that the order of refusal to permit the defendant to bond was not signed, and that it will not cause irreparable injury. It is not needful that an interlocutory judgment be signed, to be appealed from when it causes irreparable injury. Klotz v. Macready, 35 La. Ann. 596. The court judicially notices prior decrees and evidence pertinent to the issue in a pending case. Mower v. Kemp, 42 La. Ann. 1007, 8 South. Rep. 830. The decision of the court in case of Parish of Caddo v. Parish of Bossier, 42 La. Ann. 939, 8 South. Rep. 533, shows that the latter parish has been without a jail for six or seven years. It is admitted in plaintiffs' pleadings that there is no jail in the parish at this time. The statutes of the state make it the duty of the police jury to provide a jail. Delay will occasion irreparable injury. Public order and the proper administration of justice require that a good and sufficient jail be constructed within a reasonable time. The defendants have a right to an appeal on their petition to dissolve the injunction on bond. On the merits, the question no longer presents great difficulty. Avoiding to decide the injunction on its merits, we, notwithstanding, must take notice of the fact that the parish seat of Bossier parish is definitely settled, and that the necessity of delaying the construction of a jail at Benton on the ground alleged by plaintiffs no longer exists. The issue is limited to the right to bond. The sole purpose of the injunction was to prevent the expenditure of $7,580 of parish fund to build a jail at a place not definitely settled as a parish seat. That question being decided, the injunction can be dissolved on bond. The allegations of plaintiffs and all the issues make it evident that any apprehended injury is compensable in money. Plaintiffs aver that they have a common interest exceeding $2,000. A bond will protect them from all injury. The conditions of the bond and the sureties will amply protect plaintiffs. It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendants' motion to dissolve the injunction in this case be granted, and that the judge of the district court of the second judicial district, in and for the parish of Bossier, accept a bond from the police jury, and security, to secure plaintiffs from injury; that this case be remanded at plaintiffs' costs, to be further proceeded with according to law.

(3) A sale for cash made to one not a creditor must be considered as one in the ordinary course of business, if made for an adequate consideration paid in cash or its equivalent; and the fact that a portion of the purchase price was subsequently applied to the discharge of the vendor's debts will not vitiate the sale as an onerous contract. 19 La. 594; 40 La. (4) Notwithstanding a debtor illegally and fraudulently disposes of his goods to the injury of his creditors, they cannot be reached and recovered unless the purchaser is shown to have participated in the fraudulent designs. See authorities cited under No. 3 and 35 La. Ann. 518.

(5) If a sale be made to one not a creditor, for a fair price, in the usual course of business, it should not be rescinded, even though the vendor was insolvent, and the vendee knew that fact. Civil Code, art. 1986; 24 La. Ann. 158; 7 La. Ann. 645; 12 La. 263; 19 La. 594.

(6) A sale by a merchant of his entire stock, accounts, and store-house to one not a creditor for a sound price paid in cash is a sale in the ordinary course of a party's business. See authorities cited above, and especially 40 La. Ann. 327, 4 South. Rep. 74; 7 La. Ann. 645; Fudicker's Case, 19 La. 594.

(7) "Sales of property cannot be disturbed on hypothetical valuations of property, or on the diminution of the price below what witnesses thought it ought to have brought, or below what its actual value may be supposed to be. Its actual value as a salable commodity is conclusively shown to be the sum it actually brought in open market." 31 La. Ann. 202. The value of property is what it will bring, if made for adequate consideration, paid in cash. 40 La. Ann. 330, 4 South. Rep. 74.

(9) No sale of property, made in the usual course of the party's business, shall be affected by virtue of any provision of the Code, treating the avoiding of contracts, although the party was in insolvent circumstances, and the person with whom he contracted knew of such insolvency. Civil Code, arts. 1986, 2658; 16 La. Ann. 402; 19 La. 594.

BREAUX, J. Chaffe, Powell & West have brought this suit to recover $17,349.21 and interest. They allege that the defendant George G. Gill, being in insolvent circumstances, with intent to defraud them, and other creditors, made fraudulent and simulated sales of all his tangible property; that under notarial act he pretended to sell to George Gill, his nephew, his store and warehouse in the town of Homer, together with the stock of merchandise contained therein, and his open accounts for the year 1891, for the nominal price of $15,000 cash. They pray that judgment be rendered against George G. Gill for the sum claimed; that the sale to George Gill be decreed fraudulent and simulated; that the property described be subjected to sale in satisfaction of the judgment prayed for; that there be personal judgment against George Gill for so much of the personal property sued for as he fails to surrender in obedience to the judgment. George G. Gill answered by a general denial of the facts alleged, and George Gill pleaded payment of the price in good faith, in due course of business. The judge a qua maintained the sale of the movable property, and as to the immovable property decreed its nullity. He pronounced judgment against George G. Gill for the amount due plaintiffs. The record discloses that on the 17th day of February, 1891, the defendant George G. Gill desired an extension of his indebtedness, and promised to secure it by a mortgage on his real estate in Claiborne parish. He represented himself to plaintiffs as worth $35,000 in excess of his liabilities. He delivered to plaintiffs, in New Orleans, a written statement of the status of his affairs, in which he valued his assets in detail. The total of the statement was $81,000 assets, and $46,000 liabilities. He said he had undervalued, rather than overvalued, his assets, and that his brick store in Homer was worth more than $10,000, and that his stock of merchandise would invoice considerably more than $15,000; that his accounts for 1891 amounted to $4,000, and were good for their face value. He promised that, immediately after his return home, he would make a statement containing a description of all the property he had promised to mortgage. He thereupon applied for an additional amount to pay certain bills he owed, and desired to pay before returning to his home. They were paid, amounting to $2,181.43, as part of a new accommodation for the season of 1891 and 1892; the defendant having promised the mortgage as before mentioned. Instead of complying, on the 23d day of February, 1891, he sold to George Gill his brick store-house, and a number of town lots, a warehouse, and other immovable property; also his stock of goods and office furniture; also all the accounts on the books dated in 1891, described in the deed of sale. The whole property was sold en bloc for the price of $15,000 cash in hand paid. On the 25th of February, 1891, he made a dation en paiement to his wife of an improved lot in satisfaction of $2,000, and within a very short time sold all his remaining immovable property. Ten thousand dollars due Chaffe & Powell were secured by a mortgage on certain lands in the parish of Richland. The lands were the property, at the time the mortgage was executed, of George Gill, who consented to this mortgage to secure an indebtedness of George G. Gill. On the 24th day of February, 1891, these lands were sold by George Gill to George G. Gill for the price of $5,000. He (G. G. Gill) was insolvent when the sales were made, and they left him without any property subject to seizure. Part of the $15,000 purchase price was applied to the payment of certain debts for which George Gill, the purchaser, was security, and part, viz., $5,000, to the payment for the Richland tract of land. George Gill was a creditor, at the time, of George G. Gill in the sum of $2,000. This amount does not figure in any of the contracts. The representations made by the defendant just prior to the sale, and the sudden transfer of all his property, can lead only to the conclusion that his object was to escape the payment of his debts, or to give an unfair preference to some of his creditors.

Having reached this conclusion, the question at once suggests itself, was the vendee, George Gill, a party to the fraudem legis of George G. Gill, and was he aware of his insolvency? We have no direct testimony on the subject. The facts that they were on intimate terms; that the nephew was almost daily in the uncle's office; that he knew of the arrangement to give plaintiffs a mortgage; that he must have known that he was carrying a large indebtedness; that he was a creditor, and no mention was made of the claims at the time these sales were passed; that the sale to him was not in due course of business; that part of the price was applied to the payment of debts, for which the vendee was security; that a large portion was applied to the payment for the Richland tract of land; that two disinterested witnesses testify that these lands are not worth the amount for which they are mortgaged; that the contents of the commercial house were transferred on a memorandum estimate, and not on an inventory, to be as exact as possible as to the value,—all point to an active participation on his part in a scheme to defraud certain creditors. Defendants' witnesses on the subject testify that the intimacy did not extend to a knowledge of his uncle's business; that he was informed that his assets were large in comparison to his liabilities. The vendee at the time of his purchase surely knew that the vendor would be unable to pay plaintiffs the large indebtedness for which he had promised to mortgage the property. He must have known that, if the property transferred to him was not worth more than the estimate he placed upon it, the remainder, comparatively of little value, added to that transferred to him, was considerably less than the amount due by his co-defendant. The evidence shows how much the whole property brought. The total is far less than $22,000. He was informed by the vendor that his indebtedness amounted to $47,000. We find no relief for the purchaser in article 1982 of the Revised Civil Code, as it is impossible, legally, to order a restitution to be made of any of the price paid to creditors. At most, the purchaser can be subrogated to whatever rights the creditors had against G. G. Gill. All the property described in the deed of G. G. Gill, defendant, to his co-defendant, George Gill, before Drew Ferguson, clerk of court, on the 23d day of February, 1891, not included within the terms of the judgment appealed from, shall be included, or its value accounted for. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be amended by annulling and avoiding the said sale in toto; that all the property described in said deed be subjected to sale in satisfaction of the judgment. The said George Gill is subrogated to the rights the creditors paid by him may have had against George G. Gill, and the judgment appealed from is further amended by not allowing the restitution of the amount therein granted. As amended, judgment affirmed, at appellees' costs.

ON REHEARING.

Plaintiffs, in their application for a rehearing, contend that, in the event a revocatory action is sustained, the purchaser should be placed in the same position as prior to the sale or transfer; that the attacking creditor should restore to the purchaser the amount thus expended by him, and applied to the payment of G. G. Gill's creditors. The article quoted in support of these propositions had not escaped our attention, and would have been applied, had it not been that the amount is limited to "so much as he shall prove has inured to the benefit of the creditors, by adding to the amount of property applicable to the payment of the debt." Article 1982, Rev. Civil Code. We did not find that any amount inured to the benefit of the creditor, or that it is possible to give a superior or concurrent right to George Gill to recover the amount of the purchase price G. G. Gill applied to the payment of his debts. We are referred to the case of Barker v. Phillips, 11 Rob. (La.) 197. In that case the price was paid to release the two attachments, which, if not released, would have necessarily occasioned a diminution of so much of the property subsequently attached. The sum in that case inured to the benefit of the creditors, by being added to the amount of the property applicable to the payment of the debts in which all the attachments issued. In the present case no such condition presents itself. The judgment revoking the sale precluded a claim on the part of a creditor which has not inured to the benefit of the creditor having precedence. We have carefully examined the grounds of the application of plaintiffs, but find no merit in them. Rehearing refused.

KATZ et al. v. GILL et al. (No. 311.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Oct. 28, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

REVOCATORY ACTION — APPEAL — JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT.

1. In a revocatory action the test of jurisdiction is the amount claimed, and not the value of the property, the sale of which the plaintiff seeks to have revoked.

2. In an action de simulation, the value of the property is the test of jurisdiction.

3. The action being revocatory, and the amount at issue less than $2,000, the appeal is dismissed, at appellants' costs.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Claiborne; A. BARKSDALE, Judge.

Revocatory action by Katz & Barnett against G. G. Gill and George Gill. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Dismissed.

Young & Thatcher and J. E. Moore, for appellants. John Young, J. W. Halbert, and John A. Richardson, for appellee G. G. Gill. J. W. Halbert, J. R. Phipps, and John A. Richardson, for appellee George Gill.

BREAUX, J. Plaintiffs' claim in this case does not exceed $2,000. Unless the transactions assailed by them are pure simulations, it is manifest that the appellate jurisdiction is tested by the amount of plaintiffs' demand, and not by the value of the property involved in the contract sought to be annulled. Our opinion in the case of Chaffe v. Gill, 10 South. Rep. 361, (just read,) shows that the contract assailed was not a mere simulation. It follows that plaintiffs must seek appellate relief in another tribunal. It is therefore ordered that the appeal herein be dismissed,—without prejudice to plaintiffs' right to appeal to the circuit court,—at appellants' costs.

STATE v. WEST et al. (No. 294.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Oct. 22, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—LARCENY.

1. The judge in his charge may divest the case of all irrelevant matter found in arguments or in the pleadings.

2. The charge objected to, whether correct or incorrect, had no bearing on the guilt or innocence of the accused, and did not prejudice him, and therefore offered no ground of relief from the verdict and sentence.

3. An instruction by the court in the trial of a case of larceny that the issue was not whether a verdict would be a victory for or against a corporation, but whether the accused was guilty, was not a charge upon the facts. It only cautioned the jury to direct their attention to the real issue, which the line of argument might otherwise becloud.

4. The admissibility of the statement of a witness, of information received which led to the arrest of the fugitive from justice, will not afford ground of relief, although part of the statement be hearsay.

5. A witness who has testified in chief as to the good character of the accused may, upon cross-examination, be examined as to a common report affecting his good character.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Sabine; D. PIERSON, Judge.

Prosecution against Robert West and Gabe Curtis for larceny. Verdict of guilty as to West, and judgment thereon. Defendant Curtis was acquitted. West appeals. Affirmed.

W. G McDonald, Ponder & Sorelle, and T. C. Armstrong, for appellant.

In charging the jury in criminal cases, the judge must limit himself to giving them a knowledge of the law applicable to the case. Rev. St. § 1963.

The jury in all criminal cases shall be the judges of the law and the facts on the question of guilt or innocence, having been charged as to the laws applicable to the case by the presiding judge. Article 168, Const. 1879.

Under these statutes, the judge should carefully avoid giving the jury any indication of his own opinion touching the facts of the case or the guilt or innocence of the prisoner. State v. Melvin, 11 La. Ann. 537.

* * * But it is requisite that, whatever facts the witness may speak to, he should be confined to those lying in his knowledge, whether they be things said or done, and should not testify from information given by others, however worthy of credit they may be; for it is found indispensable, as a test of truth and to the proper administration of justice, that every living witness should, if possible, be subjected to the ordeal of a cross-examination, that it may appear what were his powers of perception, his opportunities for observation, his attentiveness in observing, the strength of his recollection, and his disposition to speak the truth. 1 Greenl. Ev. p. 134.

* * * But particular good or bad acts, or the reputation of having done them, cannot be shown in proof or rebuttal of good character. Bish. Crim. Proc.

* * * That on a trial for a particular crime the state cannot aid the proofs against the defendant by showing him to have committed another crime; even after he has put his character at issue this cannot be done. Bish. Crim. Proc. § 1120.

* * * Yet not even on cross-examination can his cause be prejudiced with the jury by testimony to any irrelevant guilt. Id. §§ 1123, 1124.

D. C. Scarborough, Dist. Atty., and J. Henry Shepherd, for appellee.

(1) The judge in his charge to the jury may divest the case of all irrelevant matter. State v. Chandler, 5 La. Ann. 489.

(2) Where a part of the charge of the judge to the jury is objected to, but it appears that the same has no bearing on the question of the guilt or innocence of the accused, and can in no manner prejudice him, whether correct or not, it will not be considered by the supreme court as affording any ground of relief. State v. Turner, 35 La. Ann. 1103.

An instruction by the court, in a charge to a jury upon the trial of a case of larceny, that any verdict they may render will not be a victory for or against any corporation or person, is not a charge upon the facts. If counsel argue irrelevant matters to a jury, it is the duty of the judge to enlighten their understanding, and divest the case of irrelevant matter, and draw their attention to the real issue.

(3) The whole tendency of modern practice is to enlarge the admissibility of evidence, so as to lay before the jury every fact tending to explain the main issue. State v. Denis, 19 La. Ann. 10.

Attempts or efforts to escape on the part of one accused of crime are admissible, and to be considered in connection with other evidence in determining the question of guilt or innocence. 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. 1250; Whart. Crim. Ev. 750; State v. Beatty, 30 La. Ann. 1266.

When a witness is called to testify as to good character of the defendant, he can, upon cross-examination, be examined as to any matters affecting the good character of the accused.

BREAUX, J. The defendants were tried upon a charge of larceny. West was convicted, and Curtis acquitted. West appeals, and presents three bills of exceptions. In the first bill he excepts to certain expressions in the court's charge to the jury. In the second bill he objects to certain evidence to prove flight, as hearsay. In the last bill of exception he states that there is error in the court's ruling in admitting a question to a witness who testified as to good character, propounded, on cross-examination, by the district attorney, as follows, viz.: "If it was not generally reported that the accused was an ex-convict." The language of the charge objected to in the first bill is: "Any verdict you may render will not be a victory for or against any corporation or person." The court states, as part of the bill, "that, in order that the line of argument by counsel before the jury might not prejudice the jury or obscure the real issues, the jury were admonished that they should determine the question of guilt or innocence, and should lay aside any prejudice that they might have against corporations or negroes; that corporations had the same property rights as individuals; that a negro should not be convicted upon less cogent evidence than that required to convict a white man; and that the issue was not whether a verdict would be a victory for or against a corporation, but whether the accused stood guilty of stealing the two bales of cotton with which they were charged." The charge objected to was not damagingly argumentative, nor such as to influence a jury to find an illegal verdict. The comments were fair to the accused, and not in the least such as to occasion bias on the part of the jury. They contain no reference to the evidence, and do not trench on matter of fact.

The second bill discloses that a witness had testified "that the prisoner had not only left the whereabouts of the crime and his home, but that he was informed that he had gone to Vanceville and Tyler, Tex., after leaving the scene of his crime, under an assumed name." After this evidence had been written, it was objected to as being hearsay. Granted that the objection can now be heard, the evidence is competent; the perpetrator had fled. The witness, as explanatory of his pursuit, stated what information he received at the various places, by which he was enabled to follow up and capture the accused. The flight is made evident by the action of the accused in leaving home immediately after the crime. The effect of the evidence, and not its admissibility, was a proper subject for consideration.

The third bill of exception relates to the cross-examination by the state of a witness for the defense, who had testified in chief to the good character of the accused. He was asked if it was not a general report that he was an ex-convict. The question was not propounded for the purpose of establishing a particular fact, but to test the knowledge of the witness as to what his neighbors said of the accused, and to put in evidence his bad reputation. In order to grant a new trial on the ground of the improper admission of evidence the application must establish a ground which operated to the prejudice of the accused. Steph. Dig. Ev. The witness in answer having stated that he only knew the prisoner as a servant, the question propounded does not vitiate the judgment. Judgment affirmed.

MARTIN v. WALKER et al. (No. 203.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Oct. 22, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

HOMESTEAD EXEMPTIONS—REPEAL—LOSS OF HOMESTEAD—ENTRIES ON PUBLIC LANDS—RES JUDICATA.

1. All homestead exemptions acquired since the adoption of the constitution of 1879 must conform to the conditions and requirements imposed by that instrument.

2. While the constitution preserved intact homestead rights acquired under prior laws before the date of its adoption, as to future homesteads it repealed those laws in so far as they were inconsistent with the requirements of the constitution.

3. The conditions of bona fide ownership and actual residence are essential to the creation and maintenance of any homestead exemption since the date of the constitution, and when such conditions cease to exist the exemption falls; and this applies equally to homestead entries on the public lands of the state under Act 21 of 1871 and Act 64 of 1888.

4. Denis v. Gayle, 40 La. Ann. 286, 4 South. Rep. 3, affirmed, holding that a judgment sustaining a claim of homestead exemption is no bar to subsequent action to subject the same property to execution, on allegation and proof that the essential conditions on which the judgment was based have been changed and lost.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Caddo; S. L. TAYLOR, Judge.

Suit by W. A. Martin against E. O. Walker and Simon Herold to have a certain judgment declared void. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wise & Herndon, for appellants.

(1) The action of a creditor to have a judgment recognising a homestead in favor of his judgment debtor declared inoperative and void for the reason that the conditions which were the motives of the judgment have ceased to exist, rests on the principle that something has happened since the rendition of the judgment which destroys the effect of the judgment. Denis v. Gale, 40 La. Ann. 286, 4 South. Rep. 3.

(2) A judgment cannot be set aside and declared of no effect, when a suit is brought for that purpose, when the same conditions exist when suit is brought as when judgment was rendered, as it is res adjudicata. Burchard v. Parker, 24 La. Ann. 33; 32 La. Ann. 535.

(3) Prescription of one year is applicable to suits brought to have judgments declared null and void.

(4) A judgment between same parties, same cause of action, and same facts, is res adjudicata, and, when pleaded, should be sustained. Succession of McDonogh, 24 La. Ann. 33; Burchard v. Parker, 32 La. Ann. 535; Sewell v. Scott, 35 La. Ann. 553.

(5) State of Louisiana has a right, under the act of congress, to dispose of its public domain under any condition it may see proper, when the act of congress making the grant to the state so provides. Rev. St. 1870, p. 569, § 2.

(6) Act No. 21 of 1871, and Act 64 of 1888, to secure homestead to actual settlers on public lands of the state, and providing that said lands shall in no event be liable for any debt created previous to the issuance of a patent therefor, are valid and binding, and do not violate the constitution of the state or of the United States. Gibson v. Chouteau, 13 Wall. 92, see page 99; 21 Minn. 167; Patton v. Richmond, 28 La. Ann. 795.

J. Henry Shepherd, for appellee.

(1) The foundation of public policy is common honesty. "The fallacy lies in supposing the property to be that of the family." The property of a debtor is the common pledge of all his creditors. Nugent v. Caruth, 32 La. Ann. 444.

(2) The words "in any event" can receive no greater force than the word "permanent," and to construe these words to mean "forever" would be void on the ground of public policy. 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 846.

Homestead laws are inoperative against prior debts, because such exemptions impair the obligations of a contract by destroying the remedy. Edwards v. Keazy, 96 U. S. 600; Martin v. Kilpatrick, 30 La. Ann. 1214; Pool v. Cook, 34 La. Ann. 332; Succession of Furniss, Id. 1013; Kinder v. Lyons, 30 La. Ann. 713; Taylor v. Saloy, 38 La. Ann. 63.

The debtor who claims must combine in him at least three conditions: He must occupy it as a residence, he must own the property, and must have a family dependent upon him for support. A judgment declaring property as his homestead, based on these conditions, will cease to have effect, and become inoperative, against judicial mortgages as soon as any one of these conditions ceases to exist. The judicial mortgage, which has been properly inscribed against the owner of property recognized as his homestead, and which was dormant, becomes executory against the property even in the hands of a third possessor by virtue of a sale from the original owner. Denis v. Gayle, 40 La. Ann. 286, 4 South. Rep. 3; Hebert v. Mayer, 42 La. Ann. 839, 8 South. Rep. 590.

It is immaterial by virtue of what law a homestead is acquired. To maintain it, the three essential conditions of ownership, occupancy, and some member of his family dependent on him for support, must co-exist continuously.

FENNER, C. J. Plaintiff is the holder of a judgment against defendant E. O. Walker, rendered and recorded as a judicial mortgage in 1885. In 1889 plaintiff issued a fi. fa. on his judgment, under which a tract of land belonging to Walker was seized. Walker thereupon brought an injunction suit to restrain the sale, averring in his petition that he "had acquired the property by homestead entry under the laws of Louisiana, as shown by his patent; that said land is now owned and occupied by him in good faith as a homestead, and he has a family, and has complied with all the requirements of law to obtain a homestead from the public domain of the state," etc. Issue was joined, and trial had, resulting in a judgment perpetuating the injunction, and decreeing the property "to be free from any incumbrance resulting from said judgment or debt, or from the recordation thereof." Some 15 months after the rendition of above judgment Martin instituted the present action, in which he seeks to have the said judgment decreed to be inoperative and of no effect, on the ground that facts upon which the judgment of exemption was based had ceased to exist; the said Walker having sold the property therein claimed as a homestead, and having also removed therefrom and ceased to occupy it. The alleged purchaser, Herold, was joined as a party. Herold filed an exception of misjoinder and of prematurity, based on the ground that, as a third possessor, he was entitled to the demand and notice required by law in an hypothecary action. This is not the hypothecary action. It does not invoke the seizure or sale of the property. It simply seeks to move out of the way a judgment which stands as an obstacle to any proceedings whatever for the enforcement of the creditor's right or claim of right. If plaintiff should succeed in his present action he would still be remitted to his hypothecary action, and Herold would be entitled to all his rights as a third possessor. We agree with the district judge that he has no cause to complain of being made a party, and thus allowed to contest the present suit, the claim in which vitally affects his interests. The plea of res adjudicata, based on the former judgment, was rightly overruled. The issues in the two cases are radically different. In the first, Walker claimed a homestead exemption based upon the allegations, among others, that he was the bona fide owner and occupant of the property claimed as his homestead; and under the state of facts the judgment decreed the exemption. Now Martin alleges that he has since parted with both ownership and occupancy, and the issue is whether the homestead exemption continues or has been lost. We have so recently considered the nature and effect of such judgment that nothing more is necessary than to quote our former language: "Plaintiff does not in any manner question the correctness of the judgment in its disposition of the issues then tendered to the court for solution; hence he does not put at issue the right of Gayle to his homestead, as therein recognized, under the conditions and circumstances then existing. His contention is simply that, the reasons on which the judgment was founded, and from which it derived its vitality, having ceased to exist, the judgment itself has become extinct, without force or effect or life. The issues which he now tenders had no being or existence at the time the judgment was rendered; hence they were no elements in the consideration of the cause, and therefore the judgment could not be res adjudicata as to his present cause of action." Denis v. Gayle, 40 La. Ann. 288, 4 South. Rep. 8; Calvit v. Williams, 35 La. Ann. 322; Lemunier v. McCearly, 37 La. Ann. 133. The same authorities equally dispose of the plea of prescription against the action of nullity, and establish that this is in no sense an action of nullity of the former judgment.

This brings us to the issues of fact and of law. So far as the facts are concerned, we content ourselves with the statement that the evidence in the record conclusively sustains the findings of the judge a qua, and establishes that Walker has sold the land in controversy with a pact of redemption, and has abandoned his occupancy of and residence on the place. If the homestead exemption claimed by defendant is governed by the constitution of 1879 and the laws passed in pursuance thereof, there cannot be a shadow of question that it is lost and destroyed. We cannot express our view of the law more tersely than by quoting from a recent decision: "Under the plainest rules of construction the debtor who claims the exemption must combine in himself four indispensable conditions: (1) He must be the bona fide owner of the land. (2) He must occupy the premises as a residence. (3) He must have a family, or person or persons dependent on him for support. (4) The property must not exceed in value $2,000. Numerous adjudications of this court are authority for the assertion that the absence of any one of these conditions will defeat his claim for exemption, and that to entitle him to the homestead all the conditions must co-exist at the very time that the claim is propounded. Tilton v. Vignes, 33 La. Ann. 240; Galligar v. Payne, 34 La. Ann. 1057; Bossier v. Raines, 37 La. Ann. 263. Hence it follows that if, subsequently to the judgment which recognizes the exemption, any one or all of the conditions which were required to justify its rendition should cease to exist, the right to the homestead must fall." Denis v. Gayle, 40 La. Ann. 290, 4 South. Rep. 3. Defendant, however, claims that the homestead exemption claimed in this case is not governed by the constitution of 1879, but arises under and is governed by the provisions of Act 21 of 1871, and Act 64 of 1888, amending and re-enacting the former, which is entitled "An act to secure homesteads to the settlers on the public lands of the state;" and they rely on the following section, contained in both acts: "That no lands acquired under the provisions of this act shall in any event become liable to the satisfaction of any debt or debts contracted prior to the issuing of the patent therefor." We do not find it necessary to express any opinion upon the original validity of this provision, nor on the question as to whether, upon consideration of the whole act, the exemption was to continue beyond the term of the settler's ownership and occupancy; nor as to the rights of patentees under the act of 1871, under patents issued prior to the constitution of 1879. In this case the entry, settlement, and patent were all made, and the homestead acquired, after the adoption of the constitution of 1879. We hold, with the district judge, that this fact subjected the homestead to the provisions of that instrument, and to all the conditions imposed thereby as essential to the creation and maintenance of a valid homestead exemption. We are perfectly clear that the constitution intended to make exclusive provision for the nature and extent of future homestead exemptions, and the conditions on which they should exist. This conclusively appears from the following clause of article 220: "Rights to homesteads or exemptions under laws or contracts, or for debts existing at the time of the adoption of this constitution, shall not be impaired, repealed, or affected by any provision of this constitution, or any laws passed in pursuance thereof." It could not have been necessary thus carefully to protect rights acquired under prior homestead laws, and existing at the date of the adoption of the constitution, if it had intended that such laws should continue operative for the future, and authorize the continued creation of homesteads, independent of the constitutional regulations. It is apparent that prior laws, in so far as they were inconsistent with the provisions of the constitution and as to future homestead exemptions, were repealed. If, therefore, the acts referred to of 1871 and 1888 dispense with the conditions prescribed by the constitution as to future homesteads, they are, to that extent, in conflict with the constitution, and inoperative and void. If they do not dispense with those conditions, the latter must be complied with. On either hypothesis, the defendant's case is untenable, and the district judge did not err in rejecting their pretensions. Judgment affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Oct. 23, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

TUTOR'S BOND — ACCOUNT — HOMOLOGATION — EXPERT EVIDENCE — MORTGAGES — IMPROVEMENTS — PRORATING VALUES.

1. The tutor's bond was recorded. He filed an account of tutorship. In the judgment of homologation the minor's mortgage was not mentioned. It was not thereby affected, but retained its force and effect.

2. The testimony of witnesses who testify as experts, being contradictory, should be weighed, and the best-supported inference adopted.

3. In prorating values between the makers of improvements on lands and claimants of a mortgage thereon, the respective values of the land and the improvements are ascertained. The seizing creditor receives the value which the land bears relatively to the amount of the sale, and the defendant the value of the improvements considered in the same way.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Cross-appeals from district court, parish of Bossier; J. T. BOONE, Judge.

Action by Mary R. Taylor and husband against Emma S. Marshall to enforce a mortgage against certain lands. Judgment for plaintiffs. Both parties appeal. Affirmed.

J. R. Phipps, J. A. W. Lowry, and John Young, for plaintiffs.

(1) A judgment neither creates, adds to, nor detracts from the indebtedness of a party. It only decrees it to exist, fixes the amount, and secures to the suitor the means of enforcing its payment. If, under the law, the debt create a privilege or mortgage, such privilege or mortgage exists independent of the judgment rendered upon it. Gustine v. Bank, 10 Rob. (La.) 412, 418; Holmes v. Holmes, 9 Rob. (La.) 119; Drake v. Drake, 1 La. Ann. 545; Parker v. Starkweather, 7 Mart. (N. S.) 337, 340; Hill v. Bourcier, 29 La. Ann. 841, 845; Nicholson v. Bank, 27 La. Ann. 369.

(2) A third possessor, evicted by a mortgage creditor, can claim for his expenses and improvements only to the amount of the increased value which is the result of the improvements made. Linn v. Dee, 33 La. Ann. 217.

(3) The increased value is the difference between what the immovable would be worth on the day of adjudication or eviction under the seizure if the improvements had not been made and the price which it brings (or would bring) at the sale. 33 La. Ann. 217.

(4) When the expenses incurred by the third possessor are less than the increased value, he can only recover an amount equal to his expenses, and not one equal to the enhanced value. 33 La. Ann. 217.

(5) From the date of the service on the third possessor of the notification of the order of seizure, he is liable for the profits and income of the mortgaged property. Civil Code, arts. 3407, 3408.

(6) The purchaser of the estate burdened with a mortgage, when sued in an hypothecary action, can set up no defense against the judgment which his vendor could not have set up. Gallagher v. Congregation, 35 La. Ann. 829.

(7) An inscription of the minor's mortgage preserves the mortgage during the entire tutorship, though it continues for more than 10 years; but, if not reinscribed within 10 years after its termination, the mortgage will perempt. Lemee v. Thompson, 34 La. Ann. 1041; Civil Code, art. 3369.

(8) When, after the minor's mortgage has been preserved by the required legal inscription, and he has attained his majority, and a liquidation of his tutor's indebtedness to him by a judgment, the inscription of this judgment is sufficient to preserve his mortgage. Smith v. Johnson, 35 La. Ann. 943.

(9) Any act under which a party claims is evidence against him, not only as to its particular object, but as to all recitals relating thereto. Pilcher v. Prewitt, 10 La. Ann. 568.

(10) Declarations in authentic acts bind the parties, and may be used against them by third persons. Millandrue v. Jury, 8 Mart. (N. S.) 134.

(11) Notice to a former owner as to any matters connected with the property will bind one who subsequently acquires it from him. Linton v. Guillotte, 10 Rob. (La.) 357.

(12) One not charging those under whom he claims with fraud is bound by their admission. Leefe v. Walker, 18 La. 1; Brooks v. Morris, 6 Rob. (La.) 175.

(13) All the parties to a deed are bound by the recitals therein, whether privies in law, privies in blood, or privies in estate, and such recitals are conclusions against them.

(14) The legal mortgage is that which is created by operation of law, (Civil Code, art. 3287;) and, being general in its nature, it binds all the property, present and future, of the debtor, (Id. art. 3288.)

(15) The legal mortgage of the minor on the property of his tutor affects all the immovable property of the tutor from the day of his appointment, even the property which he sold before the rights of the minor against him had arisen into existence. Skipwith v. Glathathany, 34 La. Ann. 28.

(16) The constitutional convention, which provided for the registry of mortgages previously tacit, was not designed to change the established jurisprudence, but to put parties dealing with the tutor on their guard, and to protect the interest of the minor. 34 La. Ann. 33.

(17) The law is, and always has been, that minors have a legal mortgage upon the property of their tutors from the day of their appointment until the liquidation and settlement of their final account. 34 La. Ann. 28; Civil Code, art. 3314. The registry does not liquidate the amount appearing in it, but warns third persons that, on a settlement with their tutor, the minors' claim may rise to the amount stated in the registry. 34 La. Ann. 34.

(18) A third possessor of property burdened with a minor's mortgage by the amount due by his tutor, and duly liquidated, cannot be heard to say he had no notice of mortgage when the tutor's bond has been duly rendered in conformity with the requirements of law. 34 La. Ann. 34.

(19) The possessor in good faith owes rent only from the institution of the suit, and is entitled to the value of his improvements, with legal interest from the time he made them. Duffitho v. Mayo, 27 La. Ann. 398.

(20) A possessor in bad faith owes rents. French v. Bach, 26 La. Ann. 73; Walworth v. Stevenson, 24 La. Ann. 251-253.

(21) A possessor in bad faith is liable for rents and profits, but is not entitled to compensation for improvements. Louque, Dig. p. 561, No. 13.

(22) And the possessor in bad faith is one who possesses as master, but who assumes this quality when he well knows that he has no title to the thing, or that his title is vicious and defective. Civil Code, art. 3452.

(23) The rights which are peculiar to the possessor in good faith are the rights which such a possessor has to gather for his benefit the fruits of the thing until it is claimed by the owner, without being bound to account for them except from the time of the claim for restitution. Civil Code, art. 3453, par. 1.

(24) A right which the possessor in bad faith has in common with the possessor in good faith is to be considered provisionally the owners of the thing, so long as it is not reclaimed by the true owner or person entitled to reclaim.

J. A. Snider and Joannes Smith, for defendant.

BREAUX, J. This is an hypothecary action to enforce a mortgage against certain lands owned by the defendant. Defendant filed an exception, in which it is alleged that in the judgment plaintiff seeks to enforce her mortgage is not recognized or maintained; that she has by casus omissus, or by intendment, waived or renounced her mortgage. The plaintiff was the ward of J. U. Platt. At her majority he filed an account of tutorship, showing an indebtedness,—$3,781.10. The account was homologated in the usual form, without special reference to the mortgage, by which this amount is secured as to its payment. The tutor's bond has been duly recorded, and is in evidence. The nature of the debt secures the mortgage. It exists without the necessity of its mention in the judgment homologating the tutor's account. The mortgage claimed is extant, and bears on the defendant's property. The defendant pleads in reconvention for the value of his improvements. They are alleged to be valuable, and to have greatly improved the place. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum claimed, and recognizing her mortgage. To satisfy the amount decided to be due of the demand in reconvention, it was ordered that plaintiff be allowed one-fourth of the entire proceeds of the sale, not to exceed the amount of her claim, and the defendant the remaining three-fourths of such proceeds. The plaintiff and the defendant appeal from the judgment.

A number of witnesses have testified to establish the value of the place on which the mortgage bears. The difference in the estimates is great, and varies from small amounts to considerable sums. To commence from the first, with questions of value, we note that on the 13th day of September, 1881, J. U. Platt, the mortgage debtor, sold this land for $1,000. It was sold for $3,000 in May, 1882; in 1885 for $4,960; in 1886 for $6,000; in 1887, in February, $8,000; in 1887, in July, it was sold to the defendant for $8,600. The foregoing prices can be safely consulted. As the enhancement in the value of the land is not entirely owing to the improvements, but in part to the increase in the value of land, we will consult the testimony of the witnesses to ascertain the value of each. They testify that the improvements were comparatively of little value when the place was owned by Platt, the judgment debtor. One of the witnesses for the plaintiff testifies that they were worth two dollars an acre. This is the highest estimate. The witnesses for the defendant fix it considerably less. All the witnesses differ materially about the number of acres of land cleared since the Platt sale. Those for the defendant state a larger number than those for the plaintiff. We conclude that more than 240 acres were cleared since the sale. The expense of cutting down trees and clearing the land for cultivation is estimated by different witnesses. Some have fixed the amount at $5 an acre, others at $7, others at $15 and $17. There is as much divergence in the estimate of the value of the building improvements and the machinery. Some of the witnesses have fixed it at more than $3,500, others at considerably less. In line with these estimates, the witnesses have testified as to a pro rata value of the improvements and of the land. The value of the land unimproved was estimated at $5 by five of the witnesses, and at $20 improved. Several of the witnesses have testified to less. Allowing for the increase in the value of the lands owing to other causes than the improvements, we conclude that the judgment of the district court does substantial justice in the estimate adopted. We do not understand that the principle of prorating values between the makers of improvements on lands and claimants of mortgages thereon—both in good faith—is seriously opposed. Article 3407 of the Civil Code is clear upon the subject, and leaves no room for construction. See, also, Oxford v. Barron, 43 La. Ann. —, 9 South. Rep. 479. Judgment affirmed, at appellant's and appellee's cost jointly.

CHAFFE et al. v. MACKENZIE. (No. 316.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Oct. 23, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

WRONGFUL ATTACHMENT — ACTION FOR DAMAGES —EVIDENCE OF OFFER TO COMPROMISE—APPLICATION OF PAYMENT—APPEAL-BOND.

1. Where the errors in the transcript are not imputable to the appellant, the appeal will not be dismissed.

2. The Code of Practice does not require that the bond for the appeal shall have the amount fixed in reference to the amount claimed or the value of the property seized under a writ of attachment.

3. When the judgment is for the amount of the debt claimed and damages for the wrongful suing out of the attachment, the amounts to extinguish each other pro tanto, the appeal-bond which is given in reference to the judgment is not a voluntary execution or acquiescence in the same.

4. In order to maintain an attachment there must be some proof that at the time the writ issued the defendant had done or was about to do the act charged. The intent must also exist to defraud or to give an unfair preference. But this intent can only be proved by the acts of the defendant and the conclusions to be draw from them.

5. Where the defendant makes proposals to the plaintiff to prevent suit against him in negotiating for a compromise or settlement of the debt, the offer cannot be used in evidence against the defendant, unless there is some fact or distinct liability admitted.

6. Where the plaintiff by rule prays for the production of books and papers of the defendant, and he answers that they are not in his possession or control, and no effort is made to traverse or contradict the answer, and in the progress of the trial the defendant ascertains where they are, and produces them, and offers them in evidence, this is a substantial compliance with the order, although there may be a well-grounded suspicion that through the influence of the defendant they had been secreted.

7. Where a party owes another a debt evidenced by promissory notes, and another debt on open account, on cotton shipped, and he ships cotton, and immediately draws against it to the full amount, and sometimes in excess of it, he cannot require that the proceeds of the sale of the cotton be imputed to the extinguishment of the notes, particularly when he knows from an account stated to him, to which he makes no objection, and from the course of dealing with the creditor, that the proceeds of the sale of the cotton have been imputed to the cotton account.

8. On the dissolution of an attachment on the grounds that the defendant has disposed of his property, or is about to dispose of it, with intent to defraud, the defendant can recover only actual damages, unless he shows the attachment issued from malicious motives to annoy, distress, and injure him.

(8) There must be an order signed describing the books, etc., to be produced. Code Prac. art. 473. And Code Prac. art. 140, allows the party ruled to produce books, etc., to show "by satisfactory evidence" "the impossibility of producing such documents." Id. arts. 140, 473.

Ann. 825,) defendant is relieved of the production of books, etc., as the cause was put at issue on the 9th and by rule of court fixed for trial on that day, and the rule to produce only filed on the 14th, when the case had been called for trial, and trial immediately proceeded with before jury.

(11) The case of Morrison v. Butler, 18 La. Ann. 203, which decides that the court cannot order the production of books, etc., on any other day than the day fixed for the trial of the cause, is overruled in same case (page 309) of same volume by same court between same parties, where it is decided that article 473, Code Prac., is only directory, and court may order books, etc., produced on any day. In this case no order was signed at all for the production of the books, etc., and no day fixed for their production. They were produced "on the trial," as ordered in the entry on the minutes of the court.

(12) A "transaction" or "compromise" is defined by Rev. Civil Code, art. 3071, as an agreement between parties for "preventing or putting an end to a lawsuit." An offer of compromise cannot be used in evidence. 1 Greenl. Ev. 192; 19 La. Ann. 362; 1 Hen. Dig. p. 508.

(14) "When there is a conflict in the evidence, the verdict of the jury will not be set aside," nor will the estimate of damages fixed by the jury be changed. Fox v.

Jones, 39 La. Ann. 610, 929, 3 South. Rep. 95; 37 La. Ann. 623, 655; and a long list of cases cited in 1 Hen. Dig. p. 92.

McENERY, J. The defendant moves to dismiss this appeal on the grounds: (1) Errors in the transcript, imputable to the appellants; and (2) acquiescence in the judgment.

1. The errors in the transcript are not of that character which would justify the dismissal of the appeal, even if they were imputed to the appellants. But the affidavit of the attorney is attached to the transcript, which satisfies us that the errors complained of are not to be attributed to the appellants. The error in the certificate of date of filing transcript is clerical, and fully explained. It was filed in this court in time.

2. The alleged acquiescence in the judgment is that the appeal-bond is fixed in accordance with the judgment rendered. The bond is given strictly in pursuance of article 575, Code Prac. This article does not require that the bond shall be fixed in relation to the amount claimed in the suit, or the amount of property seized under the attachment. The motion to dismiss is denied.

The plaintiffs sued the defendant on five promissory notes executed by the defendant,—one for the sum of $2,054.80, due 15th October, 1890; one for $3,097.04, due 6th November, 1890; one for $5,000, due the 15th November, 1890; one for $5,000, due 15th December, 1890; one for $5,000, due the 15th January, 1891,—all bearing 8 per cent. interest per annum from maturity. The plaintiffs accompanied their suit with an attachment. The reasons assigned for the same were that the defendant had converted, or was about to convert, his property into money or evidences of debt, with the intent to place it beyond the reach of his creditors. On the same day—24th April, 1891—that the attachment issued, the property of the defendant, comprising his mercantile establishment and a stock of goods in a branch store, and real estate in the parish of Webster, was seized. The defendant filed a motion to dissolve the attachment on the ground of the insufficiency of the affidavit, the untruthfulness of the allegations for the attachment, and insufficiency of the bond. This motion was referred to the merits. The defendant answered, in which he alleged that the notes had been extinguished by the proceeds of the shipments of cotton made by him to the plaintiffs, which ought to have been imputed to the notes, as they were the most onerous debt, and not to the open account due by the defendant to the plaintiffs. He asked for $45,000 damages, itemized as follows: First, loss of profits in his business; second, actual deterioration of his stock while in the sheriff's hands; third, deterioration in value from the reputation of being locked up and bankrupt stock; fourth, loss of business; fifth, being prevented from making collections; sixth, damage to his credit and reputation as a merchant; seventh, loss of profitable mercantile transactions and trade with a valuable and growing class of customers; eighth, damage to his feelings, annoyance, mortification, and vexation; ninth, counsel fees incurred in defending the attachment. S. D. Rawlins intervened in the suit. The case was submitted to a jury. There was a verdict and judgment for the defendant dissolving the attachment, with $30,000 damages, and allowing plaintiffs' demand; the debts to extinguish each other pro tanto. The intervention of Rawlins was dismissed. The plaintiffs have appealed.

The evidence fails to sustain the allegations in plaintiffs' petition that the defendant had converted or was about to convert, his property into money or evidences of debt with the intention to defraud his creditors or to give an unfair preference to some of them. In order to sustain the attachment there must be proof that at the time the writ issued the defendant had done, or was about to do, the act charged. The intent also must exist to defraud or to give an unfair preference. This intent, which rests solely in the bosom of the defendant, can only be shown by the acts and declarations of the defendant, and the conclusions to be drawn from them. The plaintiffs rely upon certain proposals made to plaintiffs by defendant, to the disposition of 11 bales of cotton on the day the attachment issued, and on defendant's failure to produce his books under the order of court. We think the disposition of the 11 bales of cotton has been satisfactorily explained by defendant. The proposals made to the plaintiffs were to prevent a suit against him. The amount of plaintiffs' claim was not in dispute. Before the proposition was made which was the basis of the attachment, plaintiff Chaffe and the defendant had had a conference at defendant's house in relation to the manner in which defendant's indebtedness could be liquidated. After this the claim was put into the hands of plaintiffs' attorney, who notified the defendant to meet him and one of the plaintiffs at Monroe. The object for which the conference was called is thus stated by plaintiffs' attorney: C. J. Boatner, sworn on part of plaintiffs, states "that the interview between the defendant and Mr. West, of plaintiffs' firm, at the office of Boatner & Lamkin, of Monroe, was for the purpose of ascertaining if defendant would pay or secure the payment of plaintiffs' claim against him. Defendant made certain propositions to the plaintiffs in settlement of their debt, but nothing in compromise, as I understood it; defendant claiming that plaintiffs would realize their claim in full, and there being no contest developed there as to amount of defendant's indebtedness to plaintiffs. This, so far as I heard, was what transpired between the parties." At this conference the defendant repeated what he had previously proposed to one of the plaintiffs. He also proposed to the plaintiffs that he would, for the consideration of $4,000, execute a sale to the plaintiffs of all of his property, and they could levy an attachment on the same. On a statement by plaintiffs that such a transaction would not stand a legal test, the defendant suggested the manner in which the evidence could be suppressed. "An offer to buy peace is not to be taken advantage of for purposes of evidence, unless some fact or distinct liability be admitted in the offer, since the offer may have resulted not from the consciousness of indebtedness, but from a desire to avoid litigation." Pike v. Doyle, 19 La. Ann. 363. The facts admitted to be proved by plaintiffs are not facts admitting of distinct liability, but were proposals that occurred in the conversation or negotiations to effect a settlement of the claim. The proposals were, therefore, properly rejected. But, if they were competent evidence, they would not be available for the purpose of sustaining the attachment. The proposition or offer was made to plaintiffs for their benefit. It would have probably authorized an attachment by another creditor, but it is not apparent in what manner the offer to plaintiffs has injured them, or in what manner the intent to defraud his other creditors could justify an attachment on a preferred sale which would inure exclusively to their benefit. There is no evidence that any such proposition was made to any other creditor.

Article 140 of the Code of Practice declares that courts may, at the request of one of the parties, decree that the other party bring into court the books, papers, and other documents which are in his possession, and which are material in the cause, provided the party requesting their production declares in writing and on oath what are the facts he intends to establish by such books, papers, or other documents; and, on the refusal of the party thus called upon to comply with the order, the facts stated and sworn to shall be considered as having been confessed until satisfactory evidence of the impossibility of producing such documents. Under this article the plaintiffs filed a rule on the defendant to produce his books, papers, etc., on the day fixed for the trial. He answered that the books, etc., were not in his possession or control, but were in his store-house, which was under seizure. No effort was made on the part of plaintiffs to show that the books and papers called for were in defendant's possession. Search was made for them in the store-house, but they could not be found. A telegram was received from defendant's former clerk, designating the place where they were placed. They were then produced and offered in evidence by the defendant, but objection was made by plaintiffs. There were very suspicious circumstances attending the secreting of the books in a desk in the store-house, probably induced by defendant's instructions to his clerk. But they were produced before any attempt had been made to compel the defendant to show the impossibility of his producing them. The production of the books and papers was a substantial compliance with the order, as there had been no trial on the rule to produce, establishing the truth or falsity of defendant's answer to the rule.

Defendant avers in his answer that the notes sued on have been extinguished by the proceeds of cotton shipped to plaintiffs. The acquiescence, silence, and consequent approval of the stated account furnished the defendant by the plaintiffs are an effectual disposal of this part of the case. Bloodworth v. Jacobs, 2 La. Ann. 28; McLear v. Hunsicker, 29 La. Ann. 540. The evidence fully sustains plaintiffs' demand on the notes. There seems to be no serious controversy on this point.

The only remaining question is to ascertain the amount of damages suffered by the defendant by the illegal seizure and detention of his property and interruption of his business.

(1) Loss of profits in business. There is no evidence whatever to base any calculation of damages on this item. It is true the defendant aggregates the amount of his loss, but he does not state a single fact or circumstance to sustain his estimate. It is a bare declaration, and the same may be said of items 5 and 7. He does not show that he has lost anything from this source.

(6) Damage to his credit and reputation as a merchant. The defendant owed the plaintiffs a large amount. He was unquestionably insolvent, although this fact was not generally known. The plaintiffs had a right to sue for their debt. His real condition would then have been disclosed. The loss of credit resulted from the suit, and not from the attachment alone. We do not think that the attachment proceedings have been the direct cause of his loss of credit. The witnesses upon whom he relies for an estimate of damages on this item were mainly those whose claims he had discounted, thus establishing a credit with money he obtained from the plaintiffs, and which ought to have gone to purchase cotton to liquidate his indebtedness. But there is no evidence that he has suffered a loss of credit in any particular direction. The witnesses say before the attachment they would have credited him; that his commercial standing was good; but since the attachment, knowing his condition, they would not extend credit to him. His financial condition was a fact soon to be disclosed by the suit without the aid of the attachment. Byrne v. Gardner, 33 La. Ann. 8.

(8) Damage to his feelings, annoyance, mortification, and vexation. On this item there is no evidence upon which to make an estimate, even were it, in a case like this, admissible. It is not shown that the attachment was issued maliciously. Steinhardt v. Leman, 41 La. Ann. 835, 6 South. Rep. 665.

(9) Counsel fees. We think $1,000 a just estimate of the services of the counsel in dissolving the attachment. The case has evidently been one of protracted litigation, and the amount involved is large.

(2) Damage to stock and property by the attachment. The goods seized have evidently been damaged by the seizure. The defendant's witnesses, in estimating the damage, have done so without a personal inspection of the goods. They base their estimates solely upon hypothesis. And the witnesses for the plaintiffs, who examined the stock, did not do it with that particularity to detail which would give an exact estimate. It shows, however, that the stock was a broken one, consisting mostly of winter goods, left over from the previous year. All the witnesses who made a personal inspection of the goods state that they were well cared for; free from dust and moths, so far as their casual examination permitted them to ascertain their condition. Some of the goods they estimate as worthless and some damaged, aggregating not more than $400. We are satisfied, however, that the estimate is too low. Experience teaches us that a stock of goods seized and stowed away in the summer months must necessarily deteriorate in value. They are generally in the hands of men unaccustomed to handle them, and unacquainted with the many methods used for their preservation. Dust will necessarily accumulate, moths will appear, and their general appearance by frequent handling will not add to their salability. The evidence of all the witnesses shows that a stock of goods held over from one season to the other deteriorates in value, and the estimate is from 20 to 30 per cent. The greater portion of these goods was winter stock from the previous winter. The season had passed for their sale. The stock seized was inventoried at $20,800 cash price. Deducting 20 per cent.,—the lowest estimate for depreciation,—the cash or salable value would be $16,640. All the witnesses agree that a stock of goods known as bankrupt stock depreciates in value regardless of its condition. This estimate is from 25 per cent. to 60 per cent. Adopting, as a fair per cent., 25, we will estimate the damage on the value of the stock—$16,640—at $4,150. We therefore estimate the damages suffered by the defendant for attorneys' fees and damage to stock of merchandise at $5,150.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be amended so as to allow the defendant $5,150 damages, and in all other respects it be affirmed; the appellees to pay costs of appeal.

BONNER et al. v. BEAIRD. (No. 305.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Oct. 28, 1891. 42 La. Ann.)

ASSIGNMENT OF CLAIM — RIGHTS OF DEBTOR—VALIDITY—CONSIDERATION—LITIGIOUS RIGHT.

A defendant having availed himself of a written compromise, signed by only one of the parties to the suit, and having had the suit dismissed, in which certain rights were reserved to the party who signed, is as bound as if he had signed the writing. The transferee's claim being subject to any of the equities which the debtor may have against the transferrer, the debtor is without interest to inquire into the transfer. The transferrer being estopped from claiming ownership of the claim transferred, the debtor can safely pay to the transferee, and is without right to have the transfer declared a nullity. The validity or consideration of the transfer or the want of consideration is of no concern to him, unless he can show injury. The claim is not a litigious right, although a suit may be necessary for its recovery.

BREAUX, J. Plaintiffs sue to recover the balance due on an annuity the defendant owed to his mother, at the rate of $500 per annum. Mrs. M. C. Bonner sues to recover a fifth interest in this claim by right of inheritance from her mother, and her husband sues as transferee by purchase from three co-heirs of his wife. The fifth heir is the defendant, who filed a general denial, and, in addition, specially denied that the alleged transferee is the owner of any part of the claim, and in the alternative alleges that, if he is the owner, he is the transferee of a litigious right. The defendant further answers that, should it be found that the agreement with his mother was as alleged by the plaintiffs, he should have credit for the amount of his mother's board, medical attention, and other services, as shown by his account. In November, 1880, the mother, Mrs. Beaird, instituted suit against her son, J. H. Beaird, to recover a large amount due by him. This suit was compromised. One of the conditions of the compromise on the part of the mother was that defendant should pay her the sum of $500 per annum during her life.

The judgment, in the suit compromised, reserved to the plaintiff the right to demand the annuity of the defendant. The right was recognized by the reservation, but was not made executory. The defendant takes issue with plaintiffs, with reference to his agreement, and contends that the consideration was to support his mother as long as she continued to live with him, and, should she reside elsewhere, he was to pay the $500 a year to cover the costs of her maintenance. The relinquishment made was not unqualified, but specially stipulated a price to be paid annually, as it reads in the reservation incorporated in the judgment. The understanding and agreement, such as now contended for by the defendant, is not sustained by any expression in the judgment. The defendant procured a writing, signed by his mother, agreeing to the dismissal of the suit, and acknowledging payment of certain demands, for the consideration of an annuity. At his instance, the writing authorizing this judgment was filed in evidence on December 20, 1880, and judgment was entered in his favor. He paid the fee of the attorney, for his mother, and availed himself of the expressions in his favor. The mother died March 28, 1889, and at the date of her death defendant owed $3,625, less certain credits. One-fifth of this amount due belongs to the defendant as heir of his deceased mother. The defendant questions the validity of the transfer of the claim, and denies that one of the plaintiffs is the owner of the interest sued for by him. The evidence discloses that there was a written transfer by three of the heirs made to one of the plaintiffs of all their title and interest to this claim; that the price was not fixed in dollars and cents. There was no intention expressed to donate the claim and to formally place the transferee in charge of the claim as donee. The transfer appears to have been absolute. All the transferrers testify in the case, and state that the claim was transferred. Two of these witnesses state the consideration (although undefined as to the amount) as an indebtedness they desired to satisfy. The objection is interposed that the transfer, being without price, was not a sale; that as a donation it was null, as it was not passed before a notary and two witnesses, as required by article 1536 of the Revised Civil Code.

In business transactions no particular form and specific instrument is required in the transfer or assignment of a debt. The assignment or transfer need not be in writing. "It has been decided that the judgment debtor will not be heard in charging the nullity and simulation of the transfer by the original creditor, unless he shows, not only that there was fraud between the contracting parties, but that he was injured thereby. Unless the debtor has equities which could be pleaded against the original creditor, he is without interest to inquire into the transfer." There is an unbroken line of authorities maintaining that principle. Gray v. Trafton, 12 Mart. (La.) 703; Succession of Delassize, 8 Rob. (La.) 259; Long v. Klein, 35 La. Ann. 384; Stockmeyer v. Oertling, 38 La. Ann. 101.

The transferee of the claim holds the rights of the transferrers, and is subject to the defense which the debtor may have against the latter. In the case of Keane v. Goldsmith, 14 La. Ann. 349, there was no written evidence of any transfer, and the parol testimony on the subject was somewhat contradictory as to the nature of the transfer. "A part of the testimony goes to show that the obligation was transferred upon conditions or events which have never happened. The transferrer's knowledge and acquiescence precluded him from gainsaying the validity of plaintiff's title, and a payment by the debtor to the transferee was held valid, and as an absolute protection against any pursuit upon the obligation in controversy." The witnesses testify that a transfer was made. The defendant is estopped from denying the ownership, and he cannot be injured by the transfer. We will not decide that a transfer is absolutely gratuitous, it not appearing that a donation was intended. All the parties to the transfer are estopped from denying the ownership.

The appellee contends that the demand of appellant M. A. Bonner must fail, for the reason that he is the transferee of a litigious right. At the time the claim was transferred the probabilities were that the defendant would refuse to pay it, but it does not appear that the transferee was aware of an absolute determination, on the part of the debtor, to deny the justness of the claim, and to compel the owners to bring suit for its recovery. The authority of McDougall v. Monlezun, 38 La. Ann. 223, a well-considered decision on the subject, is not favorable to defendant's position. Counsel admit that their defense cannot prevail, unless that decision be overruled. Article 2653, Rev. Civil Code, in terms defines a "litigious right." As was held in the quoted case, we discover no reason to supplement the definition given in article 2653, Rev. Civil Code, by reference to that contained in article 3556, Rev. Civil Code. If we were to accept the last definition of "litigious rights" (that in article 3556, Rev. Civil Code) as being "those which cannot be exercised without undergoing a lawsuit," the defendant has not brought this claim within its meaning, for it is not proven that plaintiffs were aware of his determination to undergo a lawsuit. Defendant's account contains various items for board, washing, servants' hire, nursing, clothing, and medical bills, from December 21, 1881, to March 28, 1889. Of the amount, the learned judge of the district court has allowed $1,934 as a credit. If the credit is allowed by the court, the plaintiffs admit the correctness of this amount, except the allowance of $20 per month for board and lodging. The board, they contend, should not be more than $10 per month, and nothing for nursing. Considering that the mother was sick a great part of the time, required care and attention, we readily accept the amount fixed as reasonable. The defendant contends that a larger amount should be allowed. He says that he has furnished needed tonic and clothing. The district judge's statement with reference to said credits impresses us as being correct, and we therefore accept his figures, and the correctness of his views respecting them, as expressed in his elaborate opinion.

The plaintiffs contend that there is error in allowing legal rate of interest from judicial demand; that it should be allowed on the respective amounts at the end of each year of the annuity. There was mutual indebtedness, and not the least demand had been made prior to suit. No interest is allowed on the claim prior to judicial demand, and none to the defendant.

The total annuity is	$3,625
	$1,691

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment of the court a qua, in favor of the plaintiff Mary C. Bonner, wife of M. A. Bonner, for the sum of $338.20, with legal interest from judicial demand, be affirmed, and that the judgment appealed from be reversed in all other respects. It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that plaintiff M. A. Bonner recover judgment against the defendant for the sum of $1,014.60, with 5 per cent. interest from judicial demand, and that appellee pay the costs of appeal.

LEVY v. LAKE, Sheriff, et al. (No. 306.)

MORTGAGES—JUDGMENT—RECOGNITION OF MORTGAGE—FI. FA.—LEVY.

The holder of a mortgage, with the pact de non alienando, who has proceeded against the mortgagee via ordinaria, and recovered a judgment for his debt, with recognition of his mortgage, has the right to issue a fi. fa. on such judgment, and to seize the mortgaged property regardless of alienations which are inoperative against such a mortgage, and without notice to or process against the third possessor. Bienvenu v. Insurance Co., 33 La. Ann. 218, affirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Caddo; S. L. TAYLOR, Judge.

Suit by S. Levy, Jr., against John Lake, as sheriff, and others, to enjoin the seizure and sale of certain lands on execution. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Land & Land, for appellant.

(1) A judgment is a fiat of the court settling the rights of the parties, and, however unjust, erroneous, or illegal the settlement may be, the parties can only claim under it that which, by its terms, the judgment awards. 40 La. Ann. 512, 4 South. Rep. 494.

(2) A judgment in personam, recognizing a special mortgage, and decreeing that the plaintiff is entitled to priority of payment out of the proceeds of the sale of the property made pendente lite in another suit, does not warrant the seizure and sale of the mortgaged premises in the hands of a third possessor, under a fi. fa. issued against the original mortgagor, especially when the judgment is prefaced with the statement that the prayer for the seizure and sale of the poperty need not be granted.

(3) Under a writ of fieri facias, the sheriff can seize only the property of the defendant. An order or decree of seizure and sale is essential to the enforcement of a mortgage. When this order or decree is embodied in a judgment in personam, then the property may be lawfully seized under a fi. fa. in the hands of a third possessor, if the mortgage contains the pact de non alienando.

(4) A judgment recognizing a mortgage, and decreeing its payment out of the proceeds of a sale affirms the sale and remits the creditor to the fund for satisfaction. Surely, a third opponent is not entitled to the seizure and sale of the property already sold, on a judgment fixing his right to participate in the proceeds of the sale.

Wise & Herndon, for appellees.

(1) Where a mortgage contains the pact de non alienando, one who subsequently purchases the property from the mortgagor cannot claim to be in any better condition than his vendor. Any alienation in violation of the pact de non alienando is null as to the creditor; and, where the mortgage contains the pact de non alienando, a purchaser from the mortgagor, subsequent to the mortgage, will be considered as standing in the place of the mortgagor, and as subject to the same liabilities. 4 La. Ann. 325; 8 La. Ann. 58.

(2) A prior mortgagor creditor, who holds a mortgage which contains the pact de non alienando, may pursue the property in the hands of a third holder without resorting to the dilatory proceeding by an hypothecary action. This is true, though the property may have been bought by the third holder at sheriff's sale. 23 La. Ann. 339; 24 La. Ann. 551; 29 La. Ann. 820; 33 La. Ann. 218.

(3) The third holder of such property is not a third possessor, nor entitled to the rights of one.

(4) The holder of a mortgage note secured with such a pact may proceed against the property and the mortgagor without making party to his suit any third owner, either via executiva or via ordinaria, and just as if the property had not changed owners. 33 La. Ann. 213.

(5) Damages are allowed on dissolution of an injunction of specific property in same suit. 15 La. Ann. 52; 31 La. Ann. 677.

FENNER, J. Cahn, who was a creditor of S. N. Ford on a debt secured by a special mortgage on property of Ford containing the pact de non alienando, proceeded via ordinaria against Ford to obtain judgment against him for the debt, together with the recognition and enforcement of his mortgage. The suit resulted in the following judgment: "Wherefore, the law and evidence being in favor of plaintiff, it is by reason thereof ordered, adjudged, and decreed that plaintiff do have and recover of defendant S. N. Ford the sum of thirty-six hundred and ten and 20-100 dollars, with 8 per cent. interest from March 1, 1888, and 5 per cent. thereon as attorney's fees, and that plaintiff's special mortgage be recognized on lots 5, 6, 7, and 8 of block 61 of the city of Shreveport." He proceeded to issue a writ of fi. fa. on this judgment, under which he seized the property on which his mortgage rested, which mortgage is expressly recognized by the judgment. He is met by this injunction suit instituted by plaintiff, who alleges that he is the owner of the property, under a judicial sale made in execution of a junior mortgage placed thereon by Ford, and contends that the property cannot be seized under Cahn's judgment against Ford, but that Cahn must resort to the hypothecary action, and give him the notices required in such an action. We think the contention is silenced by our decision in the case of Bienvenu v. Insurance Co., 33 La. Ann. 218, where we said: "Appellant contends that Bienvenu, having taken a judgment against Lalourie, and having issued a fi. fa. under his judgment, could not in law proceed against appellant's property without process against him. It is not disputed that by proceeding via executiva the holder of a mortgage containing the pact de non alienando can ignore any subsequent alienation of his mortgagor, and follow the property in any hands, without notice to the subsequent vendee or possessor. And it therefore appears that we are called upon to recognize a difference as to the mortgage rights of plaintiff between the two modes of proceeding. But such a difference does not exist either in reason, logic, or law. The holder of a mortgage importing confession of judgment is authorized by law to proceed by executory process against his debtor's property, and we cannot see how any of his mortgage rights can be restricted by a judgment of a competent court, condemning his debtor personally, to pay the debt and recognizing his mortgage rights. We understand, on the contrary, that by such a judgment the rights of the creditor are enlarged instead of being curtailed or abridged. We are at a loss, therefore, to perceive any strength in the position that a creditor, proceeding via ordinaria, is debarred from following the property of his mortgagor in the hands of any vendee, and without process against such vendee." The foregoing decision covers this case like a blanket. It would, indeed, be a strange anomaly to hold that a creditor having a mortgage with the non-alienation clause evidenced only by an authentic act, and only importing a confession of judgment for the debt claimed, can seize the mortgaged property in the hands of any third possessor without notice to or process against him; but that when he not only holds the same authentic evidence of the mortgage, but has had, in addition, his debt and mortgage ascertained and recognized by a final judgment of a competent court, he thereby forfeits his right to invoke the same remedy. The fact that the decree did not specifically order the seizure and sale of the mortgaged property is of no moment. The judgment recognizing the mortgage recognized all its stipulations, and authorized its enforcement in the manner and to the extent which those stipulations, under the law, justified, including the right under the non-alienation pact to seize the mortgaged property, regardless of any alienation, which was inoperative as against such a mortgage, and without necessity of notice or process to or against any party but the mortgage debtor himself. We notice the prayer for an amendment of the judgment, by increasing the damages allowed, only to say that the allowance made by the district judge is conservative, and sufficient to satisfy the requirements of justice.

Judgment affirmed.

FLOWER et al. v. O'BANNON. (No. 313.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Oct. 28, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

FACTORS—ACCOUNT STATED — LIMITATIONS—IMPUTATION OF PAYMENTS—MORTGAGES — EXTENSION BY IMPLICATION—ACCOUNTING.

1. When accounts between factor and planter have been repeatedly rendered to the latter, and have been received without objection, and with petitions for indulgence and promises to pay, he cannot afterwards question the correctness of the items thereof, or of the charges of interest therein contained.

2. Prior, at least, to Act 78 of 1888, such accounts became stated accounts, prescriptible only by 10 years. The act of 1888 need not be construed in this case, because under no view could it operate the prescription pleaded.

3. If the debtor do not impute his payments when made the creditor may do so, and, if he make such imputation, and inform the debtor thereof by account rendered, which the debtor receives without objection, he cannot afterwards question the imputation.

4. Mortgages cannot be extended by implication to secure any other obligation than that expressly mentioned. A mortgage, given to secure "$2,500 for money advanced and acceptances made and to be made during the present year," cannot be extended to cover advances made after the expiration of the year, and to do so by any implication from the subsequent dealings between the parties would involve the creation of a mortgage by parol or implication.

5. Where the balance due at a particular time in long accounts has never been struck, and cannot be ascertained without numerous and difficult calculations, this court will not undertake such labor, but will remand the case for the purpose of ascertaining the amount.

6. Judgment reversed and case remanded on a single point.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Claiborne; ALLEN BARKSDALE, Judge.

Suit by Flower & King against J. W. O'Bannon to enforce a mortgage given to secure a balance on an account. Judgment for plaintiffs, who appeal therefrom. Reversed, and new judgment entered, which, on rehearing, is amended.

H. H. Hall and J. W. Halbert, for appellants.

(1) Prescription: "A written acknowledgment is not necessary to constitute an account stated. An account rendered, unless objected to within a reasonable time, is an account stated, compte arrêté, from its presumed approval." 28 La. Ann. 605. 26 La. Ann. 208; 27 La. Ann. 133; 20 La.

Ann. 119; 19 La. Ann. 185; and authorities cited on page 208, 26 La. Ann.

(2) Interest and commissions: "Where mercantile accounts have been closed by rendition and acceptance without objection, the debtor cannot thereafter object to charges of 8 per cent. interest, and to compounding interest by capitalization of succession of balances." 39 La. Ann. 788, 2 South. Rep. 602. "A stipulation in a contract between a planter and a commission merchant, by which the former agrees to secure the latter in a certain amount in any event, is not illegal, and may, therefore, be enforced against the planter, notwithstanding he has failed to make a crop." 23 La. Ann. 201. Vide, also, 24 La. Ann. 159.

(3) Imputation of payments: Article 2163, Civil Code: "The debtor of several debts has a right to declare, when he makes a payment, what debt he means to discharge." Article 2165, Civil Code: "When the debtor of several debts has accepted a receipt by which the creditor has imputed what he has received to one of the debts specially, the debtor can no longer require the imputation to be made to a different debt, unless there has been fraud or surprise on the part of the creditor." 30 La. Ann. 1225: "Payments made by a debtor without special instructions as to their imputation will be imputed in accordance with the tacit agreement of the parties as disclosed by their dealings and correspondence. A debtor who receives, without objection, an account current from his creditor, which imputes payments made by him to the less onerous part of his debt, is held to ratify by his silence the imputation of payments made in the account." "It is therefore false doctrine to say that, where a factor who has made advances to a planter, and who has a mortgage upon his plantation to secure an antecedent debt, receives the crop of the planter, the proceeds of the crop must be imputed first to the payment of the mortgage debt, the residue going to discharge the debt incurred for supplies. The privilege vests upon the crop, and this privilege the crop must first discharge before any part of it may be applied to any other obligation." Richardson v. Dinkgrave, 26 La. Ann. 657, and also 43 La. Ann. 1. Bloodworth v. Jacobs, 2 La. Ann. 24: "The debtor has the right to make the imputation of any payment made by him. If he do not exercise this right, the creditor may do so. When a debtor has accepted a receipt, in which a payment is imputed to a particular debt, it is irrevocable, unless in cases of surprise or fraud on the part of the creditor. Civil Code, art. 2161." Dunbar v. Bullard, 2 La. Ann. 810: "Where a factor sends an account to his principal at the usual time, in which certain imputations are made by the former, and the latter affirms it, or receives and acquiesces in it, and no fraud or surprise is complained of, the imputation of payment must be considered as having been made by the authority of the principal, the ratification of the acts of the factor being tantamount to original imputation by the principal and relating back to time of the acts which are the subject of ratification." Wilson v. Lewis, 6 La. Ann. 774: "Where the plaintiff had carried on the business of making advances to a party on consignment, payments made to them in the course of that business will be imputed to the mercantile accounts, and not to a mortgage note held by them on the party."

(4) The mortgage: "Mortgages, under the hypothecary system of Louisiana, may be given to secure debts having no legal existence at the date of mortgage. It is not essential, in such a mortgage, even with respect to third persons, that it should express on its face that it was executed to secure future debts. It may be described as a security for existing debts, and yet used to protect those which, in the contemplation of the parties, were to be created at a future time." 7 La. Ann. 288, 307. "It is the eventual balance in the account current that is covered, not the isolated items as they fluctuate through its successive operations. Whilst running, it cannot be arrested at a particular period, when, by an offset of debits and credits, they might be equally balanced, the account destroyed, and the mortgage extinguished. The account cannot thus be disintegrated. An aggregate is to be formed of its component parts. Until the balance be struck, the relation of debtor and creditor cannot be determined. On that balance it is—with whose ebb and tide it rises and falls—that the mortgage finally fastens itself, and which it finally secures." Hen. Dig. p. 940, No. 17; 7 La. Ann. 308.

J. E. Moore and J. A. Richardson, for appellee.

When there is a question of payment the payment will be imputed to the debt bearing a mortgage. 15 La. Ann. 174; Loque, Dig. p. 517, par. III., "Of the imputation of payment."

In order to interrupt prescription it must be acknowledged in writing. Acts 1888, No. 78; Civil Code, art. 3538.

An acknowledgment must not only be in writing, but must be of the debt claimed. 36 La. Ann. 407.

FENNER, J. The motion to dismiss has no merit, and is overruled. Plaintiffs sue defendant for a balance of account, and for the recognition and enforcement of a mortgage which they claim to hold to secure the same. The questions involved logically divide themselves into two branches: (1) The amount of defendant's indebtedness to plaintiffs; (2) the extent to which that indebtedness is secured by the mortgage.

1. We think there can be no doubt that plaintiffs are entitled to recover a personal judgment against defendant for the full amount claimed. The dealings between the parties were in account current running from March, 1887, to 1890. Detailed statements of the account were repeatedly rendered to defendant, who received the same without objection, and made requests for indulgence and repeated promises to pay. It is too late for him now to contest the correctness of the items of the account, which, however, we consider sufficiently proved, and not discredited. His objections to the charge of 8 per cent. interest, and to compounding of interest, are defeated by our decision in Allen v. Nettles, 39 La. Ann. 788, 2 South. Rep. 602, where we said: "Defendant now seeks to overhaul these accounts from 1881, and claims, and was allowed, a deduction of $407.01 for overcharges of interest at 8 per cent., and from the compounding thereof by capitalizing, in the succeeding accounts, the balances from those preceding. We think this was error. So far as these matters are concerned, the defendant cannot go beyond the accounts which have been rendered and accepted by him, without objection." The plea of prescription of three years against the earlier items of the account cannot avail. An account rendered, and not objected to within a reasonable time, is an account stated, and only prescribed by 10 years. Darby v. Lastrapes, 28 La. Ann. 605; Blanc v. Scruggs, 26 La. Ann. 208, and other authorities therein referred to. Such was the undoubted law, at least up to the adoption of Act 78 of 1888, which prescribes all accounts by three years. We need not presently construe this act, because it was only passed on July 12, 1888, after the accounts had been rendered and converted into stated accounts prescriptible by 10 years. This suit was brought on May 2, 1890. On no basis of calculation of the prescriptive term could it have accrued prior to this suit.

2. Defendant claims that the debt secured by the mortgage was entirely extinguished by payment, on the ground that all the remittances and the proceeds of cotton shipped by him should be imputed to the mortgage as the most onerous debt. It is not pretended that defendant declared any special imputation when he made the payments. On the other hand, the accounts rendered by the plaintiffs show that they imputed the payments otherwise than to the mortgage indebtedness, the accounts stating the balance due as remaining secured by the mortgage. The law on the subject is well stated in the following authorities, cited in plaintiffs' brief: Article 2163, Civil Code: "The debtor of several debts has a right to declare, when he makes a payment, what debt he means to discharge." Article 2165, Civil Code: "When the debtor of several debts has accepted a receipt, by which the creditor has imputed what he has received to one of the debts specially, the debtor can no longer require the imputation to be made to a different debt, unless there has been fraud and surprise on the part of the creditor." McLear v. Hunsicker, 30 La. Ann. 1225: "Payments made by a debtor, without special instructions as to their imputation, will be imputed in accordance with the tacit agreement of the parties as disclosed by their dealings and correspondence. A debtor who receives without objection an account current from his creditor, which imputes payment made by him to the less onerous part of his debt, is held to ratify by his silence the imputation of payments made in the account." Bloodworth v. Jacobs, 2 La. Ann. 24: "The debtor has the right to make the imputation of any payment made by him. If he do not exercise this right, the creditor may do so. When a debtor has accepted a receipt, in which a payment is imputed to a particular debt, it is irrevocable, unless in cases of surprise and fraud on the part of the creditor. Civil Code, art. 2161." Dunbar v. Bullard, 2 La. Ann. 810: "Where a factor sends an account to his principal at the usual time, in which certain imputations are made by the former, and the latter affirms it, or receives and acquiesces in it, and no fraud or surprise is complained of, the imputation of payment must be considered as having been made by the authority of the principal; the ratification of the acts of the factor being tantamount to original imputation by the principal, and relating back to time of the acts which are the subject of ratification." Wilson v. Lewis, 6 La. Ann. 774: "Where the plaintiff has carried on the business of making advances to a party on consignment, payments made to them in the course of that business will be imputed to the mercantile accounts, and not to a mortgage note held by them on the party." Moreover, as appears from the mortgage, the advances were made to aid defendant in his planting operations, and were specially secured by a privilege on his crops, and, as heretofore held, the proceeds of the crop were imputable to the privilege, and not the mortgage. "It is therefore false doctrine to say that where a factor, who has made advances to a planter, and who has a mortgage upon his plantation to secure an antecedent debt, receives the crop of the planter, the proceeds of the crop must be imputed first to the payment of the mortgage debt, the residue going to discharge the debt incurred for supplies. The privilege vests upon the crop, and this privilege the crop must first discharge before any part of it may be applied to any other obligation." Richardson v. Dinkgrave, 26 La. Ann. 657, and also Bank v. Meyer, 43 La. Ann. 1, 8 South. Rep. 433. We encounter a question of greater difficulty in determining what part of the debt is, or was ever, secured by the mortgage. The mortgage was not given to secure advances generally, or to secure any resulting balance of account without limitation as to time. Its terms explicitly declare that it is given "to secure the sum of $2,500 for money advanced and acceptances made and to be made during the present year." Plaintiffs seem to consider that the "present year" means the year running from the date of the mortgage, but such is not a natural construction of the words in their ordinary use, which obviously suggest the year 1887; and this is confirmed by the fact that the notes given to represent the debt matured, respectively, on 1st December, 1887, and 1st January, 1888. We cannot see our way to holding that this mortgage was intended to secure, or did secure, advances or acceptances not made during the year 1887, or any balance of account beyond that existing on the last day of that year. We have held that "mortgages are so far stricti juris that they cannot be extended by implication to secure any other obligation than that expressly mentioned." Schadel v. St. Martin, 11 La. Ann. 175. This principle is unquestionably sound. We should violate it grossly if we acceded to the suggestion of plaintiffs' counsel that by the dealings of the parties the security of the mortgage has been extended to cover subsequent advances. We must look for the obligations of a mortgage in the act itself. To extend them beyond the plain terms of the act on evidence such as that here suggested would be to create a mortgage by parol or by implication, in violation of the express provision of the Code, which declares: "A conventional mortgage can only be contracted by an act passed in presence of a notary and two witnesses, or by an act under private signature. No proof can be admitted of a verbal mortgage." Defendant never granted, and plaintiffs do not hold, any mortgage to secure anything except "the sum of $2,500 for money advanced and acceptances made and to be made during the present year."

We have thus solved all the questions in the case except that of the amount due on the account of plaintiffs on 31st day of December, 1887, for which amount they are entitled to a recognition and enforcement of their mortgage, together with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. from the 31st day of December, 1887, until paid, and for the additional amount of 5 per cent. on the gross amount so due on the mortgage as attorneys' fees. No balance has ever been struck of the account of plaintiffs as it stood on the 31st of December, and it requires an accountant to ascertain the exact balance then due, involving a calculation of interest on all the numerous items,—labor which cannot be thrown on this court. We shall therefore be compelled to remand the case on this point. It is therefore adjudged and decreed that the judgment appealed from be avoided and reversed, and it is now adjudged and decreed that there be judgment in favor of plaintiffs and against the defendant, J. W. O'Bannon, for the sum of $2,500.35, with interest at 5 per cent. per annum from April 6, 1890, and costs of suit; and it is further adjudged and decreed that plaintiffs' mortgage herein sued on be recognized and enforced to the extent of the balance due by defendant, as shown by plaintiffs' accounts rendered, on the 31st day of December, 1887, together with 5 per cent. interest on said balance from said date, and 5 per cent. attorney's fees on the amount of principal and interest of said balance when ascertained. And for the purpose of ascertaining the balance so due on December 31, 1887, the case is remanded to the lower court, with instructions to ascertain the same, and render judgment therefor in accordance with the opinion and decree; defendant and appellee to pay costs of appeal.

ON REHEARING.

Both parties claim amendment of the decree, and in exact justice each is entitled to some relief.

1. The defendant's application claims that the accounts rendered by plaintiffs on April 5, 1889, and April 6, 1890, were not acknowledged. This is not correct as to the first account, no objection to which was urged until March, 1890, after it had been acquiesced in by prior correspondence. But it is correct as to the final account of 1890, and we think the charges made therein of 8 per cent. interest and 2½ for advancing on balance of former account of April 5, 1889, should be reduced to 5 per cent. interest. This reduces the amount due on account sued on to $2,382.61, and we shall amend the judgment accordingly. The commissions charged on cotton not shipped were proper under the agreement and dealings of the parties, and other objections of defendant have no merit.

2. The application of plaintiffs demonstrates beyond question that the balance due on December 1, 1887, as shown by account rendered and acknowledged, considerably exceeded $2,500, the amount of the mortgage stipulated. Therefore the mortgage vested to the entire amount, and there was no necessity for remanding the case to ascertain a fact patent on the record. It is therefore now ordered and decreed that our former decree herein be amended by reducing the principal of the judgment against defendant from $2,500.35 to $2,382.61; and, further, by recognizing and enforcing the mortgage of plaintiffs on the property described therein for the full amount of this judgment, together with 5 per cent. attorneys' fees on the principal and interest thereof, and by canceling that part of the decree which remands the case; and that, as thus amended, the said decree be maintained.

CHASE v. HIBERNIA NAT. BANK OF NEW ORLEANS. (No. 10,857.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Dec. 14, 1891. 44 La. Ann.)[1]

CORPORATIONS — LIABILITIES TO STOCKHOLDERS—TRANSFER OF STOCK BY WIFE—ESTOPPEL—PRESCRIPTION.

1. The rights and duties of both the stockholders and the corporation whose stock they hold grow out of a contract implied in a subscription for stock.

2. A married woman, who owns shares in a corporation, is not relieved from all losses caused by her acts.

3. A wife, having transferred her certificate of shares to her husband, and having had noted the transfer on the books of the corporation, the husband having subsequently sold these shares, she having brought suit against him for separation of property, and in her petition having claimed the proceeds, and judgment having been obtained recognizing her rights, cannot recover as an error of the corporation to which she contributed, and which she made her own by her judicial declaration, sufficiently to enable the defendant to maintain the plea of prescription of 10 years, running from the day judgment was rendered in her favor, decreeing her to be the owner of the proceeds of the sale of the shares.

4. If the wife aid her husband in converting her estate into cash, so that he can use it, it is her fault, and she must blame herself if he uses such cash in payment of his debts, and if other people act on the confidence which her conduct implies.

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; ALBERT VOORHIES, Judge.

Suit by Kate Sherry Chase against the

[1] Rehearing refused January 4, 1892.

Hibernia National Bank of New Orleans to recover certain shares of stock. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George L. Bright, for appellant. Jos. C. Gilmore and Saml. L. Gilmore, for appellee.

BREAUX, J. Plaintiff, before her marriage, was the owner of 20 shares of the capital stock of the Hibernia Bank of New Orleans. She was married to Charles H. Chase on the 5th of November, 1870. She collected three dividends of her shares after her marriage. On the 6th day of November, 1872, she transferred these shares to her husband by written instrument. No consideration was paid; none is expressed in the transfer, except the customary "for value received" of bills and promissory notes. An entry of transfer was inscribed on the books of the bank. On the 23d of September, 1873, Chase transferred these shares to Joseph Maristany, and they were, from time to time, thereafter transferred to different parties. The capital stock of the bank was twice reduced; also the number of shares. Those claimed by plaintiff were reduced to 16 at first, and in the fall of 1886 this number was reduced to 12. Six hundred dollars were paid on the last of these shares called in, and nothing on the first. The Hibernia Bank has been reorganized, and is now the Hibernia National Bank. Plaintiff kept a bank-account at this bank. The defendant had no notice of an adverse claim of plaintiff before the 1st day of December, 1890,—some eight months after her husband's death. Plaintiff sued her husband for a separation of property. She alleged in her petition for a separation that she was the owner, at the time of her marriage, of property, which she described, and that her husband assumed its administration, and sold the Hibernia Bank shares for the sum of $2,640, and that the total appropriated to his own use was $14,100, less $2,500 of the said amount, which was invested in her name in a lot of ground as an investment of so much of her paraphernal funds. During the trial for a separation of property she introduced in evidence the certificate of the cashier of the bank, to prove the transfer of the shares to her husband on the 6th day of November, 1877, in said suit. She obtained a judgment against her husband for a separation of property, and for $11,620, and for recognition of her rights to the lot in her name. A writ of fi. fa. was issued under the judgment, and was returned "not satisfied." The purpose of this suit is to recover from the bank the value of the shares, alleged as being $5,000, and the dividends, amounting to $6,000. The plaintiff appeals from an adverse judgment.

Plaintiff's counsel, in support of her claim, ably argues the proposition that the transfer to the husband is an absolute nullity, which cannot, in any respect, avail the bank in its defense. The wife parted with her possession of the certificate of shares in favor of her husband, and was a party to the error committed by the officer of the bank in entering a note of the transfer on its books. There can be no question that the bank should have refused to act, and should have declined to incur any responsibility. We are called upon to determine whether the responsibility still exists. The plaintiff, by her voluntary act, without marital influence, severed her relations with the bank as a shareholder. She placed her husband in charge, and gave him control. There was at least an inchoate transfer made, which, by admission or the lapse of time, could become legal. The bank from that time was, by the registry of the stock, the trustee of the husband. He collected a dividend while the stock was in his name. After many years of acquiescence she called on the bank for the shares, as if only a few days had elapsed, and no intention of transferring them had ever been entertained. The husband had the administration, as alleged by her, and she placed these shares in his name. There was, to say the last, something of a conversion from this time. Miller v. Handy, 33 La. Ann. 164. In business matters, if other people act on the confidence in the husband, which the conduct of the wife justifies, the wife must blame herself. Succession of Gilmore v. Baily, 12 La. Ann. 562.

Plaintiff sued to dissolve the community, and for judgment for different amounts, among them that realized by her husband from the conversion of the certificate of shares. In the present suit the wife erroneously testified that her husband never had at any time assumed the administration of her property. She obtained judgment for the proceeds of these certificates. Had she sold them to her husband, as now contended, he would have been responsible for the price, and not for the amount received by him when he sold them. The wife cannot escape the effect of these proceedings, and pass them as if void. Her declarations to obtain the judgment were made with the legal authority of the judge. Estoppel by judicial declaration will not apply to escape the effect of marital influence. There is no intimation of such influence. She is therefore bound by the conversion, and the judgment made conclusive by the lapse of time. She cannot be allowed to shift her position at will. In her first suit, with legal evidence, she maintained the allegation that her husband sold these bank shares and received the price, with the exception of an amount expended from these proceeds and others, in purchasing property for her, which he owned, and obtained judgment. In the present suit she purposes to ignore those proceedings entirely, and recover judgment, as if she had never parted with the title, and had never placed her husband in possession of the certificate. Plaintiff contends that the conversion dates from the date of her demand for their delivery. The error is not of that date. The delivery of the shares, and her judicial declarations, fix an earlier day. A corporation is ordinarily justified in treating the assignee and holder of certificates of stock as the owner. Wiltbank's Appeal, 64 Pa. St. 256. Although the principle does not justify a corporation in making an illegal registry, when the owner calls alone and has the transfer noted, knew that they were transferred into third hands, and claimed the proceeds, the dates of her acts and declarations cannot be left out of all consideration. "The relation of stockholders to the corporation whose stock they hold is that of contract, and the rights and duties of both parties grew out of contract implied in a subscription of stock." Ditch Co. v. Elliott, 10 Colo. 327, 15 Pac. Rep. 691. When the wife is one of the parties to such contract, she is not relieved from every care and concern of an owner.

There can be no estoppel, plaintiff urges, because the transfer made by the wife to the husband—the basis of defendant's liability—was made years before the institution of her suit against her husband, and that defendant was not thereby induced to change its position. The estoppel is not by recitals of a deed or by conduct. The plea is based on the solemn act of a competent court, which plaintiff has executed in part at least. Judicial declarations are accepted as true without regard to any influence they may have had on the party in whose behalf they are pleaded.

Relative to the suspension of prescription, article 3525 of the Revised Civil Code is quoted as applying. The husband is not bound in warranty to the bank. The act was that of the wife, which she has made clearly hers. The error, if actionable, would give right to damages owing to defendant's negligence, which do not give a right to cite plaintiff's husband in warranty. The plea of prescription interposed by the defendant is a bar to plaintiff's demand. Plaintiff's right of action accrued more than 10 years prior to the institution of this suit. More than that length of time had elapsed from the date of a judgment in her favor decreeing her to be the owner of the price for which the property was sold by her husband. Judgment affirmed, at plaintiff's costs.

BENNETT v. SAME. (No. 314.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Oct. 26, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION—PROBABLE CAUSE.

In case reputable citizens are wantonly and illegally arrested and incarcerated in jail on "trumped-up" and purely gratuitous charges of grave crimes committed, and thereafter the prosecutor confesses that his only purpose was to procure immunity from prosecution for his brother for the same offense, the prosecution is malicious, and without probable cause, and damages should be awarded.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Claiborne; ALLEN BARKSDALE, Judge.

Consolidated suits of J. F. Pace against J. P. Awbrey and P. A. Awbrey, and of J. C. Bennett against the same defendants, to recover damages for a malicious prosecution. Judgment for each plaintiff as against defendant J. P. Awbrey, who appeals. Affirmed.

McClendon & Seals, for appellant.

(1) Suits for damages for a malicious prosecution are contrary to public policy, and are reprobated by the courts. 41 La. Ann. 511, 6 South. Rep. 815; 40 La. Ann. 375, 4 South. Rep. 72; 12 La. Ann. 53; 15 La. 278.

(2) To maintain such a suit it must affirmatively appear that the prosecution was "tainted with two concurrent vices." First, malicious motive; second, want of probable cause. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 454; 33 La. Ann. 919; 40 La. Ann. 375, 4 South. Rep. 72.

(3) "Malicious motive" has a technical meaning, and is composed of bad feelings and a consciousness that the prosecution is groundless.

(4) "'Probable cause' does not depend on the actual state of the case in point of fact, but upon the honest and reasonable belief of the party prosecuting." 2 Greenl. Ev. § 455; 15 La. Ann. 337; 10 La. Ann. 537.

(5) The probable cause of any particular case depends upon the surroundings, as viewed by the prosecutor of that case.

(6) A person who insures his house for twice its selling value is guilty of fraud.

(7) A person who sees a negro set fire to his neighbor's house, and leaves without giving the alarm, is guilty of a crime.

(8) Persons who go to jail at their own instance, under the advice of counsel, have not been damaged thereby.

(9) A defendant who is slandered in a suit for damages has a right to recover.

J. A. Richardson and J. E. Moore, for appellees.

Malice is proved in this case by direct testimony.

"Probable cause" means reasonable grounds of belief, supported by circumstances sufficiently strong to warrant a cautious man in the belief that the accused is guilty of the offense charged. Dillon v. Linox, 33 La. Ann. 392.

For an action for malicious prosecution the discharge of plaintiff by the committing magistrate is prima facie evidence of want of probable cause sufficient to throw upon the defendant the burden of proving the contrary. Barnholdt v. Lorrillard, 36 La. Ann. 103; Weil v. Israel, 42 La. Ann. 955, 8 South. Rep. 826.

WATKINS, J. These consolidated suits are, each one, respectively against the defendants in solido for $5,000 damages for a causeless and malicious prosecution of said plaintiffs, respectively, wholly without probable cause, and with malice and ill will. On these issues of fact and law the causes were consolidated, and put to a jury, who rendered a verdict of $500 in favor of each of the plaintiffs against J. P. Awbrey alone, with cost. From that verdict, and the judgment thereon rendered, that defendant has appealed; the other defendant having been discharged.

The following is a substantial synopsis of the principal facts to be considered: On the 13th of October, 1890, the defendant J. P. Awbrey made a sworn complaint before a justice of the peace of the neighborhood against the two plaintiffs, charging them with having set fire to and burned the dwelling-house of the plaintiff J. F. Pace on the 9th of October previously. On this charge the accused parties were arrested and incarcerated in jail for a short while, pending the preliminary examination. A hearing was had before the judge of the district court on the 4th of November following, and thereat they were discharged. Subsequently the case was duly presented to the grand jury, and they ignored the complaint. It appears that some time recently, previous to these occurrences, Leon Awbrey, a brother of J. P. Awbrey, had been on trial for the burning of his own store-house and hotel to obtain the insurance; that he was acquitted of the charge, but another prosecution was pending against him, connected therewith; and that the plaintiffs, Pace and Bennett, had been prominent as witnesses against said Leon Awbrey, while the defendant J. P. Awbrey had been a witness for his brother aforesaid. The residence of Pace was consumed by fire soon after this trial was concluded, and public suspicion was directed against Leon Awbrey and a negro living with him. An affidavit was made against Leon Awbrey on the day after the fire, and he disappeared; and two days subsequently J. P. Awbrey made the stated complaint against the plaintiffs. J. P. Awbrey was at the time cognizant of the complaint against his brother, had inquired into the matter, and consulted with friends. On the night plaintiff's house was burned, a conversation between him and a friend was overheard in reference to the proceedings that were to be taken to relieve Leon Awbrey, and to suppress the warrant against him. In accordance therewith, the friend and counselor of the defendant J. P. Awbrey visited a village in the community, with the purpose in view of effecting a compromise; and, pursuant thereto, intimated that the affidavits against the plaintiffs would be withdrawn. An additional, important, and confirmatory fact—one worthy of due consideration—is that an apparently trustworthy person states that on the very date the plaintiffs were arrested and jailed the defendant J. P. Awbrey told him "he had sworn out [the] warrant against Pace and Bennett, but that he did not intend to have them arrested, and that he had sworn out the warrant to effect a compromise of the case against his brother;" that the defendant stated his object to be "to get up a compromise in his brother's case, and get the people of Athens to withdraw the warrant; that he would leave the community. He wanted to be free, so he could take his family with him." There is a great deal more of this kind of evidence in the record, and, in our opinion, it makes out quite a clear case for damages. It is manifest that the charges brought against the two plaintiffs were "trumped up," and purely gratuitous. That they were not seriously made, nor well grounded, is shown by the defendant J. P. Awbrey's own statements. The prosecution of the plaintiffs was wholly and confessedly without probable cause. Weil v. Israel, 42 La. Ann. 955, 8 South. Rep. 826; Savoie v. Scanlan, 43 La. Ann. 150, 9 South. Rep. 916. The appellees have requested no increase in the allowance awarded, and the appellant assigns no special ground for relief, and none is apparent. We think the jury were moderate in their appreciation of the damages sustained, but they followed precedents. Judgment affirmed.

STATE v. SIMMONS. (No. 295.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Oct. 22, 1891. 48 La. Ann.)

MOTION TO QUASH INDICTMENT — CHALLENGE TO VENIRE — COSTS IN CRIMINAL CASES — ATTORNEY'S FEES.

1. Motion to quash an indictment on a challenge to the general venire, based on alleged irregularities in the manner of drawing and summoning the jurors, is properly demurrable when it alleges neither fraud, wrong, nor injury.

2. In absence of express statutory authority, the fees of counsel acting as counsel for accused, in obedience to an assignment by the court, cannot be taxed as costs to be paid by the parish.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of De Soto; W. P. HALL, Judge.

Indictment against Gus Simmons for murder. Verdict of guilty, and judgment thereon. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. W. Sutherlin and J. W. Parsons, for appellant.

(1) Section 11 of Act 44 of 1877 requires that all objections to the manner of drawing juries must be urged on the first day of the term; but the letter of the statute cannot be rigidly enforced in all instances, when circumstances render it impossible to do so. Where the term of court begins on the 3d, and is adjourned to the 6th, when the indictment is presented and counsel assigned, the accused being in jail, and unable to employ counsel, a motion to quash indictment and challenge to the venire made on the 7th, before arraignment, is seasonably made. 19 La. Ann. 436; 31 La. Ann. 387, 398; 41 La. Ann. 513, 6 South. Rep. 471; 41 La. Ann. 679, 6 South. Rep. 583.

(2) The venire must be drawn in accordance with section 4 of Act 44 of 1877, p. 56. 29 La. Ann. 824; 20 La. Ann. 356, 442.

(3) The fees of counsel assigned by the court for the defense of an accused unable to employ counsel, like all other expenses attending criminal proceedings, must be paid by the respective parishes, and taxed as costs. This view is supported by precedent and sound public policy. The assignment of counsel is indispensable to the trial, and "as essential to the due examination of the case as counsel for the prosecution; and to leave the services of the one unremunerated is as impolitic as it would be to leave the services of the other unremunerated." Const. art. 8; Rev. St. §§ 992, 1042; 25 La. Ann. 381; 33 La. Ann. 979; 36 La. Ann. 91; 37 La. Ann. 267, 606; 38 La. Ann. 23; 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. (3d Ed.) §§ 304-306; Whart. Crim. Pl. §§ 557-559.

J. C. Pugh and J. Henry Shepherd, Dist. Attys., for the State.

(1) In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to defend himself, and have the assistance of counsel. Article 8, Const. Where the accused cannot employ counsel the judge should assign one. State v. Doyle, 36 La. Ann. 91; State v. Viana, 37 La. Ann. 606; State v. Simpson, 38 La. Ann. 23.

(2) Courts can require lawyers to act as counsel in cases where the accused are unable to pay, on the ground that they are officers of the court, bound to perform official duties; for they are a necessary part of the administration of justice. 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. p. 305.

(3) The state, as a sovereign, owes no costs in litigation before her own courts, even when cast in a civil suit. State v. Taylor, 33 La. Ann. 1272; 34 La. Ann. 978; Succession of Kate Townsend, 40 La. Ann. 66, 3 South. Rep. 488.

(4) No irregularity in drawing, summoning, returning, or impaneling grand or trial jurors furnishes ground for challenging the array, or is sufficient to set aside a verdict, unless it operated to the injury of the party complaining. Thomp. & M. Juries, 63, 143; State v. Harris, 34 La. Ann. 118; State v. Rector, 35 La. Ann. 1098; State v. Sandoz, 37 La. Ann. 376; State v. Gonsoulin, 38 La. Ann. 459.

(5) All objections to the manner of drawing juries, or any defect or irregularity that can be pleaded against any array or venire, must be urged on the first day of the term. Acts 1877, § 11 of Act 44; State v. Price, 37 La. Ann. 215.

FENNER, C. J. The defendant, convicted of murder, and sentenced to be hung, assigns but one complaint of error in the proceedings, which consists in the overruling of his motion to quash the indictment, based upon a challenge to the general venire. His objections to the venire are stated as follows: "Neither the clerk of this court nor the jury commissioners have ever made or kept a list of the names of three hundred good and competent men, from which the venire for each term of court is by law required to be drawn, nor has any such list ever been kept complete and supplemented from time to time by said clerk or jury commissioners, as required by law; and that the pretended list kept by the clerk of the court was not kept and maintained at the original standard of 300, as required by law; nor have the names of those who have served, nor of those who are known to have died, removed from the parish, or become exempt or disqualified to serve as jurors, since their names were entered thereon, been stricken therefrom; but that the pretended list from which the venire for this term of court were drawn contained the names of more than one thousand persons, many of whom had previously served, and who are known to have died and removed from the parish and become exempt or disqualified from jury service." The motion to quash was met by a demurrer on two grounds, viz.: (1) That the challenge to the array was not pleaded on the first day of the term, as required by section 11 of Act 44 of 1877. (2) That the motion made no averment of fraud or great wrong or of injury to defendant. The trial judge sustained the demurrer.

The letter of the statute is very peremptory that all objections to the array or venire "must be urged on the first day of the term, or all such objections shall be considered as waived, and shall not afterwards be urged." We have, however, held that the statute does not require impossibilities, and have recognized certain cases to which it could not be applied. State v. Sterling, 41 La. Ann. 680, 6 South. Rep. 583; State v. Strickland, 41 La. Ann. 513, 6 South. Rep. 471; State v. Vance, 31 La. Ann. 398. The defendant here urges certain circumstances as bringing his case within a necessary exception to the statute, the sufficiency of which, however, we need not presently consider, because we hold the second ground of demurrer to be conclusive. The same statute which directs the methods to be pursued in the drawing of juries specifically provides that "no such defect or irregularity in the drawing thereof, or the summoning of the jury, shall be sufficient cause [to challenge the venire] if it shall not appear that some fraud has been practiced, or some great wrong committed, that would work a great and irreparable injury." We have uniformly enforced this requirement of the statute. State v. Gonsoulin, 38 La. Ann. 459; State v. Sandoz, 37 La. Ann. 376; State v. Rector, 35 La. Ann. 1098; State v. Harris, 34 La. Ann. 118; State v. Dozier, 33 La. Ann. 1362; State v. Smith, Id. 1414. We find every inducement to adhere to this line of decisions. The inconvenience and delay occasioned to the administration of criminal justice by the setting aside of the venire are too grave to be lightly incurred on account of irregularities which have arisen from no fraud, and resulted in no injury. There is no suggestion that the 50 names drawn from the general venire-box to compose the grand and petit jurors for the first week of the term were not good, true, and qualified jurors, or that the grand jury selected from said number, and which found the indictment against defendant, was not composed of qualified jurors, honest and impartial. What more does justice require? Defendant has alleged neither fraud nor injury, and therefore the statute and jurisprudence silence his complaint. The attempt to assimilate these irregularities in the proceedings of a qualified jury commission to disqualifications of the commission itself is not sound. The curative effect of the statute applies only to defects or irregularities in the proceedings of the commission, not to defects in the constitution of the commission; and therefore, in the latter case, allegation and proof of specific fraud or injury are not required.

2. The defendant in this case being unable to employ counsel, the attorneys who represent him acted under assignment by the court. They took a rule to have their fees taxed as costs of the case to be paid by the parish. The judge denied the rule, and from his judgment the attorneys have appealed. We can find no warrant for the relief asked. There is certainly no precedent for it in this state. The subject is referred to by Bishop and Wharton. 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. § 304 et seq.; Whart. Crim. Pl. § 558 et seq. They cite an Irish case, in which the chief baron said, in a case of such service, "that he should certainly recommend that the fee should be paid by the crown." It also appears that in some states of the Union civil actions have been maintained against counties for remuneration for such services. They refer to no case in which such fees have ever been taxed as costs in criminal proceedings in absence of express statutory authority. It would be manifestly unjust to do so, because the parish is not a party to a criminal case, and is certainly entitled to be heard on such a demand. There is no such statutory authority in this state. It is true that section 1042, Rev. St., provides that "all expenses whatever attending criminal proceedings shall be paid by the respective parishes;" but no statute includes such attorney's fees among those expenses. On the contrary, Act No. 7 of 1877, entitled "An act to regulate and limit the liability of parishes of this state for costs and fees in criminal proceedings," makes no reference to such fees, and impliedly excludes them. The better doctrine seems to be that followed in Massachusetts, Illinois, California, Pennsylvania, Georgia, Alabama, Arkansas, and Montana, where, as stated by Mr. Bishop, the county is held not liable unless made so by particular statute. We shall adopt and follow this rule until the legislature shall otherwise direct. Judgment affirmed.

CRESCENT CITY BREWING CO. v. FLANNER.

(No. 10,782.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Nov. 30, 1891. 44 La. Ann.)[1]

CORPORATIONS—POWERS OF DIRECTORS—SALE OF LAND—PURCHASE BY DIRECTOR.

1. The board of directors of a corporation has the undoubted right to sell property of the corporation to pay its debts.

2. But when the board of directors sells the property to one of the members of the board to pay debts, it must appear that there was a necessity for the sale; that the property was bought by the director in open market, at a fair price, without any undue advantage over the corporation, in good faith, and without the slightest unfairness.

3. When the board of directors who sold the property made the sale necessary by its mismanagement, one of the directors on said board will not be permitted to purchase the property.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Judge.

Suit by the Crescent City Brewing Company against Joseph Flanner to set aside a certain conveyance of land. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Harry H. Hall and W. S. Benedict, for appellant. Buck, Dinkelspiel & Hart, for appellee.

MCENERY, J. The Crescent City Brewing Company, under the laws of this state, organized in 1887, as a corporation, for the purpose of purchasing vacant or unimproved real estate in the city of New Orleans, and constructing thereon and conducting a brewery for the manufacture of beer and malt liquors, and for the sale of all products of the brewery. Its capital stock was $250,000, in 2,500 shares, of the value of $100 each. The powers of the corporation were executed and its business managed by a board of directors composed of five stockholders, a majority of whom constituted a quorum. In pursuance of article 11 of the act of incorporation, on the 17th day of September, 1887, the company purchased (1) a square of ground in the second district in the city of New Orleans, designated by the municipal number 188, bounded by Canal, Custom-House, Claiborne, and Robertson streets; (2) a certain piece or portion of ground, comprising about three-fourths of a square, designated by the municipal number 187, bounded by Canal, Custom-House, Robertson, and Villere streets,—the whole price being $100,000. The property last described is that in controversy. Joseph Flanner, who purchased the above-described property from the company, was a member of the board of directors when he made the purchase. On the 19th of July, 1888, a special meeting of the board of directors was called for the purpose of disposing of said property. At the meeting of the board a resolution was adopted which recited that the above property was idle capital, and it was resolved to sell the same to Joseph Flanner for the sum of $20,000. The president was authorized to transfer the property to Flanner. Flanner was present, and voted blank, and one of the directors voted nay, on the motion to adopt the resolution. The deed was made to Flanner, and he went into possession of the property. On the first Monday in February, 1890, a new board of directors was elected, and at its first meeting, February 3, 1890, a resolution was adopted repudiating the action of the former board in selling the property to Flanner, the former director and vice-president of the board, and authorized a tender to be made to him in conformity to law, and, on his failure to retransfer said property to the company, suit should be instituted against him for the property. The tender was duly made, and Flanner refused to accept the same and retransfer the property. This suit was then instituted to avoid the sale to Flanner as illegal, and avoidable, as an unfair and suspicious transfer of property by a trustee to himself, he being one of the board of directors who derived pecuniary, substantial advantage therefrom. On the 17th May, 1890, the New Orleans Brewing Association purchased all the property and assets of the Crescent City Brewing Company. The property in controversy was conveyed, among the other assets, with a recital of the pendency of this suit for its recovery; and the New Orleans Brewing Association was authorized to have itself recognized as party plaintiff therein, to carry on the suit at its own expense and for its own account to final termination. It appeared in court, and was subrogated, and entered of record as plaintiff. The corporation acted within a reasonable time in the institution of this suit to set aside the sale. The first board of directors, elected after the sale occurred, at its first meeting, repudiated the sale, and authorized this suit. It does not appear that any meeting of the shareholders had been called, and this sale submitted to them for ratification, nor does it appear that they had any notice of the transaction.

In a case similar to the instant one, where the relations of the parties gave rise to suspicions, this court, in the case of Hancock v. Holbrook, 40 La. Ann. 53, 3 South. Rep. 351, announced the principle of law which should govern, as follows: "As a strictly legal question, the right of a board of directors of a corporation to apply its property to the payment of its debts, and the right of the majority of the stockholders present at a meeting called for the purpose to ratify such action and to dissolve the corporation, cannot be questioned. But when such action is taken at the instance and through the influence of the president of the corporation, and when the debt to which the property is applied is one for which he is himself primarily liable, and especially when he acquires in his personal right the property thus disposed of, such circumstances undoubtedly subject his acts to severe scrutiny, and oblige him to establish that he acted with the utmost candor and fair dealing, for the interest of the corporation, and without taint of selfish motive. Oil Co. v. Marbury, 91 U. S. 590." And to the same effect is the doctrine in Morawetz on Private Corporations, (volume 1, § 527,) which says: "But a transaction between a director and a corporation, even if the latter was represented by a majority of the board, will always be scrutinized by the courts with strictness, and will be set aside at the suit of the corporation upon proof of the slightest unfairness or imposition practiced upon it. A director will not be allowed to obtain any advantage over the corporation of which he is agent, through his position, on the information which he has obtained of the affairs of the corporation, or his influence over his co-directors." The circumstances attending the sale were of that character which will not bear the above test. It is alleged in the resolution which authorized the sale that it was idle property. The defense is that the sale was a necessity, as the affairs of the company were in a desperate condition, and it was necessary to sell the property in order to raise money to complete the brewery building. The property was purchased for the use of the brewery,—is an absolute requirement to its successful operation. It was necessary to have a separate lot from the one on which the brewery building was located, under the United States revenue laws, for a bottling establishment. This is made certain by the fact that, after the property was purchased by Flanner, he leased a part of it to the company, from which he had purchased it, for the very purpose for which it had been originally bought. That he thought it would be necessary for the company to repurchase it, is apparent from the declaration that he would resell to the company on reimbursement of the purchase price. This declaration he afterwards affirmed under oath in the proceedings in the United States court, in the matter of the application for the appointment of a receiver. The sale therefore was not advantageous to the company, but, on the contrary, was an obstacle—an embarrassment—to the successful operation of the brewery. The sale does not seem to have been an imperative necessity. The outstanding subscriptions for stock had not been collected, and there were bonds of the company unsold. But in this desperate condition of the company, before the sale of any property which was essential for its success, the stockholders should have been convened, and their interest consulted. The record shows that the wreck of the company was through the fault and mismanagement of the board of directors who sold the property to one of its members. This is the judicial admission made by the board in the matter of the appointment of the receiver in the United States court. It is said that this was only a pro forma admission for the purpose of having a receiver appointed, but it is nevertheless the solemn judicial admission of the board of directors. It would be the grossest injustice to the stockholders, and against the soundest principles of public policy, to permit a board of directors, to whom the offices of the corporation have been committed, under the plea of the necessity to pay the debts rendered necessary by their mismanagement, to sell the property of the corporation, and to become the purchasers. The sale was not made in open and fair market, but by agreement among the directors. Several persons were asked to purchase the property. But in a large commercial city it would be unreasonable to suppose that the directors could by private inquiry exhaust the list of buyers. It would have been prudent, at least, to have fixed a minimum price on the property, and offered it to the public through the usual channels for selling city property. There were several auctioneers consulted, but it seems their advice was solicited more in the interest of protecting the purchaser than fixing a just price on the property. That Flanner bought the property for his own interest and advantage, with a view of its speculative value, is, we think, fully disclosed in the record. According to his own statement, he sacrificed in securities more than $3,000 to raise the cash to pay for the property. Subsequent events proved it a profitable investment. He refused, in accordance with his own sworn declaration, to retransfer the property to the company; and the lease of the property to the brewery, and his estimated value of $10,000 on a part of it show that the company lost by the sale. We do not reflect upon the motives of the directors nor of the purchaser. They had no intention of committing a fraud upon the stockholders, and no actual "fraud" has been committed, within the ordinary meaning of the word. They undoubtedly thought they were at the time acting for and in the interest of the corporation, in the desperate condition of its affairs, and the sale of the property, under the circumstances, would be justified. They took the advice of their attorney, who advised the sale. But the corporation suffered an injury, nevertheless, and the relations of the parties were such that the law will not permit the slightest advantage to appear against the corporation of which the purchaser is a director. Such acts are held constructively fraudulent and voidable, at the election of the principal. Judgment affirmed.

FARELLY v. METAIRIE CEMETERY ASS'N et al. (No. 10,765.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Nov. 30, 1891. 44 La. Ann.)[1]

CEMETERIES—POWERS OF OFFICERS—LIMITING INTERMENTS—INJUNCTION—PARTIES.

1. The acts of defendants, intrusted with enforcing rules and regulations of an association, do not bind them so as to prevent them from recognizing changes that may have taken place since the title-deeds were issued to lots in its cemetery.

2. They have the right to limit all interments in lots to the members of the family owning lots, and their relatives.

3. The plaintiff not having been placed in charge of the property, it having been placed by the testatrix in charge of another, she cannot recover judgment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Judge.

Injunction by Kate Farelly against the Metairie Cemetery Association and others to restrain them from placing the remains of a deceased person in a certain tomb. Judgment for defendants dissolving the injunction. Plaintiff's application for a new trial was overruled, and she appeals. Affirmed. Rehearing refused.

Aug. Bernau, for appellant. Gus. A. Breaux and Charles B. Stafford, for appellees.

BREAUX, J. Mrs. Kate Farelly, the plaintiff and appellant, was granted a writ of injunction against the Metairie Cemetery Association; also against the sexton of the cemetery, and against the sisters of St. Mary's Catholic Boys' Orphan Asylum. In her original petition she alleged that she is the sole heir of Mrs. Mary Burke, her late aunt, who was the owner of a tomb in Metairie cemetery, which by the will was left in charge of the sisters of the asylum before mentioned, for the burial of the members of her family; that the defendant had given authority to bury in this tomb a deceased person not related to her family, and that his remains would be placed therein unless defendants are enjoined. In a supplemental petition she alleged error in her original petition in having alleged that she is the sole heir, there being other heirs and legatees. There was no objection made during the trial to this supplemental petition, not supported by affidavit or bond. It was placed at issue by answer, and is now properly part of the pleadings. In their answer the defendants aver that plaintiff is without title or interest in the tomb claimed by her; that it was paid for by Edward Burke, the deceased husband of the late Mary Burke, or by the executor of his will; that, if this tomb was a part of the property of the succession of the late Mary Burke, it was left by her will in the care and charge of the sisters of St. Mary's Catholic Boys' Orphan Asylum. The sisters of this asylum, having been joined in this answer with the other defendants, without their consent, and in error, presented a separate defense, in which they alleged that they are absolutely without interest, as the St. Mary's Catholic Boys' Orphan Asylum is a chartered institution, of which they are not the legal representatives. This asylum is represented by a board of directors. On the trial it was proven that Edward Burke died in June, 1880. His heir is a daughter,—Mrs. Goddin. By last will he appointed Augustine Burke his executor, and made him his residuary legatee. In September, 1880, 5 lots of ground, containing 360 superficial feet, were purchased for the sum of $500, and the title issued in the name of Mrs. E. Burke. Plaintiff's witness, the president of the association, testifies: "The title to lots in the cemetery is made out to the one to whom the party paying for them directs, and the appearance of the latter, as a party signing the deed of purchase, is not required." Another witness for plaintiff identified the lots in which the remains of Mrs. Burke now lie, and testified that the tomb is the Burke tomb. The secretary of the St. Mary's Boys' Asylum testifies that on reading Mrs. Burke's will they were informed that their board had charge of the tomb, but, as they had never been authoritatively placed in possession of the tomb, they never took any special steps in the premises. By him it was proven that application had been made to place the body of Mrs. Etherel Stafford, a niece of E. Burke, in the Burke tomb. He wrote in answer that the asylum could not raise any objection to the use of the tomb by actual relatives of Mrs. Burke. The plaintiff does not oppose the placing of the remains of Mrs. Stafford in the tomb. The contention arises in opposition to placing the remains of her husband, Etherel Stafford, in that tomb. A receipt was filed in evidence, showing that the executor of E. Burke's estate paid at one time $1,000 "on account of tomb built for the estate." The entire cost of the tomb, viz., $3,150, was paid for by the executor of that estate, with the written approval of Mrs. Burke and of Mrs. Goddin, his daughter. The executor filed a final account, which was opposed by his widow, in which she claimed to be refunded the amount paid by her for the lots. Mrs. Burke died in 1884. She bequeathed one-eighth of her property to the St. Mary's Boys' Asylum, and left the tomb in charge of that institution. The plaintiff also was one of her legatees. Plaintiff pleads the authenticity of the transfer to Mrs. Burke under sections 386 and 387 of the Revised Statutes, and that it cannot be defeated by parol. The defendant contends that under the rules and regulations of the association all interments in lots in the cemetery are restricted to the members and their relatives, and that it devolves upon them to enforce these rules and regulations. It is admitted that the sisters of St. Mary's Catholic Boys' Orphan Asylum were made parties in error, and that they are without any interest in the suit. Judgment was rendered in favor of defendants, dissolving the writ of injunction. An application for a new trial was made and overruled.

The motion for a new trial relates that the copies of deeds issued to Mrs. Burke were not introduced in evidence, for the reason that they could not be found, as they were in the possession of the executor of Mrs. E. Burke's estate, who did not know that he had them. The plaintiff objected to a question to the president of the Metairie Association, propounded with reference to the entry in their books in the name of any individual, not necessarily showing ownership, on the ground that they are estopped by the recitals of the deed of sale, and parol evidence is not admissible. The first ground relating to estoppel will be hereafter considered. As to the second, the testimony, being verbal, will not be considered in determining the rights of the parties, in so far as it does not refer to facts testified to by the witness when he was examined in chief. This witness for plaintiff testified: "When a party comes in and pays for a title, we make out the title to whoever he directs. Of course we know no one except the party he names. If he takes another man's money, and he asks us to make the title in his name, we issue it in his name, as we would in any one else's." The record discloses that the title issued to Mrs. Burke. That the tomb was paid by the estate of the husband. It was intended as a family tomb by Mrs. Burke and the heirs of her husband. In this tomb their remains should rest undisturbed. They are protected by the rules and regulations of the Metairie Cemetery Association.

She bequeathed one-eighth of her property to the St. Mary's Boys' Asylum, from which a round sum was realized, and directed in her will that the constituted authorities of that asylum should have charge of the tomb. They have not been made parties to this suit, and have not in any manner taken part in this suit. The authentic character of the recital from the defendants' books, and of the title issued, are relied upon by the plaintiff. The defendant association is bound by these, and cannot be heard to deny any of its acts in matter of the issuance of this title. But if it be shown by competent evidence that Mrs. Burke was not the owner, the defendant company can take notice of the fact, and invoke its rules, maintaining the rights of members and their families. Changes may take place; transfers may be made; agents may have acted in their own names, and afterwards acknowledged the titles of their principals; the tomb may be owned by another than the owner of the land,—in all these possible occurrences the defendant company is not estopped from applying its rules so as to carry out the interest of the organization. The trust is important. The association should not be held estopped unless grounds are manifest and conclusive. If by her acts or declarations Mrs. Burke has conclusively shown the ownership in her husband's estate, this fact can be established at defendants' instance. If, as contended by the plaintiff, the evidence is parol, it cannot prevail against the title as issued. But, if by written evidence it be proven that the price was paid by the executor from the husband's estate, the plaintiff is without right of action. The tomb was paid for by the estate of the husband. The payment was made by the executor; not as a loan to Mrs. Burke, but in satisfaction of the price. This is proven by her signature. As to the lots, she filed an opposition, claiming the amount paid by her. Counsel for the defendants state this opposition has been maintained. There is no evidence of payment of record. The payment is not denied by plaintiff's counsel. As to this plaintiff, it is manifest that, whether Mrs. Burke has been paid or not, she is without right, for the tomb has been placed in charge of the St. Mary's Boys' Asylum. If the land is not paid, its value relative to the tomb is small, of which plaintiff would own only a fractional portion were her claim allowed.

In any event, be the interest what it may, Mrs. Burke has shown a regard for the memory of her husband which strongly appeals to the equity of the court. "Her remains are now near his." Her will, as expressed, should be respected, and the charge complied with by the St. Mary's Boys' Asylum, legatees and beneficiaries. With the consent of that authority the defendant association can act in matter of enforcing their said rules and regulations.

In her motion for a new trial plaintiff alleged diligence. Questions of diligence in procuring evidence are left in great part to the district court. The plaintiff's oath that another did not know that he had these title-deeds is not sufficient to entitle her to a new trial. She testified as a witness that they had been delivered to the executor, or were seen in his possession. He was not called upon during the trial to testify with reference to his possession of these titles. Our conclusions, as above expressed, do not make it necessary to amend the judgment appealed from.

Judgment affirmed at appellant's costs.

(No. 10,881.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Dec. 14, 1891. 44 La. Ann.)[1]

TAXATION—EXEMPTION OF MANUFACTURERS—TAXABLE PROPERTY.

1. A person engaged in the manufacture of harness and saddlery in the year 1890 was protected by constitutional exemption from taxation on the capital, machinery, and other property therein employed.

2. In case such manufacturer carries with his stock of manufactured goods a small assortment of other articles, not manufactured by him, but which constitute a necessary accessory to his business, the latter is taxable.

3. If such person has been once assessed, and has paid the tax on such taxable property, an additional assessment will be annulled, as one made on non-taxable property; the proof showing that the assessment made and paid covers the full value of the taxable values of the manufacturer.

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; THOMAS C. W. ELLIS, Judge.

Suit by Smith & Boullemet against the board of assessors and others to have canceled and annulled a certain assessment. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Henry Renshaw, Asst. City Atty., and Carleton Hunt, City Atty., for board of assessors, appellants. Wynne Rogers, for state tax collector, appellant. Henry P. Dart, for appellees.

WATKINS, J. Plaintiffs, having been assessed in 1890, on "money loaned on interest, all credits, and all bills receivable, for money loaned or advanced, or for goods sold, $5,000," seek by this suit to have canceled and annulled said assessment, on the ground that the property assessed is such as is the product of materials by them "employed in the manufacture of * * * harness, saddlery," etc., and exempt from taxation under article 207 of the constitution; they being engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling saddles and harness in the city of New Orleans, and therein employing more than thirty-two (32) hands. They have an invested capital of about $60,000 in said business. Their contention is that they have no such property as that assessed save and except the "capital, machinery, and other property employed in the manufacture of saddles and harness," and the products and avails thereof, which is exempt from taxation under said article of the constitution, unless it be a small stock of goods they carry as a necessary adjunct of, and as accessory to, their business. This stock of goods consists of such articles as belt-hooks, belt-lacings, horse-brushes, curry-combs, lap dusters and robes, whips, whip-stocks, and the like. Those are non-manufactured goods, and are confessedly liable to taxation. But their statement is that they have submitted to and paid, upon an assessment of $10,000 valuation, for all those things, "although for ten years they have seldom had such an amount." They insist that the sales made of these articles are merely accidental, and not incidental to their business, and such sales constitute an infinitesimal part of their business; hence their "bills receivable and all credits" represent, in the main, the price of manufactured articles sold, and which are exempt from taxation. One of the plaintiffs swears that "of the sales of different items, exempt and not exempt, * * * to the best of [his] knowledge and belief, the tax on $10,000 that [he has paid] covers everything that Smith and Boullemet have, subject to taxation, [i. e.,] not exempt." The assessment of $5,000 that is assailed is additional to that of the $10,000 assessment, to which the witness refers. Plaintiffs' book-keeper shows that their bills receivable aggregated $4,132.37, and their open accounts about $40,000, equal to a total of $44,132.37. One-tenth of that sum is $4,413.23. This sum represents non-manufactured goods liable to taxation. But, inasmuch as plaintiffs have already paid on an assessment of $10,000, nothing is due on that score, and "the additional assessment of $5,000.00" is essentially a tax on exempt property, and consequently null. Of this the testimony clearly satisfies us, as it did our learned brother of the district court. Judgment affirmed.

Succession of ANDRIEU. (No. 10,812.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Dec. 14, 1891. 44 La. Ann.)[1]

DISCHARGE IN BANKRUPTCY—NEW PROMISE—CONSIDERATION—FRAUD—CLAIMS AGAINST SUCCESSION.

1. When a person has been discharged in bankrupt proceedings, and afterwards gives his note to a creditor for a claim on his schedule, the moral obligation to pay is a sufficient consideration for the note.

2. Where a person deals with another, who furnishes him supplies under an agreement to make monthly statements of the condition of his business, and he omits to place in said monthly statements a debt due his book-keeper, which was created before he became the employe, and which is in no way connected with the business, this is not such evidence of fraud on the part of said book keeper as to prevent his participation in the funds of the succession of the deceased employer equally with all the other ordinary creditors, including the merchant who furnished the supplies and to whom the monthly statements were made.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FRANCIS A. MONROE, Judge.

Accounting by the succession of F. Andrieu, deceased. Rene Dumestre filed an opposition to the administrator's account, so far as such account related to the claim of P. Thormaehlen as a creditor of deceased. Thormaehlen also opposed the claim of Dumestre. Decree ordering that Dumestre's claim be allowed, but not to conflict with the claim of Thormaehlen. Dumestre appeals. Modified.

Aug. Bernau, for appellant. Buck, Dinkelspiel & Hart, for appellee administrator. E. J. Wenck, for appellee P. Thormaehlen.

MCENERY, J. The administrator of the succession of F. Andrieu filed his final account, without placing the claim of Rene Dumestre thereon. He filed an opposition to the account, opposing the account generally, but afterwards restricted his opposition to the claim of P. Thormaehlen, who was placed on the account as a creditor for the sum of $30,239.69. Thormaehlen also attacks the validity of the claim of Dumestre. Dumestre is the owner and holder of a note, executed by the deceased April 4, 1887, payable to his order 12 months after date, for the sum of $2,636.76, with 8 per cent. interest thereon. Andrieu, previous to his discharge in bankruptcy, owed the opponent a certain sum of money. The amount was placed on his schedule, and the opponent voted for his discharge. After his discharge, Andrieu gave Dumestre his note for the amount, and renewed the same from time to time, the last renewal note, with accumulated interest, being the one now held by Dumestre, and upon which his opposition is founded. There is no doubt of the execution of the note by Andrieu. The moral obligation resting upon him to pay the note was a sufficient foundation for the new promise to pay, and the consideration of the note. It is therefore a valid claim against the succession. Thormaehlen started Andrieu in the shoe factory business many years ago. He entered into an agreement with the deceased, Audrieu, that he should purchase supplies only from him, and that Andrieu was to furnish him monthly statements as to the condition of his business. Dumestre, during the existence of this agreement, became the book-keeper for Andrieu. In the monthly statement furnished Thormaehlen the note of Dumestre was omitted. Dumestre states that this omission was in consequence of instructions from his employer, who told him, if the note appeared in the statements, it would cause Thormaehlen to break him up. The fact of the omission of the note from the monthly statement is urged by Thormaehlen as a reason why Dumestre should not be allowed to participate in the funds of the succession to his injury. The decree of the lower court took this view of the case presented by Thormaehlen, and ordered that Dumestre's claim be allowed, but not to conflict with the claim of Thormaehlen. From the statements in the record as to the agreement, we infer it related exclusively to the factory business conducted by the deceased, Andrieu. In the monthly statements there are some items for house rent, clothing, and some other outside transactions, but they seem to be exceptional, and were paid from funds derived from the business, and entered in the cash-book. Dumestre's note was an outside transaction, and had no reference to Andrieu's business. There was no reason why it should have appeared in the accounts of the factory business. It does not appear that Thormaehlen required any statement as to Andrieu's outside indebtedness. It is in proof that Andrieu did purchase from other parties, to which violation of his agreement it does not seem that Thormaehlen made any opposition. The monthly statement showed that Andrieu was insolvent from the time he was furnished with materials by Thormaehlen until his death. Dumestre, when he was unemployed by Andrieu, was the creditor of the deceased. He was the creditor and holder of a note which had been afterwards renewed when Thormaehlen was furnishing Andrieu. He became his clerk, and, by direction of his employer, omitted to place the note on the monthly accounts. It had not been placed there before he became the clerk and book-keeper of Andrieu. Had the indebtedness of Andrieu to Dumestre been disclosed in the monthly accounts, and Thormaehlen had proceeded against his debtor Andrieu, he would have been in no better condition than at the time of Andrieu's death. The indebtedness of Andrieu to him kept at pretty much the same figures during their business engagement. The claim of Dumestre being a legal and valid one against the succession, there is no law which provides for giving Thormaehlen's debt a privilege prior to it. They are both ordinary claims. Dumestre did not intentionally deceive Thormaehlen, and we can see no reason why his debt should not share equally with that of Thormaehlen, both being ordinary claims against the succession. Four of the notes held by Thormaehlen were executed by Andrieu's son during his father's absence. These notes were given to balance accounts, and were for goods already sold and delivered to Andrieu The accounts are fully proved, and the claim of Thormaehlen is a just one. It does not rest exclusively on the notes for the evidence of the indebtedness. It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be avoided and reversed, so far as it directs the payment of the claim of the opponent, Dumestre, after the satisfaction of the claim of Thormaehlen; and it is now ordered that the claim of Dumestre be paid proportionally and equally with all ordinary claims in the distribution of the funds in the succession of F. Andrieu. In other respects the judgment is affirmed, appellees to pay costs of appeal.

CANAL & C. R. Co. v. ORLEANS R. Co. (No. 10,887.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Dec. 14, 1891. 44 La. Ann.)[1]

STREET RAILWAY — USE OF ANOTHER'S TRACKS — COMPENSATION—EXPROPRIATION—PROCEDURE.

1. A street-railway company which is authorized by the city of New Orleans to enter upon the tracks of another must, before doing so, make compensation to that company.

2. The material in place is the private property of the company occupying the street; and, in the absence of any agreement, it must be expropriated to public uses like any other private property.

3. When the city ordinances provide the mode of compensation, and the two corporations are within the limits of the same franchise, the ordinances will control the mode to be pursued in reference to fixing the compensation, as the corporations accept their franchises with reference to said ordinances.

4. But the city ordinances cannot arbitrarily fix the amount of compensation.

5. There is no limitation in the ordinances of the city of New Orleans which prevents the street-railway companies from contracting with reference to the amount due for the use of tracks.

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; NICHOLAS H. RIGHTOR, Judge.

Suit by the Canal & Claiborne Railroad Company against the Orleans Railroad Company to recover on a contract. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Modified.

Chrétien & Suthon and Frank N. Butler, for appellant. B. R. Beckwith, for appellee.

MCENERY, J. The plaintiff sues the defendant for $2,800 on the following contract: "Be it known, on the sixth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy, and of the independence of the United States of America the ninety-fifth, before me, William Joseph Castell, a notary public in and for the parish of Orleans, state of Louisiana, duly commissioned and qualified, and in presence of the witnesses hereinafter named and undersigned, personally came and appeared Bertrand Saloy, Esqr., herein acting in his quality of president of the Orleans Railroad Company, and under and by virtue of a resolution of the board of directors adopted at their sitting on the 18th of July, 1870, a duly-certified copy of which resolution is hereto annexed, and made part hereof, of the first part, and Edward S. Wurzburger, Esqr., herein acting in his quality of acting president of the Canal and Claiborne Streets Railroad Company, and John G. Campbell, Esqr., herein acting in his quality of secretary of said Canal and Claiborne Streets Railroad Company, and under and by virtue of a resolution of the board of directors of said company adopted at their sitting of the first day of August, 1870, a duly-certified copy of which resolution is also hereto annexed, and made part hereof, of the second part, of this city. Which appearers declared that, acting as aforesaid, and in accordance with Ordinance No. 810, article 878, approved December 24th, 1867, and Ordinance No. 1443, approved May 11th, 1869, all new series of the common council of the city of New Orleans, they do by these presents bind their respective companies or corporations, their administrators and assigns, as follows: (1) That the said Orleans Railroad Company, party of the first part, shall pay to the Canal and Claiborne Streets Railroad Company, party of the second part, four (4) cents per mile for each and every mile traveled by each and every car belonging to or run by the said party of the first part on the track or trunk road from Drayades street to St. Charles street, on the upper side of Canal street, and on the lower side of Canal street from Royal to Dauphine street; the tracks on Canal street being left free and unobstructed. (2) The said Canal and Claiborne Streets Railroad Company, party of the second part, shall keep its roads, such as they now exist, on the upper side of Canal street, from Drayades to St. Charles streets, and on the lower side of Canal street, from Royal to Dauphine streets, in good order and repair. (3) That the said Orleans Railroad Company, party of the first part, shall put in and keep in good order during the time, or as long as they may use them, all necessary switches, inlets, and outlets, that may be requisite to connect their different roads with the trunk road on Canal street, and shall also put in good order and running gear such portions of the trunk road that may be necessarily disturbed to make the said connections; and said party of the first part shall furnish and pay for all switch-tending and other labor that shall be necessary in running their cars on, over, and off the trunk road on the upper and lower side of Canal street. (4) That the said Orleans Railroad Company, party of the first part, shall make monthly returns to the Canal and Claiborne Streets Railroad Company, party of the second part, of the number of cars and miles run over the trunk road on Canal street, from which returns settlements shall be made monthly; said returns to be certified by the president and secretary of said Orleans Railroad Company. (5) That the said Canal and Claiborne Streets Railroad Company shall not be responsible for any accidents to persons or damages to property arising from the carelessness or negligence of the employes of said Orleans Street Railroad Company, while running their cars on the trunk road on the upper and lower side of Canal street as aforesaid; but said party of the second part shall be responsible for all accidents or damages which may be caused by the dilapidated or bad condition of said trunk road. (6) That nothing in this contract or agreement shall be construed as preventing or to prevent the said Canal and Claiborne Streets Railroad Company from negotiating with other companies for running their cars on said trunk road on Canal street: provided the same shall not interfere with the rights of said party of the first part, and the free passage of travel of their cars on the trunk road on the upper side of Canal street, from Drayades to St. Charles streets, and on the lower side of Canal street, from Royal to Dauphine streets, as aforesaid, under this agreement or contract. (7) That this agreement shall last during the term of the charters granted to the said respective corporations or of any extension of said charters."

The right of plaintiff to recover depends upon the validity of this contract. The power to regulate and control the public streets of the city of New Orleans is lodged in the municipal authority. The object of the legislature in conferring this power, and its exercise by the city government, are to serve the public welfare and convenience. The establishment of street railroads is one of the most important modes of promoting the welfare and convenience of the citizens of New Orleans. We have held that the council of the city of New Orleans is without power to grant the exclusive use of a street which belongs to the public to a railway company. Canal & C. St. R. Co. v. Crescent City R. Co., 41 La. Ann. 561, 6 South. Rep. 849. But the street-railway company which is authorized to enter upon the tracks of another, within the limits of the franchise of both companies, must make compensation to that company for the use and wear of the tracks. The street-railway company over whose tracks another company enters does not lose its right of private property in the material of which the road is constructed. The material in place is the private property of the corporation. When, therefore, a right of way for street-railway purposes is granted over the same route to another company, it cannot be appropriated by the latter company until compensation is first made to the former company. Kinsman St. R. Co. v. Broadway & N. St. R. Co., 36 Ohio St. 252; Metropolitan R. Co. v. Highland Ry. Co., 118 Mass. 291. If there is no agreement between the corporations as to the amount of compensation, it must be fixed as in other cases of the condemnation of private property to public uses.

Both corporations were organized and operated with reference to Ordinance 1204, New Series. Section 4 of said ordinance is as follows: "Should the city of New Orleans, at any time during the existence of the contract of the 6th of May, 1867, between it and the Canal and Claiborne Streets Railroad Company, enter into an arrangement with other companies whereby said road on Canal street, from Claiborne street to Front Levee street, and from Front Levee street to Claiborne street or any part thereof, may be granted, the city of New Orleans, or the road or roads to which the privilege may be granted, shall reimburse to the Canal and Claiborne Streets Railroad Company a fair and reasonable proportion of the value of the portion or portions of the road to be so used; and should such proportion not be agreed upon between said Canal and Claiborne Streets Railroad Company and the city of New Orleans, or the said road or roads, two disinterested persons shall be appointed,—one by the city of New Orleans, or the road or roads, as the case may be, and the other by the Canal and Claiborne Streets Railroad Company; and in the event of a disagreement, as to said proportion to be paid, between said persons thus appointed, a third person or umpire shall be appointed by the judge of one of the district courts of the parish of Orleans, and the decision thereby had shall be final and binding." This section was repealed in 1882. But, in the absence of any agreement, it would be binding upon the two corporations, as they were incorporated with reference to its provisions. Kinsman St. R. Co. v. Broadway & N. St. R. Co., 36 Ohio St. 239. There is nothing in said ordinance which prevented the Canal & Claiborne Streets Railroad Company and the defendant from fixing by contract the compensation due the former corporation for the use of its tracks and road-bed. There are no limitations in the ordinance as to the amount of compensation; and, if there were, we would be inclined to consider them unconstitutional, as being in violation of the rights of private property.

The defendant contends that, if the contract was legal and valid in its inception, it expired by limitation; the plaintiff's contract with the city for its franchise having expired in May, 1887. After the expiration of its contract with the city for the franchise, the Canal & Claiborne Streets Railroad Company, in pursuance of the advertisement of the city of New Orleans, purchased the franchise, and there was a new contract made between the city and said corporation. The corporation still existed, and as such, through its president, made the contract with the city. The contract between the Canal & Claiborne Streets Railroad Company and defendant was to continue during the existence of their charters; and it is a reasonable construction of the agreement that it was to last as long as the former or its assignee owned the material of the road, and the defendant occupied and used it. After the purchase of the right of way over a part of which defendant ran its cars, there was another corporation organized, the Canal & Claiborne Railroad Company, the present plaintiff. It was organized for the purpose of purchasing the material and right of way of the Canal & Claiborne Streets Railroad Company, and in pursuance of its act of incorporation did purchase all of said material and the right of way and franchises of said corporation. This transaction, defendant urges, destroyed the contract made with the first corporation. The obligation resulting from the contract between the two corporations is a real obligation, as it is a contract relative to immovable property, and passed with the property. Civil Code, art. 2011. As we have stated, the contract was for the use of the road of the Canal & Claiborne Streets Railroad Company. It is immaterial who owns the property. It owns the servitude during the existence of the defendant company; and this company, under the agreement, must pay the amount stipulated to the assigns of the first corporation. It is so stipulated in the contract, in the following words: "They do by these presents bind their respective companies or corporations, their administrators and assigns."

There is a clerical error in the title of the suit made by the clerk of the lower court, styling the plaintiff the Canal & Claiborne Streets Railroad Company. The judgment is amended so as to give the case its proper title,—The Canal & Claiborne Railroad Company v. The Orleans Railroad Company. The amendment not changing the substance of the judgment in any way, it will not carry the costs with it. As thus amended, the judgment is affirmed.

BALDWIN v. WALKER.

WRONGFUL ATTACHMENT—EVIDENCE—DAMAGES—ATTORNEY'S FEES.

1. Plaintiff's property was attached on the ground that she was about to leave the state. She sued defendant as surety on the attachment bond. A cross-interrogatory in a deposition by plaintiff was, in effect, as follows: Did you offer your house for sale, and tell several parties that you intended going to Pennsylvania to live? "Tell all about it." She answered: "I did offer my house for sale, and spoke to several of going to Pennsylvania to visit my mother, but not about going there to reside. I told parties that I wanted to sell my house in order to provide a smaller one." Held, that the answer was responsive.

2. Plaintiff's answer that she had told several persons that she expected to end her days at her home in Alabama was not responsive to the interrogatory.

3. The statement of a witness that he knew that plaintiff was not about to leave the state was a mere opinion, and should have been excluded.

4. Where evidence was admitted, without plaintiff's objection, that she did leave the state in the summer of 1888, it was competent for plaintiff to rebut such evidence by showing that it was her habit to leave on a visit every summer.

5. Where plaintiff testified that her interview with one R. relative to a sale of her house was prior to the attachment, and R. testified that it was subsequent, the question as to when it occurred should have been submitted to the jury, with instructions not to consider plaintiff's statements to R. as evidence against her, if not made until after the attachment.

6. Where plaintiff employed an attorney to defend an attachment against her house and lot, which were not sold under the attachment, and of which she was not dispossessed, she cannot recover, as damages, in an action for wrongful attachment, the amount paid by her as attorneys' fees.

7. Defendant requested a charge that if the attaching creditors' agent, before making the levy, consulted an attorney as to whether there was ground for attaching, and informed such attorney of all the facts, and was advised by him to make the attachment, plaintiff could not recover vindictive damages. Held, that the request was defective in excluding all inquiry as to the agent's diligence in ascertaining the truth of such facts, and as to his good faith in acting on the advice of the attorney.

8. Though the property was derived by plaintiff through the will of her husband, and was liable for his debts, yet she had a right to sell it subject to such liability, and could be injured by a wrongful levy of attachment thereon.

9. Where the attachment was wrongful and without probable cause, and after levy was made the attaching creditors were informed of all that had been done by such agent, and ratified his conduct, they would be liable for vindictive damages.

Appeal from circuit court, Montgomery county; JOHN P. HUBBARD, Judge.

Action by Ida S. C. Walker against A. M. Baldwin to recover damages for the breach of an attachment bond on which defendant was surety. Judgment for plaintiff for $375. Defendant appeals. Reversed. For former report and statement of the case, see 8 South. Rep. 365.

The depositions by the plaintiff had been taken and were read in evidence to the jury. The second cross-interrogatory was as follows: "Did you before the 29th day of March, 1888, offer said house, in which you then resided, for sale? State if you did not state to several parties before the 29th day of March, 1888, or about that time, that you desired to sell your house for the purpose of moving to Philadelphia, or elsewhere out of the state of Alabama. Did you not talk to any person about that time about your going to Philadelphia to reside? Did you not say to one or more parties that it was your intention to go to Philadelphia? Tell all about it." The plaintiff's answer to said cross-interrogatory was in the following language: "I did offer my house for sale prior to March 29, 1888. I spoke to several of going to Philadelphia to visit my mother. I did not talk to any person of going to Philadelphia to reside there. Montgomery has been my home for 18 years. My children have had no other home, and my husband's remains are buried here. All else I can say is while my husband's relatives reside in Philadelphia, and wanted his remains brought there, I brought him here. I have said to many that I did expect to end my days in Montgomery. I never told any person or party that it was my intention to go to Philadelphia to live. I did tell parties that I wanted to sell my house in order to provide a smaller one." The defendant moved to exclude the answer of the plaintiff to this cross-interrogatory, but the court overruled his motion, and the defendant duly excepted. The witness Wharton testified that "he knew the plaintiff was not about to move out of the state on March 29, 1888." The defendant objected to this answer, and moved to exclude it. The court said that this answer would be excluded, unless the witness stated the facts by which he knew it. Upon the witness' being asked to state the facts upon which his knowledge was predicated, he said that "he and his family were boarding with them. He saw her making no preparations to move; nothing was packed up; she said nothing to us about moving." The defendant then moved to exclude the statements of Wharton that he knew plaintiff was not about to move out of the state on March 29, 1888; which motion the court overruled, and the defendant excepted. In connection with this testimony, the witness Wharton further stated that the plaintiff was in the habit of going away every summer from Montgomery on a visit. The defendant then moved to exclude this last statement, but the court overruled his motion, and the defendant thereupon duly excepted. The defendant then introduced as a witness John D. Roquemore, who testified that he went to the house of the plaintiff with the view of purchasing said plaintiff's house and lot; that the plaintiff offered to sell him her house and lot and her furniture with it; that she stated to him that she wished to sell her house and lot and go to Philadelphia, saying that either her husband's relatives or her own resided there. This witness testified, first, that the above conversation occurred before March 29, 1888, the day on which the attachments were sued out; but, upon refreshing his memory, he afterwards testified that the conversation took place within about 10 days before June 3, 1888. The plaintiff proved that she had employed an attorney to defend her in the attachment suit, and proved what was the value of his services. There was no evidence that the plaintiff was ever dispossessed of her said house and lot by the said writ of attachment, or that it had been sold under judgment in the attachment suit. The defendant reserved a separate exception to the court's refusal to give each of the following charges requested by him: (1) "If the jury believe from the evidence that Crane, as agent of the Empire Paper-Bag Company, before suing out the attachment consulted a reputable attorney as to whether there was ground for suing out the attachment, and informed such attorney of all the facts in his possession, and such attorney advised him to sue out the attachment, then the jury should not give vindictive damages in this case." (2) "If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff derived the property levied on under the writ of attachment in this case through the will of her late husband, and that his estate was indebted and unsettled at the time said writ was sued out, then she had no right to sell said property at that time, and was not injured by the levy of said writ on said property." (3) "Vindictive damages cannot be recovered against sureties on an attachment bond when the attachment was sued out by an agent for the principal in said attachment. When so sued out, actual damages only, in any event, can be recovered." (4) "If the jury believe from the evidence that Crane was the agent of the Empire Paper-Bag Company in the collection of their debt against plaintiff, and that said Crane maliciously sued out the attachment in this case, such malice affords no ground for a recovery of vindictive damages in this case, unless it is shown that one of the partners who at the time the attachment was sued out composed the firm of the Empire Paper-Bag Company participated in the malice of said Crane." (5) "If the jury believe from the evidence that the Empire Paper-Bag Company intrusted its claim against the plaintiff for collection to Crane, and Crane consulted a reputable attorney as to what course to pursue, and that attorney advised him to take out an attachment, and that his principals provided him with security to enable him to sue out the attachment upon a telegram from said attorney, and that he had no communication with his principal until the attachment was sued out, and there is no evidence that his principals were informed of the grounds upon which the attachment was sued out, and they were not informed of any malice or vexatious conduct on the part of Crane, then the jury cannot give vindictive damages against the defendant." (6) "If the jury believe from the evidence that the attachment was not maliciously sued out, and was wrongfully sued out, they cannot find for the defendant any damages which she has not shown to have sustained to her property, except nominal damages." (7) "That the malice of Crane, if any, in suing out the attachment in this case as agent of the Empire Paper-Bag Company, cannot be considered by the jury in estimating vindictive damages." (8) "Although the attachment may have been wrongfully sued out, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover any counsel fees incurred in defending the attachment suit, unless she had some defense against the writ of attachment, as against the debt upon which it was founded." (9) "Counsel fees incurred in defending an attachment suit against which the defendant has no defense are not recoverable in this action." (10) "The plaintiff is not entitled to recover any counsel fees incurred in the defense of the attachment suit of the Empire Paper-Bag Company against her." (11) "If the jury believe from the evidence that the attachment was wrongfully sued out, they should not find anything for the plaintiff on account of counsel fees incurred in the defense of the attachment suit, unless the evidence showed that it was necessary to employ counsel to defend that suit."

Arrington & Graham, for appellant. A. A. Wiley and W. S. Thorington, for appellee.

WALKER, J. A party is in no position to complain of statements of fact called out by his own questions. The defendant's comprehensive request in his second cross-interrogatory, that the plaintiff "tell all about it," justified the plaintiff in giving her own version of the matter inquired about. Most of her answer was fairly responsive to the question. It was unobjectionable, so far as it was a statement of facts pertinent to the matter of inquiry.

But the plaintiff's statement as to what she had said to others about ending her days in Montgomery was not responsive to the interrogatory. They were mere expressions of intention made before the attachment was sued out. The rule against the admissibility of such declarations in a party's own behalf was stated in the opinion in this case on the former appeal. Baldwin v. Walker, 91 Ala. 428, 8 South. Rep. 365. The defendant's motion to exclude that part of the answer to the second cross-interrogatory should have been granted.

The witness Wharton stated that he knew that the plaintiff was not about to remove out of the state on the 29th of March, 1888. This could have been no more than the opinion or conclusion of the witness, drawn by him from the facts. It is for the jury to deduce such conclusions from the facts proved before them. The verdict should not be merely the echo of the opinions or inferences of witnesses, and such evidence should be excluded. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 436, § 436 et seq.

Evidence was admitted, without objection, that the plaintiff did leave the state in the summer of 1888. It might be contended for the defendant that this was in pursuance of a purpose, entertained by the plaintiff before the suing out of the attachment, to remove from the state. It was competent to rebut such evidence by showing that it was plaintiff's habit to leave Montgomery on a visit every summer. The proof of such a habit would tend to explain a fact which might otherwise be treated by the jury as evidence of a permanent removal. When the question is whether or not a person was about to remove from a place at a certain time, it is plain that his actually leaving such place a few months thereafter would have less weight, as evidence of a permanent removal, if he had frequently gone off on a visit at that season of the year, than if his going away was an unusual occurrence.

The testimony of the plaintiff tended to show that her interview with the witness Roquemore in regard to the sale of her house was prior to the suing out of the attachment. Though that witness himself stated that the conversation to which he testified was had at a date subsequent to the issue of the attachment, yet, as the evidence as to the date of the interview was conflicting, the question as to when it occurred should have been submitted to the jury, with instructions not to consider the plaintiff's statements to the witness Roquemore as evidence against her, if their conclusion from the evidence was that such statements had not been made until after the attachment had been sued out. As there was evidence tending to show that the statements of the plaintiff to the witness Roquemore were admissible against her as having been made prior to the date of the attachment, it was error to exclude the testimony of that witness.

A defendant in an attachment suit may employ an attorney to look after his interests, and to see that his rights are properly guarded, even though no issue can be made in that case as to the existence of the ground of attachment, though no defense can be made to the claim sued on, and though no ground for quashing the attachment may exist. It is not unreasonable for one whose property has been seized under legal process to employ counsel to protect it as far as the law may justify, though there may be no possibility of defeating the proceeding. The question of the propriety of incurring such expense does not depend upon the defendant's ability to make a successful defense. One whose property is in the clutches of the law may seek professional aid to secure whatever measure of protection the law may afford. Though it may not be necessary or proper to undertake a defense of the suit, the defendant may still have counsel to watch its progress, and to see that no undue advantage is taken of him. If property is involved in the suit as a result of a wrongful levy of process upon it, the necessary expense of employing counsel to secure its protection, so far as the law permits, may, in the opinion of the writer, be regarded as a natural consequence of the wrong. I think that reasonable and necessary counsel fees paid or incurred for such services as could properly be and were in fact rendered by the attorney in looking after the attachment for the defendant are recoverable as damages in a suit on the attachment bond, if the attachment was merely wrongful, or was wrongful and malicious, (Flournoy v. Lyon, 70 Ala. 308; Dothard v. Sheid, 69 Ala. 135; Seay v. Greenwood, 21 Ala. 491; Marshall v. Betner, 17 Ala. 832;) and that there was no error in admitting evidence tending to show the employment of an attorney in the attachment suit, or in refusing to give charges 6, 8, 9, 10, and 11 requested by the defendant. Of course, in estimating the value of the professional services rendered, due regard should be had to the circumstance that no defense was made, and that nothing more could be done than to guard the rights of a losing party. The majority of the court, however, hold that on the evidence in this case the plaintiff is not entitled to recover damages on account of the attorney's fees.

Without noticing all the defects in the several other charges requested by the defendant, the refusal of the court to give them may be justified on the following grounds, respectively: Charge 1 was defective in pretermitting all inquiry as to whether the agent was diligent to ascertain the truth of the facts laid before counsel, and as to his good faith in acting on the advice when given. Steed v. Knowles, 79 Ala. 446. Charge 2 was incorrect in asserting that the plaintiff had no right to sell the property, and could not be injured by a levy made upon it, because her title to it was derived through the will of her husband, and it was liable for his debts. If the title was in her, she could sell the property subject to the liability for the debts of the decedent. Charge 3 asserts that when an attachment is sued out by an agent actual damages only can be recovered, in any event. If the attachment was wrongful, and was sued out without probable cause, and the principal, with full knowledge, ratified the act of the agent, then the recovery was not limited to actual damages. Baldwin v. Walker, 91 Ala. 428, 8 South. Rep. 365. This charge ignored the question of ratification and the evidence on that subject, as do also charges 4, 5, and 7. On the last trial there was evidence tending to show that, after the attachment was sued out, the principals were fully informed of all that was done by the agent in reference thereto, and of the grounds upon which he acted, and that they ratified his conduct. In this respect the case presents a different aspect from that presented when it was in this court on the former appeal. For the errors above noted the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded.

PARTNERSHIP—WHEN RELATION EXISTS AS TO THIRD PARTIES—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Plaintiff sued three persons as partners. One of the defendants denied that he was a partner, and offered a copy of the articles of copartnership to prove that he was not. The said copy recited that the agreement was between two of the defendants, who were to bear the expenses of the business, and to pay the other defendant a certain part of the net profits for the use of his store-room and influence, and for a loan of money, and that the remaining profits were to be divided between the two. Defendants testified that the original articles had been lost, and that the instrument offered was a true copy. Plaintiff testified that it was not a true copy, and that there were other provisions in the original. The court instructed that the articles as shown by the copy did not constitute the other defendant a partner. Held, that the instruction was not objectionable as excluding from the jury the consideration of any other evidence tending to show that he was a partner.

2. An instruction that if the said defendant was, "with knowledge and consent," held out to the public as a partner, he might be charged as a partner, was erroneous, in seeking to fasten liability upon him whether he was held out with his own knowledge and consent or not, and because there was no evidence that the claim sued on had been contracted upon the faith that he was a partner.

Appeal from circuit court, Marengo county; W. E. CLARKE, Judge.

This was an action of assumpsit, brought by A. G. Levy & Co. against D. C. Alexander & Co., for goods sold and delivered. The complaint alleged that the firm of Alexander & Co. was composed of D. C. Alexander, A. D. Alexander, and J. D. Alexander. J. D. Alexander interposed two pleas; the first being the general issue, and the second a denial of any interest as a partner in the firm of Alexander & Co. The plaintiffs introduced testimony tending to show that on October 1, 1885, the said D. C., A. D., and J. D. Alexander formed the said partnership; that the articles of the copartnership were placed with J. D. Alexander for safe-keeping; and that the copy of the said articles offered in evidence by the defendants was not, as claimed by them, a true copy. The plaintiffs' evidence further tended to show that the stipulations of the said copy were untrue, in that the agreement between the members of the firm was that the capital stock of the said firm should be $1,500; that each one of the three should contribute $500; that the profits should be divided equally, and the losses borne equally; and that, in compliance with said articles, J. D. Alexander was credited in the stock account on the books with $500. The defendant J. D. Alexander introduced in evidence what he claimed to be a true copy of the original agreement between him and the said D. C. and A. D. Alexander, which was made Exhibit A to the bill of exceptions, and which was in the following language: "Articles of partnership between D. C. Alexander and A. D. Alexander in the mercantile business at Fairview, near Faunsdale, Alabama. (1) The capital stock of said firm is to be ($1,500.00) fifteen hundred dollars. (2) The said partners agree to pay equal amounts of the necessary expenses in carrying on said business. (3) It is further stipulated and agreed that the said partnership shall continue at the pleasure of the partners. (4) The said partners, D. C. Alexander and A. D. Alexander, agree and hereby promise to pay J. D. Alexander one-third of the net profits of the said mercantile business for the use of his store-house, trade, and influence, and for the loan of five hundred dollars, and more if he thinks it advisable. (5) It is further agreed and stipulated that the remaining two-thirds of the net profits shall be equally divided between the said partners, D. C. Alexander and A. D. Alexander, share and share alike. (6) It is further agreed and stipulated that neither partner shall draw any money from the partnership funds, nor contract any debt against the firm, without the consent of the other partner." The defendant introduced evidence tending to show that this was the true copy of said original agreement, and that he was in no way a partner of said firm, being connected therewith only as is shown by said articles of agreement. The plaintiffs excepted to a certain portion of the general charge given by the court, in which the court charged that the said articles of agreement, as shown by said Exhibit A, did not make J. D. Alexander a partner. The plaintiffs also separately excepted to the court's refusal to give the following written charges requested by them: "(1) If the jury believe from the evidence that Exhibit A is a copy of the articles of partnership of the firm of D. C. Alexander & Co., then J. D. Alexander, under said agreement, was a copartner in said partnership. (2) That, if the evidence shows that J. D. Alexander was, with knowledge and consent, held forth to the public as a partner in the firm of D. C. Alexander & Co., then he may be charged as a partner with the debt of the plaintiffs." There was judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

G. B. Johnston, for appellants. John C. Anderson, J. W. Bush, Pettus & Harwood, and G. W. Taylor, for appellees.

COLEMAN, J. If J. D. Alexander was a party to the instrument offered in evidence, the argument of appellants to show that its terms are of such a character as to constitute him a partner in favor of creditors would be in point, and entitled to consideration. The construction of this instrument by the court did not exclude from the jury the consideration of other evidence, which tended to show that J. D. Alexander was a member of the firm of D. C. Alexander & Co. Neither was there any error in the charge of the court, which construed and declared the legal effect of the instrument offered in evidence as a copy of the original copartnership agreement. The testimony without dispute showed that the copartnership agreement was in writing, and that the original had been lost. The testimony of the defendants tended to show that Exhibit A was a true copy of the original agreement, and the testimony of the appellants (plaintiffs) tended to show that it was not, and that it had other provisions. The charge of the court was simply to the effect that Exhibit A, of itself, did not constitute J. D. Alexander a partner. Of the correctness of this charge there can be no doubt. Standing by itself, and construed alone, that agreement was no more binding upon J. D. Alexander than it was upon his counsel. As to him, it was strictly res inter alios acta, and, if there was no other understanding to bind J. D. Alexander as a partner, it could not be said in any sense that he was inter sese, a partner. The first charge requested by plaintiffs was properly refused.

Where one permits himself to be held out as a partner, and persons contract with the firm upon the supposed fact that he is a partner, he makes himself liable as such, whether in fact he be a partner or not; but if the evidence shows that credit was given to the partnership in ignorance of this fact, and not upon the supposition or faith that he was a partner, then no such liability arises. Fertilizer Co. v. Reynolds, 85 Ala. 23, 4 South. Rep. 639. The second charge asked by appellants, and refused by the court, is erroneous for two reasons: First. It seeks to fasten a liability upon J. D. Alexander, if he was held out to the public as a partner, whether it was done with his knowledge and consent, or without it. It must be done with his knowledge and consent to render him liable. Second. Because there is no evidence in the record to show that plaintiffs' debt was contracted upon the faith that he was a partner, or that such information was ever conveyed to plaintiffs until after their debt was contracted. We have seen that the credit must be given upon the faith that he was a partner. There is no error in the record. Affirmed.

BURDEAU v. HIS CREDITORS. (No. 10,839.)

INSOLVENCY — OPPOSITION TO DISCHARGE — FRAUD — EVIDENCE.

1. When the charge of fraud preferred against an insolvent is that, in certain transactions with certain of his creditors, he made unfair dations en paiement to them of his property, whereby he gave such creditors an undue advantage over the complaining creditor, and the effect of which was to injure such complainant, the gravamen of such charge is (1) intention on the part of the insolvent to defraud; and (2) injury to the complainant resulting therefrom.

2. The proof disclosing that the disposition made of his property by the insolvent resulted in his having received therefrom a cash surplus, above the amount of the claims of the creditors who were paid, sufficient to satisfy the complainant's demand, held that, whatever may be the inference therefrom of fraudulent intent on the part of the insolvent, there is no resulting injury to the complainant.

3. There may have been a consilium fraudis, but no eventus damni.

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; ALBERT VOORHIES, Judge.

Application of Charles K. Burdeau for a discharge in insolvency. Certain of his creditors filed opposition charging him with fraud, on which charge he was tried by jury and acquitted. From a final judgment in favor of Burdeau, opponents appeal. Affirmed.

Gurley & Mellen, for Marx Levy & Bro., appellants. Geo. L. Bright, for appellee.

WATKINS, J. Seeking the benefit of the insolvent laws of the state, Charles K. Burdeau made a cession of his property to his creditors, filed a schedule of his assets, accompanied with a list of his creditors, and obtained an order of the judge accepting same for the benefit of his creditors. At a meeting of the creditors of the insolvent, duly convoked, a majority in number and amount voted for his discharge; there being only four who voted against his discharge,—their debts aggregating $5,490.66, or about one-fifth of the aggregate of the claims of those voting for a discharge. Of those voting against a discharge was the firm of Marx Levy & Bro., whose claim amounted to $3,526.61, who filed an opposition to the discharge of the insolvent, based on three specific charges of fraud; and whereupon said opponents pray that there be a judgment of court "depriving said Burdeau forever of the laws in favor of insolvents in this state, and sentencing [him] to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years, as provided by section 1807 of the Revised Statutes," and for a trial by jury. The answer or replication of the defendant was a general and special denial, and a plea in reconvention, which cuts no figure in this case. On the trial, the jury rendered a verdict acquitting the insolvent of the charge of fraud; and, having unsuccessfully sought a new trial, opponents have prosecuted this appeal from the final judgment rendered in favor of the insolvent. We have, therefore, for solution, the single and distinct issue, fraud vel non, as denounced in the 1807 section of the Revised Statutes; and, finding that the insolvent "has been guilty of fraud," as therein denounced, we have for decision the quantum of punishment that shall be inflicted on him.

1. The charges and specifications made by the opponents are substantially as follows, to-wit: First. (a) That on or about the 25th of January, 1889, the insolvent transferred and delivered to Martin Thompson & Co., horse and mule traders of the city of New Orleans, 20 mules, at an agreed valuation of $145 per head, "all or some of said mules being given by said Burdeau to said Martin Thompson & Co. in payment of the indebtedness then due by him to said firm." (b) That on or about the 16th of February, 1889, said insolvent transferred and delivered to William B. Leonard, of said city, or to the firm of Leonard, Gentry & Co., of which said Leonard was the senior member, 10 mules, at an agreed valuation of $160 per head; that said Burdeau was then largely indebted to said Leonard or to his firm, say $1,600, "and said mules were given to said Leonard or his firm in payment of said indebtedness." (c) That on or about the 28th of February, 1889, said insolvent, being indebted to said Leonard or to his firm, "transferred and delivered to him or to his firm ten (10) mules, at an agreed valuation of $160.00 per head, in payment of said debt." (d) That on the 18th of March, 1889, said insolvent transferred and delivered to said Leonard or to his firm 10 mules, at an agreed valuation of $147.50 per head, "and said mules were given said Leonard or his said firm in payment of said indebtedness." (e) That on or about the 3d day of April, 1889, said insolvent, being then indebted to said firm of Martin Thompson & Co., transferred and delivered to said firm 7 mules, at an agreed valuation of $160.00 per head, as a "giving in payment of said indebtedness." Predicated upon these five preceding specifications, the opponents make the following specific charges, to-wit: "That said Burdeau made each and every one of said dations en paiement within three months prior to his surrender, was insolvent when he made them, and made them with intent to defraud his creditors, and particularly opponents, and to give an unfair preference to said Martin Thompson & Co. and to said W. B. Leonard, or his said firm of Leonard, Gentry & Co." The opponents, varying the character of the charge previously made, declared and affirmed as follows, to-wit: Second. (a) "But if said Burdeau should claim that said transfers were not dations en paiement, but real sales, and such be the truth, then the amount received by him for said fifty-seven (57) mules was $8,695, or thereabouts, and he has surrendered no cash. Although said sales were made within three months prior to his surrender, he has paid out in cash, between the date of the first sale and the date of his surrender, only the sum of $492.28, so far as opponents are informed and know. And if said transfers were sales, and not dations en paiement, then opponents charge said Burdeau with converting his property into cash with intent to place it beyond the reach of these opponents and other creditors, and so to defraud them. That said Burdeau has not surrendered said cash, nor any part thereof, but has fraudulently concealed the same." Third. That the insolvent has failed and refused to surrender to his creditors his interest in the firm of Jos. A. Aiken & Co., wharf lessees in this city; he being a member of that firm. The charges and specifications are well and accurately drawn, and are of easy comprehension; but before considering them, and applying the evidence thereto, we must examine and dispose of an exception that was urged in the court below, and is pressed by the insolvent's counsel here.

2. His exception is that "the three charges are (1) fraudulent sales; (2) and dations en paiement; and (3) non-surrender of the prices received for the sales, predicated on the same transfers. The first two cannot exist at the same time. If he gave the mules in payment, he cannot have sold them, and concealed the price received; for none was received. If he paid the price, he cannot have given the mules in payment." Counsel's contention is that the plain requirement of the insolvent law is that an opposing creditor must state specifically the several acts or facts of fraud he wants to urge against the insolvent, and that the opponents have not done so. He cites and relies upon the following authorities, viz.: Beste v. His Creditors, 14 La. Ann. 518; Burdon v. His Creditors, 20 La. Ann. 366; Campbell v. His Creditors, 16 La. 351. Giving these decisions due weight, and conceding their applicability to the state of facts therein respectively presented, yet we cannot concede their pertinency to the case at bar. The particular transactions of the insolvent which are denounced as fraudulent are detailed and fully described. It was a matter of utter impossibility for the opponents to have known, when the opposition was filed, whether they were sales in good faith for cash, the proceeds whereof were concealed from the insolvent's creditors, or reprobated dations en paiement. Consequently the acts were particularized, and the charges of fraud were specified, alternatively. It was a strike in the dark, and the best that could have been done under the circumstances. Counsel complained that the opposition fails to state that the insolvent "knowingly omitted to declare some of his property," in the words of the statute. Rev. St. § 1803. We think the phrase employed—i. e., "fraudulently concealed"—is sufficient. The exception was correctly overruled.

3. As appertaining to the merits of the controversy, the facts may be fairly summarized as follows, viz.: Charles K. Burdeau and W. C. Ahern were the individual members who composed the firm of Burdeau & Ahern, and were engaged in the draying business, hauling cotton for the cotton-presses, in the season of 1888–89. As was the custom of the trade, they bought mules in the fall season to operate their business with, and made sale of some of them during the latter part of the winter and spring, when business became dull and unremunerative. Burdeau purchased mules of the various parties named, for which he owed on January 25, 1889, to Martin Thompson & Co., $2,602.25 on open account; he owed Leonard, Gentry & Co., $1,782.43, represented by his promissory notes due on that date; and he owed the opponents' firm of Marx Levy & Bros. $3,526.61, evidenced by two promissory notes bearing date of January 11, 1889,—one for $2,005.28, due at 90 days, and another for $1,992.28, due at 60 days, but which was, on the date it went to maturity, diminished by the partial payment of $500, and the payment of the remainder thereof was extended. At the date of the maturity of their debt, Burdeau disposed of 20 of his mules to Martin Thompson & Co. at $145 per head, realizing therefor the aggregate sum of $2,900, with which his entire account was discharged; they paying him the difference of $297.75. On the 3d of April, 1889, Burdeau sold to said firm 7 mules at $160 per head, aggregating in amount $1,100, for which he received a check. On the 18th of January, 1889, Burdeau made a sale of 10 mules to the firm of Leonard, Gentry & Co., at $160 per head, aggregating the sum of $1,600, on which he was given a check for only $800; the remainder not being at that time paid. On the 17th of February, Burdeau delivered to said firm 10 mules in addition, at $160 per head, aggregating $1,600. On the following day, he was furnished a check for $1,782.43,—the exact amount of his note, that day maturing; and he used it in paying his note in the Canal Bank. On the 2d of March, 1889, he received a check of $617.57; it thus "evening up" those two transactions. On the 18th of March, following, Burdeau sold to said firm 10 mules, in addition, at $147.50 per head, aggregating $1,475 in amount; and he received a check of $250 on the 19th of March, and one for $1,225 on the 23d of March, 1889. The result of the transactions with Martin Thompson & Co. was that Burdeau satisfied their account of $2,602.25, and received in cash the surplus of $1,397.75; and the result of his transactions with Leonard, Gentry & Co. was that he satisfied their demand, of $1,782.43, and received in cash the surplus of $2,892.57,—the cash items reaching a total of $4,290.32. The manner in which said mules were disposed of was this: The time having arrived when, in the opinion of the parties, it was necessary that their stock of mules should be reduced, Mr. Ahern selected the mules that were to be sold, and put them in suitable lots; and different dealers were notified, and examined these lots, and made bids therefor, at so much per head. In this case the two firms mentioned were competitors, and secured the mules specified above, and at the prices and on the terms stated. In the latter part of December, 1888, opponents' firm was notified of its being the intention of the insolvent's firm to sell off some of their mules; and the former were questioned as to whether they would like to buy, and their reply was in the negative. Thereafter, no further notice was given them of the said sales being made. On this state of facts the question is whether these transactions were fraudulent dations en paiement, which were, on the part of the insolvent, intended to confer on Martin Thompson & Co. and Leonard, Gentry & Co. an unfair preference over opponents, and the effect of which was to injure them, in the sense of the provisions of the insolvent law, upon which opponents rely for a conviction.

The transcript fails to disclose any specific proof of fraud or fraudulent intent, and the insolvent emphatically and circumstantially denies and disavows any such intention or act. The only inference there is of any such fraudulent purpose or design must be drawn from the foregoing statement of facts. It is a fact that should be noted that all of the parties named dealt with Burdeau alone, in selling mules to him and in purchasing mules from him, notwithstanding the fact that the latter at once covered same into his partnership, and the sales were made as of partnership property. The principle of the insolvent law that is sought to be enforced against the insolvent, Burdeau, is that, "if the jury summoned for the purpose of deciding on the accusation of fraud against the insolvent debtor declare in their verdict that he has been guilty of fraud, the insolvent debtor shall forever be deprived of the laws passed in favor of insolvent debtors in this state, and shall be sentenced to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years," etc. Rev. St. § 1807. In the section of the Revised Statutes immediately preceding the one quoted, we find the term "fraud" defined, and the character of proof necessary to convict, supplemented by illustrations and examples, in the way of fraudulent acts, which come within the provision of the statute under consideration. For instance, section 1802 declares that "all persons shall be considered guilty of fraud who shall have concealed their body, or any of their property, with an intention to keep it from their creditors," etc. Section 1803 says that "every insolvent debtor shall also be considered as guilty of fraud who shall have passed simulated deeds, for the purpose of conveying the whole or any part of his property, and depriving his creditors thereof, or shall have knowingly omitted to declare any of his property right or claims in his schedule, * * * always with an intent to defraud his creditors," etc. For the perpetration of any one of the acts enumerated, or others of like import, the insolvent is deemed and considered to be a fraudulent debtor per se. Section 1804 declares that "if a debtor who has voluntarily surrendered his property to his creditors * * * shall have given, within the year, an unjust advantage or preference to any one or more of his creditors, by payment or otherwise, * * * the effect whereof shall be to injure the complaining creditor, or shall purchase property for cash, the delivery whereof shall be made to him, and then shall sell or dispose of the same without paying his vendor, * * * or shall have made a conveyance, transfer, mortgage, or pledge of his property, to the prejudice of the complaining creditor, any such act shall be held presumptive evidence of fraud, liable, however, like all other presumptions, to be disproved." Whether the insolvent be guilty of fraud or not, under this section, is, in the first place, dependent on a question of fact, as to the insolvent's commission of the reprobated act; and, in the second place, on the fact of his having successfully rebutted the legal presumption of guilty intent raised on the proof of the act. Coupled with the foregoing sections are the supplemental provisions of section 1808, which are to the effect that "any debtor who shall, within three months next preceding his failure, have sold, engaged, or mortgaged any of his goods and effects, or shall otherwise have disposed of the same, in order to give an unjust preference to one or more of his creditors, shall be debarred from the benefit of the insolvent laws," etc. It thus appears to have been the manifest purpose of the legislature in this section (1808) to declare that the acts which in section 1804 are denounced as "presumptive evidence of fraud" if done "within the year" previous to the surrender of an insolvent, shall be deemed a conclusive presumption of fraud if done "within three months next preceding his failure," and as a legal consequence thereof the insolvent "shall be debarred from the benefit of the insolvent laws." But, in order to determine the main question,—the insolvent's guilt of fraud, under and in contemplation of the sections of the Revised Statutes we have quoted,—we are to first ascertain whether, as matter of fact, Burdeau did give, within the year, "an unjust advantage or preference to any one or more of his creditors, by payment or otherwise, * * * the effect of which [was] to injure the complaining creditor," or did he make "a conveyance, transfer, mortgage, or pledge of his property to the prejudice of the complaining creditor," within the meaning of section 1804? If such we find to have been a fact, then the next question to be determined is whether the act or acts complained of occurred within three months preceding the failure or surrender, in contemplation of section 1808.

We have already found and stated that there is in the record no specific proof of fraud on the part of the insolvent. Is there to be legitimately drawn from the facts stated any inference of any unjust advantage or preference having been given by him to Martin Thompson & Co. or Leonard, Gentry & Co. over the opponents, the effect whereof was to injure the opponents? These precepts of the insolvent law have often been examined and interpreted, and in so doing our predecessors have said that they are highly penal in character and in their consequences on conviction of fraud, "and must be strictly pursued. The acts charged must not only be such as the law declares fraudulent, but done with fraudulent intent." Campbell v. Creditors, 16 La. 348. In other cases they have said: "To constitute fraud, there must be an intention of defrauding, consilium frandis, and an actual loss, eventus damni." Montilly v. Creditors, 18 La. 383; Slocomb v. Bank, 2 Rob. (La.) 92. Those decisions conform strictly to the precise wording of the statute; for it declares, not only that the act complained of must have conferred, or have been intended to confer, on some of the creditors of the insolvent, an "unjust preference or advantage" over the creditor who charges fraud, but it also declares that "the effect whereof shall be to injure" them. The transactions of which the opponents complain are specifically enumerated in the opposition, and same have been reproduced in this opinion with care. They are charged collectively as badges of fraud and unfair dations en paiement. Upon examination and careful comparison, we find that, by one of Burdeau's transactions with certain of his creditors, he not only paid their account of $2,602.25, but received from them a cash surplus of $1,397.75; that by another of his transactions, with others of his creditors, he not only paid a debt due them of $1,782.43, but received from them a cash surplus of $2,892.57,—i. e., a cash surplus of $4,290.32 in excess of their demands against him altogether. As all of these transactions occurred during the months of January, February, March, and April, and antecedent to the maturity of Burdeau's indebtedness to the opponents, and as the amount of cash realized therefrom exceeded the amount of opponents' demands against him, it seems to be manifest that "the effect" of same was not to injure them. Indeed, it is a fact exhibited by the record that, contemporaneously with said transaction, Burdeau paid opponents $500, which was put to his credit on the first maturing note, and it was extended for the remainder, and that said sum was not part of the cash so received. On the 17th day of April, 1889, opponents levied an attachment on Burdeau's property, and the sheriff found and seized 10 mules, (one-half as many as opponents sold him originally, those having remained on hand and unsold at date of seizure,) 11 sets of harness, and 15 cotton floats, and some other property, not needing mention. Hence, on this branch of the case, our conclusion is that opponents' appeal cannot prevail.

4. But coupled with the foregoing charge is a further specification of fraud on the part of the insolvent, and it is this: That, on the 25th of January, 1889, Burdeau had in all 67 mules, 57 of which he had bought in 1888; that of those he had purchased 20 of the opponents, 17 of which he had disposed of, as above stated, to other parties, to the prejudice of opponents' vendors' lien. The provisions of section 1804 of the Revised Statutes, above quoted, on this subject, are that if any insolvent "shall purchase property for cash, the delivery whereof shall be made to him, and then shall sell or dispose of the same without paying his vendor, * * * such act shall be held presumptive evidence of fraud." Certainly that provision of the law was not intended to apply to sales of property or goods and effects on terms of credit, as the sales of mules were made to Burdeau; for it is a precept of our Civil Code that the vendor's lien on movable property is lost by a sale and delivery thereof to another. It declares that "he who has sold to another any movable property, which is not paid for, has a preference on the price of his property over other creditors of the purchaser, whether the sale was made on a credit or without, if the property still remains in the possession of the purchaser." Rev. Civil Code, art. 3227; Brent v. Shouse, 16 La. Ann. 158; Elkin v. Harvy, 20 La. Ann. 545; Flint v. Rawlings, Id. 557. Evidently there is no prohibition against a sale being made by a vendee of goods which are purchased on a credit, and no fraudulent intent can attach to the act, though his contract be thereby violated. As matter of fact, had it been the intention of Burdeau to defraud opponents by selling mules on which opponents had a vendors' lien, it is inexplicable that he should have retained 3 and sold 17; for, after Burdeau's surrender, opponents appeared in the insolvency proceedings, and made claim for the proceeds of 3 mules on which they had a vendor's lien, and it was allowed. This charge is not sustained.

5. The remaining question for consideration is that Burdeau was guilty of fraud in "concealing his cash with intent to defraud his creditors." Page 3 of opponents' supplemental brief. Their counsel disavow any intention on their part to charge that the insolvent "knowingly omitted to declare [some] of his property rights and claims in his schedule." The charge is made under section 1802, and not under section 1803, of the Revised Statutes. This charge is the alternative that is made mention of in the treatment of the insolvent's exception.

(a) And just here we may as well dispose of the insolvent's bill of exception taken to the ruling of the judge a qua, rejecting a memorandum made by him of various and sundry expenditures, indicating the manner in which he had disposed of the cash he had received in the transactions detailed, and in the course of his business. The unbending rule of law is that "the books of a merchant cannot be given in evidence in his favor." Rev. Civil Code, art. 2248; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 115. It proceeds on the principle that the entries therein are his own memoranda, and he cannot be allowed to manufacture evidence in his own favor. As an aid to the memory of a witness testifying, this memorandum was objectionable on the ground that it did not purport to be contemporaneous in date with the transactions therein detailed. It was properly excluded.

(b) On the question of the insolvent having concealed his cash to defraud his creditors, there is no evidence that is at all satisfactory or conclusive. The general tendency of it is to show that Burdeau had spent all of his money, and at date of his surrender had none. He denies the possession or concealment of any cash, and avers that at that time he did not have a cent, and that, under the advice of counsel, he sold a pony and a wagon for $125 to meet the expenses of his cession, and surrendered that to his creditors. Such an item prefaces his schedule. In his testimony he accounts for all his cash except a few hundred dollars, which he claimed to have expended in the payment of small dues and the like. We do not consider this charge as supported by the evidence.

(c) This is not in any sense a revocatory action, or one de simulation, and hence the precepts of the Code do not apply. Rev. Civil Code, arts. 1983, 1984, 2658, 3530.

(d) In so far as the charge that Burdeau had failed to surrender his interest in the firm of Joseph A. Aiken & Co., wharf lessees, is concerned, it has been only recently decided by this court, in a suit in which his syndic was a party, that the interest therein represented by Burdeau was not his own, but that of his minor children; and to that suit opponents were at least privies, if not parties, as it was in their interest and at their instance that it was brought. Burdeau v. Davey, 43 La. Ann. 585, 9 South. Rep. 752.

Certain it is that, under the circumstances detailed, we do not feel justified in reversing the finding of the jury, acquitting the insolvent of the charge of fraud, in view of the district judge's declination to grant opponents a new trial. Our predecessors once held that the insolvent law "is of such a highly penal character that the court should never feel authorized to convict and punish without the verdict of a jury." Thompson v. Chapman, 7 La. Ann. 258. While not adhering to this doctrine, save for the illustration it affords, we will affirm this not to be such a case as will justify this court in reversing a verdict, and sentencing the insolvent to the penalty of the law. Judgment affirmed.

Charles V. Porter, for relator. David Pierson, in pro. per.

MCENERY, J. The relator was convicted and sentenced for violating the provisions of section 1, Act No. 138, of 1890. Under the authority of article 90 of the constitution, and its interpretation in the case of State v. Judge, 39 La. Ann. 133, 1 South. Rep. 437, he applies for writs of prohibition and certiorari to prevent the respondent judge from proceeding further in the case on the ground that said act is unconstitutional, violating article 29 of the constitution, which requires that every law shall embrace but one object, which shall be set forth in its title. The title of the act is: "To enforce labor contracts, and to provide a penalty for the willful violation thereof, and to make it a misdemeanor for persons not parties to said contracts to willfully interfere therein, and to provide for the punishment thereof." Section 1 provides "that whoever shall willfully violate a contract, upon the faith of which money or goods have been advanced, and without first tendering to the person from whom said money or goods was obtained the amount of money or the value of the goods, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined in a sum not less than fifty dollars nor more than two hundred dollars, and in default of payment thereof with cost shall be imprisoned in the parish jail for not less than ten days nor more than thirty days, at the discretion of the court." The contention is that the title of the act refers to "labor" contracts, and the above section provides for a violation of a contract, omitting the word "labor" before the word "contract." When the title indicates the object and purpose of the law, it is sufficient. It was the intention of the law to punish the violation of labor contracts. Nothing is said in the first section of the act, under which the defendant was indicted, about labor contracts. The title of the act is restricted to this particular kind of contract. The body of the act refers to all contracts. Any one, who is not a laborer, and who makes a contract, upon the faith of which money is advanced or goods delivered, is subject to an indictment for the violation of section 1. Suppose, for instance, that a merchant, planter, or any one employed in any other occupation than that of laborer on a plantation or elsewhere should be indicted under this section. The defense that his contract was not a labor contract, and not covered by the title of the act, would be a valid one. It is evident that there is a wide difference in meaning and the object to be attained as expressed in the title and the law. It clearly violates article 29 of the constitution. It is therefore ordered that the rule herein be made absolute, and the writ of prohibition issued be made peremptory.

CRILLY v. TEXAS & P. RY. CO. (No. 10,891.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Jan. 4, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

INJURY TO RAILROAD EMPLOYE—FAILURE TO FENCE TRACK—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

1. Under the laws of Louisiana, railroad companies are not compelled to fence in their tracks, and it is not negligence on the part of said companies to neglect to fence their tracks at a point where there is no public crossing.

2. It is not negligence to fail to fence a trestle over a small canal in an open field where there is no public road or general thoroughfare. Where a railroad company voluntarily fences a part of its track, this will not impose upon it the obligation to fence its entire track.

3. Where an employe, not too young and too ignorant to appreciate the dangers of the situation, is aware that proper precautions have not been taken for his safety, and he continues the services notwithstanding the risk, he will be considered as having assumed the responsibility for his own safety.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; THOMAS C. W. ELLIS, Judge.

Suit by Estella Tillotson, widow of Thomas Crilly, against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company to recover damages for the death of her husband through defendant's alleged negligence. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. S. Benedict and E. M. Hudson, for appellant. Howe & Prentiss, for appellee.

MCENERY, J. The plaintiff is the widow of Thomas Crilly, who was killed in a railroad accident, while in the employ of the defendant company. She brought suit claiming damages in the sum of $25,000, alleging that her husband, the conductor of a freight train, was killed in a wreck of said train near Seymourville, La., on the 30th January, 1890; and she alleges that the accident which resulted in the death of her husband was caused solely through the gross negligence, fault, want of care on the part of the defendant corporation, and without fault, imprudence, or negligence on the part of her deceased husband. The answer of the defendant is the usual one in cases of this kind. The facts in the case are as follows: Seymourville is a flag station on defendant's road. The train on which plaintiff's husband was conductor was a through freight train. It arrived at Seymourville on time. There was a section of the freight train behind it, and the train on which plaintiff's husband was conductor was running under orders to make 20 miles an hour. The limit of the speed of freight trains was 25 miles an hour. On the morning of the accident it was foggy, and the headlight on the locomotive revealed objects not more than 15 feet ahead. The conductor, Crilly, was on the engine, having taken this position in order to secure the safety of his train in consequence of the fog. He was a sober and trusted employe of the company, careful and vigilant. The accident occurred when the train was passing over a trestle in a field. The trestle was over a small canal, uninclosed. A cow was on the track, and was caught between the cross-ties, and was struck by the train. The locomotive was overturned, and the conductor, Crilly, and the engineer were killed. There is no complaint that there were any deficiencies in the equipments of the locomotive, and that the road-bed was not in proper condition. The elements of fault and negligence on the part of the defendant are thus stated by the plaintiff: (1) Compelling, by special order, the train to be run on such a cloudy and foggy night at the rate of 20 to 25 miles per hour, in order also to keep out of the way of another freight train immediately following it, and running at the same speed. (2) The construction of open bridges, serving as traps to catch cattle on the track, by their falling partly through, becoming entangled and held fast in the open spaces, and this for the sole purpose to avoid a little additional expense, knowing that the employes on train could not, if they wished, see and know the condition of the road and track, whirling over it night and day, as they had to do. (3) Knowing and recognizing the necessity of fencing the road, as shown by having fenced various parts of the same, and being then in course of fencing more, yet failing to fence the portion of it about the scene of the accident, in a sugar plantation, it being usual for defendant to fence in sugar plantations, to keep cattle off the track. There was a trial by jury, and a verdict was rendered in favor of the defendant. A new trial was refused, and judgment was entered according to the verdict, from which the plaintiff appealed.

It is a rule frequently affirmed by this court that the verdict of a jury will not be disturbed unless it is manifestly wrong. In the instant case we do not think the verdict was an improper one. There is no proof that the company knew it was a foggy morning about Seymourville. There is no law in this state requiring the fencing in of railroad tracks. Stevenson v. Railway Co., 35 La. Ann. 498. It is not negligence, therefore, for a railroad company to neglect fencing in its tracks where there is no public thoroughfare. The fact that, as in this case, when in thought it was necessary to do so, the company fenced a part of its track, will not impose upon the company the duty of fencing its whole track. The fencing of a portion of it, where the company thinks there is danger, shows, at least, that they are not entirely unmindful of the safety of its trains. In the absence of legislation requiring the entire fencing of the tracks, it leaves the company with the discretion to place fencing where there is, in its judgment, danger. The defendant company seems to have exercised this discretion. At the point where the accident occurred there was no public thoroughfare crossing the track, and there does not appear to be a great necessity for fencing at that particular point. The three causes of negligence assigned by the plaintiff may be disposed of by the fact that the plaintiff's husband knew the orders of the company relative to the speed of its trains and the condition of the track when the accident occurred. In the case of Smith v. Sellars, 40 La. Ann. 530, 4 South. Rep. 333, we said: "The servant assumes the risk only of such hazards as are apparently incidental to an employment, intelligently undertaken; and if he is aware that proper precautions have not been taken for his safety, and still continues the service, notwithstanding the risk, he will be considered as having assumed the responsibility of his own security." Cooley, Torts, 55. It is not shown that the plaintiff's husband was too young or too ignorant to appreciate the danger to which he was exposed. Beach, Contrib. Neg. pp. 371, 372. Judgment affirmed.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE — CONTRACT — COMPENSATION IN DAMAGES.

1. Specific performance of a contract cannot be demanded as an absolute right, as it rests largely in the discretion of the court, to be exercised in strict conformity to equity and justice.

2. The contract must be fixed in its terms, and the liability of the defendant so certain that the duty imposed upon him by the court in ordering the execution of the contract can be readily ascertained and as readily executed.

3. A decree of specific performance will not be granted when the plaintiff can be adequately compensated in a suit for damages.

[1] Rehearing refused, January 18, 1892.

MCENERY, J. This is a suit, under the provisions of ordinance No. 7483 of the city of New Orleans, which embodies a contract between the city of New Orleans and the defendant to compel the latter to a specific performance of certain obligations therein stipulated relative to the building of an embankment or levee on Florida walk from the intersection of People's avenue to Fisherman's canal, according to plans and specifications furnished by the city surveyor. The cost of the work is estimated at $50,000. The importance of the work cannot be denied, and there is also a certainty that there are obligations to the city assumed by the defendant corporation, arising under said ordinance relative to the continuation of the embankment along Florida walk to Fisherman's canal, which the railroad has not carried out in good faith. It has used for a railroad bed an important levee for economical reasons, and in consideration thereof it had agreed to continue the embankment along Florida walk to its intersection with the Fisherman's canal. Its failure to perform its duty has resulted in this suit to compel a specific compliance with its agreement. The injustice of measuring all rights and wrongs, which as a remedy is often inadequate, led to the establishment of the equity power, in common-law jurisdictions, of decreeing a specific performance when the remedy at law has failed. In the jurisprudence of this state the law is expressed in articles 1926, 1927, Rev. Civil Code. It is therefore only when no adequate compensation can be made in damages that courts in this state can decree a specific performance of a contract. The decree cannot be demanded as a matter of right. It rests largely upon judicial discretion, not arbitrarily exercised, but according to the soundest principles of equity and justice. Not only the question of the ability of the plaintiff to seek adequate compensation in damages, but the ability of the court to grant the relief, must necessarily enter into the discretion which the court is bound to exercise in considering the remedy invoked. The contract must be fixed, and the liability of the defendant so certain that the duty imposed upon him by the court in ordering the execution of the contract can be readily ascertained and as readily enforced. Each case must depend upon the facts disclosed. Hennessey v. Woolworth, 128 U. S. 438, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 109. A strict adherence to this jurisprudence is rendered the more necessary because of the summary remedy by mandamus allowed under act 133 of 1888, in the enforcement of contracts entered into with the state, parochial, and municipal authorities by corporations for building levees, bridges, culverts, etc. There must be an element of certainty in the contract, or the courts would be continually met with applications to enforce by mandamus, specifically, obligations arising merely by implication, and the duty, if these writs were indiscriminately granted, would be imposed upon the judiciary of supervising all such contracts in their execution; and it would be bewildered with a multitude of accessory proceedings, in the way of rules for contempt, and additional or supplemental writs. The specifications for the construction of the levee are as follows: "Specifications for embankment from the intersection of People's avenue and Florida walk, along Florida walk to the Fisherman's canal: Said embankment shall be built on such lines as the city engineer will give when called on for them. The excavation shall be from the river side of the embankment, and shall form a canal 30 feet wide on top, and 16 feet wide at the bottom, and 7 feet deep. That there shall be a beam not less than 5 feet between the canal and the embankment. The embankment shall have a net grade of at least two feet above the Metairie ridge, as established by the city engineer, the slopes not steeper than one on two. The width of the crown shall be regulated by the amount of filling furnished by the canal. It shall be surfaced and crowned so as to draw to either side, all substantially as per accompanying diagram. The base shall be cleared of all trees and brush. [Signed] B. M. HARROD, City Engineer." In addition to the building of the levee, the defendant corporation is required to make a canal of certain dimensions. The ordinance, in order to facilitate the extension or continuation of the embankment, authorized the defendant to take dirt from the canal. There is under the ordinance no obligation on the part of the defendant to dig a canal of any dimensions; nor is there any obligation on the defendant to build a levee of any particular dimensions. If the duty of constructing a levee is imposed upon the defendant by the contract, there is some doubt whether a new levee is intended, or a continuation of the levee, in size and dimensions, upon which the defendant corporation was allowed to place its tracks. We are of the opinion that act 133 of 1888 in no way changes the provisions of articles 1926, 1927, Rev. Civil Code, and that when there can be adequate compensation in damages a decree of specific performance will not be granted. The fact that the city is unable to advance the money to build the levee is not sufficient to bring the demand within the exception provided by article 1927, Rev. Civil Code. It is evident from the facts in the case that the city can obtain adequate compensation in a suit for damages for the breach of the contract. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled, avoided, and reversed, and that the plaintiffs' demand be rejected, without prejudice to sue for damages for breach of contract.

DURBRIDGE v. CROWLEY et al. (No. 10,903.)

PETITORY ACTION—LIABILITY FOR RENTS—BENEFICIAL EXPENDITURES.

1. In a petitory action the unsuccessful defendant, though previously a possessor in good faith, is liable for rent or rental value from judicial demand.

2. Defendants are entitled to their beneficial expenditures for repairs, improvements, taxes, etc., but they cannot claim taxes paid by the authors of their invalid title, who had the enjoyment of property exceeding in value the taxes paid.

3. There being no proof of enhanced value of the property resulting from defendants' expenditures thereon beyond the amount of the expenditures themselves, the allowance in their favor of the expenditures satisfies their right.

Appeal from district court, parish of St. Bernard; A. E. LIVAUDAIS, Judge.

Petitory action by Ida Durbridge against Charles H. Crowley and others. Judgment for plaintiff for one-fourth interest in certain lands, and for rents, and judgment for defendants for one-fourth of the expenses claimed by plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Drolla & Augustin, for appellants. Walshe & Braughn, for appellee. Henry Chiapella, for Mrs. Mary E. Doherty, Intervener.

FENNER, J. The plaintiff brought a petitory action against the defendants for the ownership of certain real estate, coupling therewith a demand for partition and for one-fourth the rents or rental value of the property from judicial demand. The case was before us in April last upon exceptions to the cumulation of such demands, which had been maintained in the lower court, but was reversed in this court. Durbridge v. Crowley, 43 La. Ann. 504, 9 South. Rep. 95. The defendants answered, denying plaintiff's allegations of title; alleging that they had paid out as expenses on the property for improvements, repairs, taxes, insurance, etc., the sum of $1,040.49, which should be reimbursed to them in event of destitution of title, and calling in warranty the author of their own title. The warrantor appeared, and pleaded a general denial. On these issues the case went to trial, and resulted in a judgment recognizing plaintiff as one-fourth owner, decreeing a partition, giving her judgment against defendants for rents from judicial demand, and giving defendants judgment against plaintiff for one-fourth of expenses claimed and proved by the former, together with a judgment in favor of defendants against the warrantor for the purchase price. The defendants only have appealed. They do not complain of the judgment so far as the maintenance of plaintiff's title is concerned, or as to the decree of partition. The complaint is confined to the adjustment of the revenues and expenses.

1. As to the rents. Defendants were clearly liable for rent from judicial demand. Rev. Civil Code, 503; Duflibo v. Mayer, 27 La. Ann. 399. The evidence clearly fixes the rental value at the rate allowed by the court. During a portion of the time since judicial demand, defendants rented out the property at that rate; during the rest of the time, they used it themselves. They are liable for the rental value in both cases.

2. As to the allowance in their favor, the court allowed defendants all they claimed in their answer, viz.: One-fourth of the expenses for improvements, taxes, etc., paid out by them during their supposed ownership. Their claim for one-fourth the taxes which have been paid by the authors of their title has no support either in their pleading, in the proof, or in the law. The property is shown to have had a rental value, and those who paid the taxes had the use and enjoyment of the property. Even as possessors in good faith, they would be bound to compensate the taxes against the rents. Appellants also claim an allowance for enhanced value resulting from their expenditure on the property. No enhancement is proved beyond the amount of the expenditures, and the allowance for the latter satisfies all their possible right. Judgment affirmed.

TAXATION—EXEMPTIONS—PUBLISHER OF NEWSPAPER.

The publisher of a newspaper is not a "manufacturer of stationery," within the meaning or intent of article 207 of the constitution. Decision in State v. Dupre, 42 La. Ann. 561, 7 South. Rep. 727, referred to, and its inapplicability to the instant case shown.

F. P. Poché and Lamar C. Quintero, for appellants. Wynne Rogers, for appellee. Buck, Dinkelspiel & Hart, as amici curiæ.

FENNER, J. Plaintiffs, as owners of the presses, boilers, type, machinery, and other appurtenances used by them in printing and publishing the newspaper known as the "Daily Picayune," claim exemption from taxes levied on said property by virtue of article 207 of the constitution, which exempts from taxation property "employed in the manufacture of textile fabrics, leather, shoes, harness, saddlery, * * * stationery, ink, and paper," etc. In the case of State v. Dupre, 42 La. Ann. 561, 7 South. Rep. 727, we had under consideration the preceding article,—206,—which exempts from license taxation all "manufacturers other than those of distilled alcoholic or malt liquors, tobacco and cigars, and cotton-seed oil. The difference between the two articles is very pointed. Article 206 exempts from license tax all manufacturers, with certain designated exceptions; article 207 exempts from property tax only manufacturers of certain designated articles. The question in Dupre's Case was whether the publisher of a newspaper is a manufacturer; the question in the instant case is whether such a publisher is a manufacturer of "stationery." In Dupre's Case we held that, although the publisher of a newspaper might not be considered as a manufacturer, in the general acceptation of that term, yet that the constitution evidently used the term in a broader sense, and we referred to the following article 207, which treated a maker of stationery as a manufacturer, and we held that, if a maker of stationery, such as blank-books, account-books, etc., was a manufacturer, the maker of printed books and of newspapers must equally be so considered. We referred to the provisions of article 207 on the subject of the manufacture of "stationery" merely by way of analogy and illustration; but there is certainly no word in the opinion which hints that the publisher of a newspaper was a manufacturer of stationery. If we had so considered, a mere statement of the fact would have solved the case, since nobody questions that the constitution, in express terms, recognizes the maker of stationery as a manufacturer. In that case, all our reasoning by analogy would have been superfluous, and the dissenting opinions in the case would not have been written. That the publisher of a newspaper, any more than a publisher of books, is not a manufacturer of stationery, is a proposition to our minds so self-evident that its statement is sufficient without the necessity of any enforcement. The contrary would doubtless never have been advanced by any one but for the very gross misinterpretation of our opinion in Dupre's Case. Judgment affirmed.

IMPEACHMENT OF WITNESS — LARCENY — DECLARATIONS OF ACCUSED.

1. It is not necessary to lay the foundations for the introduction of evidence to contradict statements of the accused which form a part of the res gestæ.

2. When a person seeks entry into a house, representing himself to be a gas inspector, and steals from the premises after admission to the same, his declarations made at the time are part of the res gestæ, and it is not necessary to lay the foundation to contradict them.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from criminal district court, parish of Orleans; ROBERT H. MARR, Judge.

James C. Walker, for appellant. Walter H. Rogers, Atty. Gen., for the State.

MCENERY, J. The accused was indicted for larceny, and convicted and sentenced. He has appealed. On the trial of the case two witnesses testified that the accused came to their father's house in the city of New Orleans, and represented himself as a "gas inspector, and wished to look at the gas." He was accompanied through the house, and was permitted to examine the gas-fixtures and gas-burners. Shortly after he left the house a gold watch and chain were missing from the bureau in one of the bedrooms. The evidence against the accused was circumstantial. We have no jurisdiction of the facts in a criminal case, and will only consider them when they are incorporated in a bill of exceptions, and it becomes necessary to do so, in order to pass intelligently upon the questions of law presented. There may have been other circumstances which influenced the verdict of the jury than those disclosed in the testimony of the above witnesses. Therefore it is immaterial to determine whether the accused was convicted on circumstantial or direct evidence. Victor Valois was sworn for the prosecution, and testified that the accused was not an inspector in the employ of the New Orleans Gas Company, and that he had never been so employed, and that he could not be a gas inspector of the New Orleans Gas Company unless he was appointed by the witness. To this evidence the accused objected, on the ground that it was irrelevant, and inadmissible for the reason that no foundation had been laid to warrant said evidence beyond the testimony of the two witnesses who testified to the statements of the accused when he sought admission to the house. And the further objection was made to the evidence of the witness on the ground that the question whether the accused could or could not be a gas inspector unless appointed by the witness was purely in the province of the jury to determine.

The statement made by the accused when he entered the house was a part of the res gestæ. The testimony introduced, therefore, was not for the purpose of contradicting any independent declaration of the accused, made before or after the larceny, but of a fact stated by him, contemporaneous with the larceny. It is not necessary to lay the foundation for the introduction in evidence of any statement made by the accused at the time the offense was committed, and so connected with it as to form a part of the res gestæ. The statement by the witness that the accused could not have been appointed a gas inspector of the New Orleans Gas Company without his consent only corroborated his testimony that the accused had never been in the employ of the company.

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Jan. 4, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

VIOLATION OF CITY ORDINANCE—KEEPING ASSIGNATION HOUSE—AFFIDAVIT.

1. The precision required in indictments for crime before courts of record is not applicable to affidavits against violators of municipal ordinances before recorders' courts.

2. An affidavit against defendant for keeping an assignation house at a designated place, in violation of section 8 of ordinance 4424, is a sufficient foundation for trial and sentence, although it does not state all the circumstances contained in the section referred to as constituting the offense.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from recorder's court of New Orleans; J. C. AUCOIN, Judge.

Prosecution against Baker for keeping an assignation house. From the judgment on conviction she appeals. Affirmed.

James C. Walker, for appellant. Henry Renshaw, Asst. City Atty., and Carleton Hunt, City Atty., for city of New Orleans, appellee.

FENNER, J. The defendant, charged with violating a municipal ordinance, was tried before the recorder, and sentenced to pay a fine of $25, or, in default of payment, to be imprisoned for 30 days. She appeals to this court, and assigns that the fine and penalty imposed are illegal, because she was charged, tried, and sentenced for no offense denounced by any municipal ordinance. The affidavit under which she was held charges her with keeping "an assignation house, in violation of section 8 of city ordinance 4434, Council Series." The said section is in the following words: "That whenever a house of prostitution or assignation, within or without the limits established by this ordinance, may become dangerous to public morals, either from the manner in which it is conducted or the character of the neighborhood in which it is situated, the mayor may, on such facts coming to his knowledge, order the occupant of such house, building, or room to remove therefrom within a delay of five days, by service of notice on such occupants in person, or by posting the notice on the door of the house, building, or room, to remove therefrom within a delay of five days, and, upon such occupants failing to do so, each shall be punished as provided in section 10 of this ordinance." The record shows that the recorder received full proof that accused was keeping an assignation house at No. 336 Dauphine street; that the mayor had received a petition signed by numerous residents of the neighborhood complaining and denouncing the same as injurious to the public morals; that he had served upon defendant the notice provided by the ordinance; and that she had not removed within the delay therein stated. The defendant, however, excepted to all the evidence, and objected to the whole proceeding, on the ground above indicated, that she was not charged with any offense denounced in section 8 of said ordinance. No other offense is denounced by that section except the keeping of a house of prostitution or assignation in a designated locality, after having been notified by the mayor to remove within five days, and after having failed to remove within that delay. The charge in the affidavit that she was keeping an assignation house "in violation of section 8" meant and could mean nothing but that she was so keeping it after receiving the notice, and after the expiration of the delay allowed. The affidavit was sufficient, the evidence under it was properly received, and the sentence corresponded to the offense. The precision required in indictments for crime before courts of record is not required in affidavits for violation of municipal ordinances before recorders' courts which are not courts of record. State v. Dunbar, 43 La. Ann. —, 9 South. Rep. 492. We have already maintained the legality and constitutionality of this ordinance. State v. Mack, 41 La. Ann. 1079, 6 South. Rep. 808. MCENERY, J. The relators apply for a writ of mandamus to compel the respondent judge to issue an order to the civil sheriff of the parish of Orleans, directing him to release on bond, and pay over to the relators, the proceeds of the sale of perishable property seized in several attachment proceedings against them. The several attachment suits were allotted to the different divisions of the civil district court. C. Lazard & Co., the first attaching creditors, obtained the order to sell the property. All the attaching creditors and the relators agreed to the sale; but there was no agreement that the proceeds should remain in the hands of the sheriff, subject to the rights of the attaching creditors, and until the further orders of the court.

In the case of State v. Judge, 37 La. Ann. 261, we held that where property is attached and sold in limine under article 261, Code Prac., the proceeds of the sale of the property continue to be the "property attached," and subject to the rights of the defendant to bond "in every stage of the suit," under article 259 of the Code of Practice. We are referred to the case of State v. Young, 40 La. Ann. 203, 3 South. Rep. 722, and Wickman v Nalty, 41 La. Ann. 285, 6 South. Rep. 123, as announcing a contrary rule. In the first case there was an agreement that the proceeds of the sale of the attached property should remain in the hands of the sheriff, subject to the claims, rights, and liens of the various attaching creditors. In pronouncing the decree, we said: "Whatever the legal right of the relators was, apart from the agreement, the agreement became a law to all the parties thereto, and by its terms they must abide." In the second case there was no application to bond the property. The question presented for consideration was the dissolution of the attachment. All parties had agreed to the sale of the property, and the retention of the proceeds by the sheriff to await final judgment. The rule to dissolve the attachment was discharged on the ground that the agreement effectually debarred the defendant from questioning the validity of the process against him and his property. That the relators are fugitives from justice, and that the numerous attachment suits will involve further litigation on the bond to recover the proceeds, cannot be considered as valid reasons for denying a positive right given to the relators by law. The relators forfeit none of their civil rights by absenting themselves, and it is to be presumed that the bond will be paid in accordance with its terms and conditions. The relators urge that the bond should only be for an amount equal to the proceeds of sale in the hands of the sheriff. The proceeds represent the property. The bond, therefore, must be in an amount and conditioned as though the property was still in the hands of the sheriff, in strict compliance with article 259, Code Prac. The rule herein is made absolute, the relief prayed for granted, and the mandamus made peremptory.

Succession of LLULA. (No. 10,909.)

MARRIAGE—PROOF—CONCUBINAGE—RIGHTS IN COMMUNITY PROPERTY.

1. A wife who, three weeks after marriage, deserts her husband, and in the same community forms an adulterous relationship with another, cannot—being in bad faith—maintain the status of a married woman.

2. She cannot claim her interest in the community as the widow in community.

3. She has only the rights of a concubine, and can only recover from the estate of the deceased, when the concubinage was incidental, and not the motive or cause for the illicit connection, for her personal services as domestic or nurse, or for her industry, when it has enriched the estate, or for the capital and property she furnished in any enterprise undertaken by the deceased, and her profits in the same.

4. The contract of marriage may be proved by any species of evidence not prohibited by law, which does not presuppose a higher species of evidence within the power of the party, and cohabitation and the reputation of man and wife are presumptive evidence of a preceding marriage.

5. But presumption arising from facts which tend to establish the solemnizing of the contract of marriage is not conclusive, but subject to be rebutted by testimony negativing the fact of marriage.

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; NICHOLAS H. RIGHTOR, Judge.

Suit by Mary Ann Whitlow against the succession of Joseph Llula, deceased, to recover one-half of his estate, basing her claim on the fact that she was induced by him to believe that she was his wife, and as such lived with him. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. S. Benedict, for appellant. A. L. Tissott and Henry P. Dart, for appellee.

MCENERY, J. Mary Ann Whitlow brought suit against the succession, alleging in her petition that she is the owner of one-half of the property in the estate of the late Joseph Llula, together with other rights and claims in said succession. She alleges as the basis of her claims to the property in said succession that when a minor, under the age of 20 years, she was induced by the representations of Llula to contract with him, and that she was made to believe and consider that she was his wife, and that she lived with him as such, thereafter, for 28 years, and as his wife, bearing to him two children, both of whom died in infancy; that she maintained his household, controlled his personal affairs, and, educating herself,—he being illiterate,—she conducted his business affairs to within 18 months prior to his death; that during said time she was known, recognized, and respected as his wife, and was introduced by him as his wife, and still bears his name, and is looked upon as his late wife, and is regarded as his widow; that she took care of and educated certain children of the deceased, who were illegitimate; that the entire real and personal effects now standing in the name of said Joseph Llula were taken possession of by his daughter Louisa, wife of Manuel Suarez-Miranda, the same being the entire property acquired during the existence of the community arising from the effects and business and marriage between the said Joseph Llula and herself. She asserts her rights as the widow in community. In addition she avers that she, during the existence of the marriage with Llula, bought a lottery ticket in the Havana Lottery with her paraphernal funds, which drew a prize of $10,000, which she delivered to said Llula, and which he used for his own personal advantage, and for which she also makes demand. There were exceptions filed, which were overruled, but resulted in an order for the petitioner to amend her petition so as to make her demands more explicit. After complying with the order of court, and perfecting her petition, the defendant filed another exception, which was also overruled, and, in our opinion, correctly. The defendant answered, pleading a general denial. The plea of prescription of 3, 5, and 10 years was filed by the defendant. There was judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed.

The facts in the case are that the plaintiff was a married woman when she went to live with Llula. She was married to one Dunker, and three weeks thereafter took up with Llula. Her husband was living in New Orleans at the time, and only a short distance from the house where she lived with Llula. Her husband afterwards joined the Confederate army, and, it is believed, was killed or died in the service of the Confederate government. He never, after he joined the army, returned to the city of New Orleans. Llula lived with the plaintiff until three and a half years before he died. After his separation from her, he paid her regularly five dollars per week. This amount was paid to her regularly until provision was made for her by the universal legatee under the will. She lived with Llula as wife, and he provided for her as such as liberally as his means would permit. She brought no money or property to the establishment, and there is no proof that by her industry she aided and assisted in the acquisition of property. It makes no difference, however, in what light he regarded the relations between him and plaintiff.

The law considers marriage in no other view than as a civil contract. Article 86, Rev. Civil Code; Cole v. Langley, 14 La. Ann. 770. But it is a contract which must be solemnized according to the rules which the Code prescribes. Like all other contracts, it may be proved by any species of evidence not prohibited by law, which does not presuppose a higher species of evidence within the power of the party; and cohabitation, and the reputation of man and wife, are presumptive evidence of a preceding marriage. Hobdy v. Jones, 2 La. Ann. 944; Succession of Hubee, 20 La. Ann. 97. But presumption arising from facts which tend to establish the solemnization of the contract of marriage is not conclusive, but is subject to be rebutted by testimony negativing the fact of marriage. Philbrick v. Spangler, 15 La. Ann. 46; Hubbell v. Inkstein, 7 La. Ann. 252. The plaintiff and her alleged husband entered into an adulterous connection, and the relation between the parties was such that no marriage could have been contracted between them when they first assumed this relationship to each other. The fact that the husband died during this illicit connection cannot give a character to it which it did not have when it was first formed. It continued as it had begun. The fact that he treated the plaintiff as his wife, and introduced her as such in the community, could not destroy or do away with the actual truth of their relationship. Nor could it remove from the plaintiff the knowledge that she was a married woman when she deserted her husband, and went to live with Llula. She was not in good faith, as she knew that her husband was living, and that she could not become the wife of Llula. It was not possible for her to be imposed upon. She was his concubine, and can assert her rights only in that capacity. Where the relationship of concubinage is incidental, and is not the motive and cause of the parties living together, the concubine can recover from the estate of the deceased, if it has been enriched by her industry. There is a quasi contract on the part of the deceased to make compensation. Succession of Pereuilhet, 23 La. Ann. 294; Delamour v. Roger, 7 La. Ann. 152.

The relation of concubinage does not prevent the concubine from demanding a settlement of the affairs during its existence, and a participation in profits derived from capital and labor which she contributed, although the property is immovable, and stands in the name of the deceased. The plaintiff did not contribute in capital and labor to the acquisition of the property left by the deceased. The adulterous connection was the motive and prime cause of the concubinage. She was in fact the mistress of Llula, although he seems to have provided liberally for her as wife, and respected her as such. After the death of Llula, on July 17, 1888, an agreement was made by plaintiff and Louisa Suarez, the universal legatee and heir of Llula, by which the plaintiff received certain property of the succession for services rendered the deceased, as a gift and gratuity, in full for all claims against the succession. She has been placed in possession of this property, and has collected the rents. Alleging that the universal legatee and heir has failed to comply with it, she rejected it, and brought this suit. The legatee has not been put in default, and no demand has been made for the execution of the deed to the property. This agreement is a complete estoppel to plaintiff's demand. During the time plaintiff and Llula were living together, Llula purchased and gave to plaintiff a lottery ticket in the Havana Lottery which drew a prize of $10,000, upon which was realized $2,500. This ticket Llula collected, and used the money. He collected the money in September, 1884. The relation between the parties was not that of husband and wife, and prescription was not, therefore, suspended. The prescription pleaded by defendant must therefore prevail. Judgment affirmed.

MOORE et al. v. LOUISIANA NAT. BANK.

(No. 10,892.)

BANKS — COLLECTIONS — ACCEPTANCE OF DRAFT — DELIVERY OF WAREHOUSE RECEIPT.

1. In the absence of instructions, the collecting agent was authorized to infer that the warehouse receipts were annexed to the draft to secure its acceptance, and were to be surrendered on acceptance.

2. The duty of the collecting banks was to obtain the acceptance of the bill.

3. The acceptor, being a purchaser, was entitled to the goods on his accepting the bill.

4. The sale was a credit sale.

5. It was not proven that the defendant had any notice of any condition made to retain the warehouse certificates until payment, or that the insolvency of the drawees was imminent.

6. The instruction "for collection," in sending a draft to a collecting agent, does not relieve him from the duty of obtaining acceptance of the draft, and the delivery, if required by the drawees, of the warehouse certificates attached.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; ALBERT VOORHIES, Judge.

Action by Moore & Sinnott against the Louisiana National Bank to recover the value of certain property. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. S. Benedict, for appellants. Branch K. Miller and Henry C. Miller, for appellee.

BREAUX, J. This is an action by plaintiffs, a firm in Philadelphia, against the defendant, to recover the value of 50 barrels of whisky, sold by them to Oppenheimer & Co. The latter directed the plaintiffs to draw on them, payable in New Orleans, at one day's sight, for the purchase price. The whisky was in a bonded warehouse, for which plaintiffs held certificates. They drew on the purchasers, and attached their warehouse receipts, indorsed by them, to the bill, which was handed to the First National Bank of Philadelphia, which sent it, with the receipts, to the defendant for collection. The letter was brief, and did not notify the collecting agents to retain the receipts on acceptance of the draft. In compliance with usage, the draft was left with the drawees for examination. It was returned by them with their acceptance, and they retained the warehouse receipts. The acceptors sold these receipts. The draft was returned by the collecting agent to the Philadelphia bank, unpaid. Plaintiffs allege that the illegal delivery of the warehouse certificates by the defendant enabled the drawees to perpetrate a fraud upon their rights. Testimony was admitted for the purpose of proving the local usage and custom of collecting banks in matter of retaining or delivering, after the acceptance, of drafts, bills of lading, or warehouse certificates attached. Two of the witnesses, cashiers, testified that it is the custom of business houses to surrender all evidences of ownership annexed to the draft, immediately after its acceptance, unless instruction is given not to deliver them before its payment. Three other witnesses, also cashiers, testify that their respective banks would not deliver the warehouse certificates or bills of lading attached, on the acceptance of the draft, unless so instructed by the party by whom sent. The sale had been agreed upon. The remaining conditions to perfect it were the acceptance of the draft by the drawee, and the transfer of the thing sold into the possession of the buyer. The seller is bound to deliver the thing which he sells, whether sold for cash or on credit; in case of non-delivery, the seller is liable to damages, if any be thereby occasioned. The term given for payment will not release the vendor from his obligation, unless since the sale the buyer has become a bankrupt, or is in a state of insolvency. The insolvency of the drawees, at the time of the acceptance of the drafts, is not an issue of the case. The allegation and the proof do not raise that question. It is the duty of the collecting agent, immediately after receiving a bill for collection, to take the steps necessary to its prompt acceptance, and, if the instrument be not accepted, he must take the necessary step to fix the liability of the drawee. If he fails, he becomes liable. In order to obtain the acceptance of the drawee, should he decline, unless there are conditions to the contrary, of which he is advised, he must deliver the warehouse receipts attached. If he retains them, he fails to make the delivery of the property the seller is bound to make. He retains the property without any instructions from the seller. Without delivery of the property, the drawee's acceptance would be without consideration, and his draft would be placed in commerce without his having received anything. The acceptance of the draft makes the drawee the principal debtor. As this draft was made payable one day after sight, with the three days of grace, it was demandable, as to its payment, in four days. It was not a cash sale; the records do not disclose that the contract implied a sale for cash. Plaintiffs' counsel argues as if it was an unavoidable inference, that should have controlled the action of the defendant. The general purpose of the law of negotiable paper and the good of commerce require exactness and certainty. The contract is well defined. It must be executed promptly and accurately. A sale on credit will not give rise to the presumption of any intended cash sale.

The restricted indorsement is relied upon by plaintiffs. The indorsement "for collection" does not pass the title or the right to the proceeds of the paper, but it makes the indorsee or collecting agent the trustee of the holder, and as such he cannot be rendered liable if he complies with an agreement made manifest by the contract. From Tiedman on Commercial Paper (page 494) we copy: "But where the bill of exchange is payable in the future, in absence of special agreement, the bill of lading is to be delivered to the vendee upon his acceptance of the bill of exchange according to its tenor, and the holder cannot insist upon holding it until the bill of exchange is paid. The drawee of the bill of exchange may refuse to accept, unless the bill of lading is surrendered to him." It was held in National Bank v. Merchants' Bank, 91 U. S. 92,—an analogous case,—that, in the absence of instructions, the plaintiff in error was justifiable in having surrendered the bill of lading annexed to the bill of acceptance. It is difficult to conceive of any other meaning of the bill. We abbreviate from that opinion: If the drawee had given a promissory note for the goods, payable at the expiration of the stipulated credit, it is clear that the vendor could not retain possession of the property, after receiving the note for the price. The consideration of the sale is the note. The acceptor of a bill of exchange stands in the same position as the maker of a promissory note. If he is denied possession until payment, the transaction ceases to be what it was intended, and is converted into a cash sale. The purchaser of property on credit has a right to immediate possession, unless there be a special agreement that it shall be retained by the vendor. Such an agreement is not to be presumed. The collecting agent has no right to assume that the vendee's term of credit expires before he has the goods, and require him to accept the vendor's draft, and only upon his engagement to deliver at a future time. With reference to the authority of the agent, who was intrusted (as was the agent in the case at bar) with a draft "for collection," the court holds that the instruction means simply to rebut the inference from the indorsement that the agent is the owner of the draft; that the instructions were to collect the money; and, if the drawee is not bound to accept without surrender, it is the duty of the agent to make the surrender. "The drafts were all time drafts." One was drawn at sight; but in Massachusetts, says the court, such drafts are entitled to grace, and in consequence the court classes it as a "time draft." In Lanfear v. Blossman, 1 La. Ann. 148, it was decided that the holder of a bill of exchange cannot, in the absence of proof of any local usage to the contrary, or of the imminent insolvency of the drawee, require the latter to accept the bill of exchange, and he, as holder, retain the bill of lading attached. This decision is favorably commented upon by Justice STRONG, the organ of the court, in the case to which we have just referred. It is pleaded that plaintiffs' claim is sustained by the local custom of merchants, and testimony was heard in support of the plea. The principle upon which such evidence is to be considered is that the parties meant, when they sent the draft, to let the collecting bank follow the local custom and usage, and that, therefore, instructions were unnecessary It is not proven that plaintiffs knew of any such local usage and custom, nor is it at all manifest that there is any local custom as contended by plaintiffs. Analysis of the testimony leads to the conclusion that it is not customary to retain warehouse receipts and bills of lading attached to time drafts, after acceptance. The individual instances proven do not have the force of custom. They are not the result of acts repeated, "which have acquired the force of a tacit and common consent." Civil Code, art. 3. It is not the settled custom. If it were, it would be inconsistent with jurisprudence established by a number of trustworthy decisions which exclude such a custom. The judgment appealed from is affirmed, at plaintiffs' costs.

STATE v. LYONS et al. (No. 10,940.)

EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES — REBUTTING TESTIMONY.

1. After the testimony in chief for the state and the defense had been taken, and a witness for the state had testified in rebuttal, the defendant did not have the legal right to offer witnesses to rebut the testimony given in rebuttal by the state, unless in exceptional cases.

2. It is a matter in the discretion of the judge. It was a privilege asked, which the court could refuse.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Acadia; EDWARD T. LEWIS, Judge.

Indictment against James Lyons, Moses Wilson, and Scott Wilson, for robbery. Lyons and Scott Wilson were convicted, and appeal. Affirmed.

Walter H. Rogers, Atty. Gen., for the State.

BREAUX, J. James Lyons, Moses Wilson, and Scott Wilson were indicted for robbery. Scott Wilson and James Lyons were convicted, and from a judgment sentencing them to seven years' imprisonment in the penitentiary they prosecute this appeal. The case comes up on one bill of exceptions. During the progress of the trial a nolle prosequi was entered as to Moses Wilson. Subsequently he was called to the witness stand as a state witness, and testified in chief that he was not present at the robbery charged in the indictments, and did not participate in the crime charged. After this witness had been examined, the accused, in rebuttal of said testimony, called the prosecuting witness—the one upon whom it was charged the robbery had been committed—for the purpose of showing that Moses Wilson was present, and assisted in robbing witness, and that he had sworn falsely. The witness was not permitted to answer the questions propounded. The defendants, through counsel, reserved a bill on the ground that the testimony was admissible, as it was in rebuttal. The trial judge's statement shows that the state had closed its case in chief against all of the accused; that the accused had testified and closed their case; that it was at that time the district attorney entered a nolle prosequi as to Moses Wilson, one of the defendants, and placed him on the stand as a witness for the state in rebuttal of the evidence given by the other two defendants; that after he had testified the defendants called the prosecuting witness for the purpose of impeaching the testimony of Moses Wilson; that the witness had stated three or four times in his examination in chief that Moses Wilson was present, and took part in committing the robbery; that the contradiction was plain; and the witness was questioned, says the trial judge, for no other purpose than to make him repeat a declaration he had previously made several times before the jury, and that it was not in rebuttal, but a useless repetition of the testimony. The defendants had no legal right to examine witnesses for the purpose of rebutting the testimony given in rebuttal by the state. The trial judge properly exercised the discretion with which he is intrusted. The defendants have not been deprived of any of their legal rights by refusing to hear evidence already heard. The accused have not shown any ground upon which they can be relieved. Judgment affirmed.

STATE v. CLESI. (No. 10,890.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Jan. 4, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

OBJECTIONS TO JURISDICTION—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. In case the record discloses that there was raised in a recorder's court no contestation as to the jurisdiction of the court, nor as to the constitutionality or legality of the city ordinance under which the appellant is prosecuted, the appellate jurisdiction of this court does not attach.

2. In the absence from the transcript of the city ordinance involved, this court has no power to revise the judgment appealed from.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from recorder's court of New Orleans; SMITH, Judge.

Prosecution against Frank Clesi for selling goods within the prohibited radius from a public market. From a judgment on conviction he appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas F. Maher, for appellant. Henry Renshaw, Asst. City Atty., and Carleton Hunt, City Atty., for the City of New Orleans.

WATKINS, J. Defendant being charged with selling and peddling goods within the prohibited radius from a public market of the city, and having been duly convicted and sentenced to pay a fine of $10, or, in default thereof, to be imprisoned 20 days in the parish prison, prosecutes the present appeal therefrom. The prosecution arises under the provisions of city ordinance No. 4,274, relative to peddling within six squares of the public markets, and it was commenced and prosecuted in the name of the state. The affidavit is in the usual form. The defendant appeared, and filed a demurrer and exception to the proceedings, on the following grounds, viz.: (1) That the prosecuting witness is not authorized by any law or ordinance to represent the city of New Orleans, wherein said city is an interested party, nor the right to sue for the enforcement of the ordinances of the city; (2) that the ordinance under which the prosecution is taken provides who are the proper officers to conduct the proceedings for its violation; (3) that he is not a peddler, either within the spirit or the letter of the ordinance 4274; (4) that his prosecution, by an unauthorized person under this ordinance, violates article 1 of the constitution; (5) that said ordinance is "unreasonable, and * * * not impartial." It appears from the foregoing that in the court below there was no contestation as to the jurisdiction of the court, or as to the constitutionality or legality of the ordinance, for a violation of which he is being prosecuted. In State v. Tsni Ho, 37 La. Ann. 50, this court said: "It is obvious that the 'contestation' referred to in the constitution must have existed in the lower court, and the fact of its existence must affirmatively appear on the face of the record." The same principle is recognized in City of New Orleans v. Hill, 32 La. Ann. 1161. The converse of the same is announced in State v. Murphy, 41 La. Ann. 526, 6 South. Rep. 816. This being the case, defendant has disclosed no appealable interest in the premises. Furthermore, the city ordinance under which the defendant is prosecuted was not offered in evidence in the court below, and was not incorporated in the record brought up here; hence, if the case was jurisdictionally well grounded, this court is powerless to revise the judgment appealed from in its absence. It has so decided frequently. City of New Orleans v. Hill, 32 La. Ann. 1161; City of New Orleans v. Labatt, 33 La. Ann. 107. But it appears, from an examination of an ex parte motion filed in this court by counsel for the appellant since the date of submission, that the ordinance is now presented for our consideration. It would be altogether irregular to take any notice of it without resort being had to certiorari, and in the absence of a consent obtained from the appellee. There is nothing left for us to do but to affirm the judgment appealed from, and it is so ordered.

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Nov. 30, 1891. 44 La. Ann.)

ACCOUNTING BY TUTOR—PRESCRIPTION—WAIVER ON MOTION TO DISMISS.

1. In case an appellant procures certiorari and brings up documents in the original which are missing from the transcript, and also a supplemental transcript, during the pendency of appellee's motion to dismiss, and under a reservation by the court, the motion will be denied, inasmuch as such records satisfy all of the appellee's reasonable requirements.

2. Where the objection taken is that a transcript of appeal improperly includes two different and distinct records, incompatible with each other, it will not be entertained, the transcript disclosing the cumulation of the two causes in the district court by consent.

ON THE MERITS.

Notwithstanding the action of an emancipated minor against her tutor, respecting acts of tutorship, is prescribed by four years, to begin from the date of his majority, if the tutor take the initiative, and file an account of his acts of tutorship, to which his former ward makes opposition, the plea cannot be made available to the tutor. In such case the accountant's act, in submitting his gestion to judicial investigation and judgment, is tantamount to an abandonment of the benefit of the bar of the statute.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; ALBERT VOORHIES, Judge.

Mary Harvey, as tutrix of the succession of Harry Harvey, deceased, filed her final account, to which J. J. Culligan, as tutor of his minor children, made opposition. To this opposition the tutrix and her son Harry Harvey filed a plea of prescription. Judgment sustaining the plea. Suit by Mary Harvey against William Harvey and others for partition. Opposition by defendant J. J. Culligan, as tutor. Judgment for plaintiff. From the two judgments Culligan appeals. Reversed, and rehearing refused.

B. R. Forman, for appellant. Gibson & Hall and R. L. Tullis, for appellees.

ON MOTION TO DISMISS APPEAL.

WATKINS, J. The grounds assigned are: (1) That the transcript is insufficient and incomplete, not containing many of the most important documents filed in and used by the lower court on the trial, and which are essential to a trial of the case in this court on appeal; (2) that the transcript contains two different and antagonistic cases, which should have been brought up separately.

Since the filing of the motion to dismiss appeal, under a special reserve by this court, counsel for appellant procured certiorari, and thereunder has brought up a supplemental transcript, said to contain the missing documents. He has also brought up in the original a large bundle of papers from the files of the civil district court, as an additional supplement to the transcript. As the case is undisposed of, and the production of these copies and originals appears to satisfy all the reasonable requirements of the appellee's motion, this ground may be dismissed without further consideration.

On the other branch of the motion it will suffice to state that the two cases, respectively entitled, in the civil district court, "Succession of Harry Harvey, No. 19,508," and "Mary Harvey v. Harry Harvey, Wm. H. Harvey, et als., No. 20,017," which are included in one transcript, are germane to each other, and form essential parts of identically the same litigation. The original suit was for a partition of the succession of Harry Harvey between the surviving widow and heirs of deceased. The other proceeding is merely a demand by the tutor of certain of the grandchildren upon the grandmother for an accounting and settlement of the proceeds of property sold, rents and revenues collected, and of his disposition of certain movables, left in possession, the aggregate value of which is placed at some $43,000. It appears that the Succession of Harvey, No. 19,508, was allotted to division E, and the partition suit was improperly allotted to division C, and by consent of parties the latter was transferred to division E, and thereafter all proceedings were conducted before division E under double titles and numbers, as one case, and without objection. On this state of facts, we are of opinion that the transcript was correctly made and brought up, and would have been defective otherwise. Vascocu v. Woodward, 35 La. Ann. 555. Motion denied.

ON THE MERITS.

Harry Harvey died in April of 1872, leaving Mary Harvey, his widow, surviving, and seven children, only one of whom, Josephine, was of full age, and who subsequently married. William F. Blakemore, deceased, left a will, in which he bequeathed in favor of his widow and seven children all of his property, share and share alike. In the will no designation of an executor was made, and there was no dative testamentary executor appointed. The widow qualified as natural tutrix, and, as such, administered the succession of the deceased, after having caused the last will of her husband to be probated. No account of her gestion was filed until January 1, 1887, at which time her youngest child, Harry, became of full age. That was a final account, or purported to be; and on the 10th of June, 1889, she filed a supplemental account. Mrs. Harvey's daughter Alice married J. J. Culligan on June 15, 1881, and died in 1885, leaving her husband and two minor children surviving. She came of full age on the 10th of January, 1875, five years before her marriage, and two years after her father's death. Representing his two surviving children,—grandchildren of Mary and Harry Harvey,—Culligan, tutor, opposed the first account on various grounds; all of the other heirs having consented to their mother's management, administration, and account. During all of those years Alice Harvey resided in and made the family domicile her home until a year had elapsed after her marriage. During this time she apparently acquiesced in all that her mother had done, and she was furnished from the revenues and resources of the common property the means of support and a livelihood. In 1879, nearly four years after she became of age, she voluntarily joined the other children and her mother in an act of sale of a piece of the common property, in order to raise money wherewith to pay taxes and debts incurred in the support of the family, herself among the number. To the opposition of Culligan, tutor, to the original account, a plea of four years' prescription was filed by Mrs. Mary Harvey, acountant, and Harry Harvey. There was judgment sustaining this plea of prescription, and the supplemental account, not having been opposed, was duly homologated, as of course. Widow Mary Harvey brought a suit for a partition of the common property, on the 28th of January, 1887, to which all of the children consented; the tutor, Culligan, alone making opposition. This suit was subsequently transferred to the mortuaria. There was a judgment awarding a partition, and Culligan, tutor, made opposition to its homologation; but it was unavailing. The property was sold for the purpose of effecting a partition, and the proceeds of sale were deposited in bank, to await the issue. Those are the two judgments from which Culligan, tutor, has appealed.

In regard to the prescription of four years, the claim of the exceptants is that Alice Harvey survived her father's death, in 1872; became of full age on the 10th of January, 1875; was married on the 15th of June, 1881; and died on the 10th of September, 1885; hence, the two children born of that marriage inherited her succession as beneficiary heirs, and succeeded to her rights, just in the same situation they were in at her death; they participating in their grandfather's succession by representation. Rev. Civil Code, art. 894 et seq. The plea is urged against the opposition of Culligan, tutor, as the legal representative of Alice Harvey, his deceased wife, treating her as an emancipated minor, of whom his minor children were only representatives. The article of the Code relied upon as sustaining the plea is couched in the following words, to-wit: "The action of the minor against his tutor, respecting the acts of his tutorship, is prescribed by four years, to begin from the date of his majority." Rev. Civil Code, art. 362. While an opposition to an account is not an action, but an answer, yet, as the plea of the accountant has treated it as such, for the purpose of argument we may so consider it. Essentially, the account and opposition, considered together, constitute an action "respecting the acts of the tutorship." This action was instituted long since the expiration of the four-year limit, counting from the date of the majority of Alice Harvey, mother of opponents. It was during the progress of the trial of the account that Mrs. Harvey tendered the plea of four years' prescription. The contention of the opponent is that, while the tutrix of an emancipated minor cannot be compelled to render an account "respecting the acts of her tutorship after the lapse of four years, to begin from the date of her majority," yet, if such tutrix does file an account, in which she deals with the acts of her tutorship, and it is opposed by the ward, she is judicially estopped, at this stage of the proceedings, from availing herself of this prescription. The learned judge of the lower court maintained the plea, but we cannot concur in his ruling. As there appears to be no case in which the question has been adjudicated, he evidently treated it as res nova, as we shall be necessitated to do. To sustain the plea of the accountant, under existing circumstances, would, in our opinion, be equivalent to allowing her to first inaugurate a judicial proceeding, and, finding it opposed, to defeat any investigation, by use of the bar of prescription. This she evidently cannot be permitted to do. The doctrine, which permits one to employ as a shield that which he cannot use as a sword, would, in this manner, be reversed, so as to allow an accountant to use as a sword that which she cannot employ as a shield. If, however, the plea should be maintained, it would only cut off inquiry in respect to the acts of Mrs. Harvey as tutrix between the year 1872, when Mr. Harvey died, and 1875, when Alice became of age; because since then Mrs. Harvey has possessed and administered the common property, for which she must account in the partition suit. By remanding the case, the whole matter can be tried and decided together. It is therefore ordered and decreed that both judgments appealed from be annulled and reversed; that the plea of four years' prescription be avoided; and the whole litigation remanded for further and final disposition and decree; the costs of appeal to be taxed against the succession, and other costs to await the final termination of the litigation.

Successions of THEZE et al. (No. 10,905.)

JUDICIAL SALES—JURISDICTION OF COURT—DISPUTING RECORDS.

It has long been the settled jurisprudence of this court that a purchaser at a judicial sale is held bound to look to the jurisdiction of the court granting the order of sale, but the truth of the record concerning matters within its jurisdiction cannot be disputed; and it has been sanctioned in many recent cases, and must be adhered to as a rule of property.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; ALBERT VOORHIES, Judge.

Successions of Auguste Theze and Marcel Theze, deceased, consolidated. On sale of the property it was adjudicated to George Sick, who declined to accept title, and was ruled to show cause why he should not comply with the adjudication. His objections being adjudged untenable, he appeals. Judgment affirmed.

Ernest J. Wenck, for appellant. Augustus Bernau, for appellee.

WATKINS, J. Auguste Theze and Marcel Theze, being joint owners of the lot and property, with improvements, situated at No. 308 Decatur street, city of New Orleans, a one-half undivided interest was inventoried in each of their successions, which were separately administered,—one by an executor, and the other by an administrator. Upon proper representations of the respective legal representatives of said successions, the proper judge granted two separate orders for the sale of said respective interests in said property, to pay debts of said successions; said sales being fixed for the same date, and were to be made on like terms. Subsequently the two mortuariæ were cumulated, and afterwards treated and dealt with as one succession; and in this situation the sale was made, and the property adjudicated to George Sick, at the price of $3,400. He having declined to accept title, said representatives ruled him to show cause why he should not comply with the terms of the adjudication; and on the trial, his objections being found and adjudged untenable, said adjudicatee has appealed. The grounds relied upon by defendant in rule are that the said successions, nor either of them, owed any debts, and there was no necessity for either an administration thereof or for the sale of said property. As a fact it appears that the public administrator petitioned the court to be appointed administrator of one of said successions and dative testamentary executor of the other. That this application was opposed by Henry Theze, an heir of deceased; the ground of his resistance being that said deceased, nor their successions, owed any debts, and there was no necessity for an administration thereof; and, if an administration was deemed necessary, opponent was entitled to be preferred in receiving appointment. His opposition appears to have been overruled on the ground first stated, and sustained on the other; he having been qualified and confirmed, and is now acting as administrator and executor. As the proceedings appear to have been perfectly regular, and as the court evidently had jurisdiction of the res, the objections of the adjudicatee do not appear to be jurisdictional and are therefore unavailing to him. We have so decided in many cases. It has long been the settled jurisprudence of this court that a purchaser at a judicial sale is held bound to "look to the jurisdiction of the court granting the order of sale, but the truth of the record concerning matters within its jurisdiction cannot be disputed." Graham's Heirs v. Gibson, 14 La. 146; Ball v. Ball, 15 La. 182; Rhodes v. Bank, 7 Rob. (La.) 66; McCullough v. Minor, 2 La. Ann. 468; Shaffet v. Jackson, 14 La. Ann. 154; Webb v. Keller, 26 La. Ann. 596; Fraser v. Zylicz, 29 La. Ann. 536; Herriman v. Janney, 31 La. Ann. 280. Also that the "purchaser at a judicial sale of property of the succession is not bound to look further back than the order of the court directing the sale." Succession of Hebrard, 18 La. Ann. 485; Woods v. Lee, 21 La. Ann. 505; Beale v. Walden, 11 Rob. (La.) 72; Brosnaham v. Turner, 16 La. 440; Nesom v. Weis, 34

La. Ann. 1004. This doctrine has been repeatedly affirmed in more recent cases. Webb v. Keller, 39 La. Ann. 55, 1 South. Rep. 423; Linman v. Riggins, 40 La. Ann. 761, 5 South. Rep. 49; Succession of Lehmann, 41 La. Ann. 987, 7 South. Rep. 33; Gale v. O'Connor, 43 La. Ann. 717, 9 South. Rep. 557. Our understanding of the adjudicatee's defense is that the record is, in effect, untrue in its statement that the successions of the two decedents owed debts necessitating an administration and sale. As such it certainly and evidently invades the rule just announced, —that "the truth of the record concerning matters within the jurisdiction of the court" granting the order of sale "cannot be disputed." In Webb v. Keller, 39 La. Ann. 55, 1 South. Rep. 423, we maintained the validity of a sale made under an order of court which had not been preceded by a tableau or statement of debts, and held that debts placed upon a tableau subsequently filed, and homologated by the judgment of a competent court, were sufficient, because that was "a mere irregularity, and did not challenge the proceedings as null and void." It is true that that suit was a revocatory action against an adjudicatee in possession; but, in Succession of Byrne, 38 La. Ann. 518,—a suit like the instant one,—we made a similar ruling, stating: "We do not regard the alleged irregularities in the partition of such a character as to cast a cloud upon the title of Madeline and John Bligh Byrne in the sense of Gassen v. Palfrey, 9 La. Ann. 560, and Succession of Weber, 16 La. Ann. 420. Indeed, the respondent urges no complaint of their title at all. His complaints are of irregularities in the partition proceedings alone." True it is that this court did hold in Succession of Domestre, 40 La. Ann. 571, 4 South. Rep. 328, that, athough a purchaser may be protected by the order of court directing a sale in a matter over which it had jurisdiction, yet he has the right to inquire into the validity of the proceedings conducive to the order of sale, to ascertain whether, under the showing made, the court had the power to make the order." But we had occasion in a subsequent case to examine that decision in reference to a suit like the instant one, and we said of it that it appeared that "minors had an interest in the property," and that, therefore, "we viewed it as a partition proceeding in disguise, without the prescribed forms of law having been attended to, and that its covert purpose was to divest illegally the title of the minors." Succession of Lehmann, 41 La. Ann. 987, 7 South. Rep. 33. Of course, the judge had no authority to thus order a sale in globo of minor's property for the purpose of the partition of a succession composed of sundry properties, the proceeds of the sale largely exceeding the debts due, and the result of which was to leave the surplus in the hands of a tutor dispensed from bond. That was an extreme case,—one sui generis. But in the successions of Auguste and Marcel These there was but a single piece of property,—that under consideration,—which owed some small debts and the costs of administration. There is not shown to have been any cash in the hands of the legal representatives thereof, nor any revenues wherewith to discharge the same; and the heirs were of full age. There exists no parallel between the two cases. After looking into the question very carefully, our judgment is convinced that the district judge correctly made the rule on the adjudicatee absolute. Judgment affirmed.

SMITH et al. v. SINNOTT. (No. 10,894.)

EXECUTORS—RIGHT TO SUE—RECOVERY OF ASSETS —PARTIES.

An executor has capacity to institute and prosecute to judgment real actions for recovery, into the succession of the testator, of property in the hands of strangers, without joining his universal legatees as plaintiff; and for like purpose to sue for the partition of partnership property.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FRANCIS A. MONROE, Judge.

Suit by Thomas Smith and the executors of Charles Smith against James B. Sinnott for partition. Rule to compel Thomas Eagan, the purchaser, to take title of the property adjudicated to him on the sale thereof. From a judgment discharging the rule plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, and rule made absolute.

J. C. Gilmore and S. L. Gilmore, for appellants. Benjamin Ory, for appellee.

WATKINS, J. This is a proceeding by rule, taken on the part of plaintiffs in the suit entitled "Thomas Smith and Executors of Charles Smith v. James B. Sinnott," it being a suit for the partition of the property situated at the corner of Perdido and Howard streets, in the city of New Orleans, to compel Thomas Eagan, purchaser, to take title thereto; same having been adjudicated to him at the price of $3,000. The two grounds of objection urged to the title are (1) that all parties in interest were not cited as defendants in said partition suit; and (2) that the executors of Charles Smith—one of the joint co-proprietors—were incapacitated in law to prosecute said suit, and stand in judgment therein without being joined and authorized by the heirs of the deceased testator. On the trial the lower judge discharged the rule, and plaintiffs have appealed. The facts are as follows, viz.: At an auction sale, made in the succession of James Cousley, the property sought to be partitioned was adjudicated to Smith Bros. & Co. in the foreclosure of a special mortgage. Succession of Cousley, 39 La Ann. 570, 2 South. Rep. 544. Smith Bros. & Co. was a commercial partnership, composed of Charles Smith, Thomas Smith, and James B. Sinnott. In the partition suit, Thomas Smith and the executors of Charles Smith, deceased, were plaintiffs, and James B. Sinnott, the other and third co-proprietor, was cited and made defendant; the plaintiffs alleging themselves to be the joint owners of two-thirds, and defendant of one-third, of the property, and they being unwilling any longer to hold same in indivision. There was no dispute about facts in that case, the defendant appearing in propria persona, admitting the joint ownership of the property, and submitting himself to the jurisdiction and judgment of the court. Under the judgment therein rendered, the property was adjudicated to the defendant in rule, and procès-verbal duly executed. There are no forced heirs to the succession of Charles Smith, but there are testamentary heirs or universal legatees under his will. Rev. Civil Code, art. 1609; Succession of Dupuy, 4 La. Ann. 570. Some of the legatees are present, or represented in the state, who were not joined as plaintiffs in the partition suit, and who are not made parties defendant. The proof shows that the administration of his estate has not been closed, and said legatees have not been put in possession of their inheritance. The testator owed no debts, and the only sums there are to be disbursed by his executors are the expenses of administration, and one special legacy, for the payment of which, it is admitted, there has been, at all times, a sufficiency of cash on hand. Therefore the question for decision is whether, under the circumstances related, there were proper and sufficient parties plaintiff to authorize the judge a qua to render a valid judgment decreeing a partition of the common property; or, in other words, did the executors of Charles Smith have the capacity to institute and prosecute the suit, and stand in judgment, the defendant urging no objection? These are the questions propounded by a purchaser at a public judicial sale, who alleges the incapacity of said executors on that account, and declines to take title. The property sought to be partitioned was undoubtedly held and owned in indivision by the three members of the commercial firm of Smith Bros. & Co., notwithstanding the title was taken in the partnership name, because a commercial partnership cannot deal in or acquire ownership of real estate. Rev. Civil Code, art. 2825; Skillman v. Purnell, 3 La. 494; McKee v. Griffin, 23 La. Ann. 419; Baca v. Ramos, 10 La. 420; Hall v. Sprigg, 7 Mart. (La.) 244; Thomas v. Scott, 3 Rob. (La.) 256; Tippett v. Jett, Id. 313; Millaudon v. Railroad Co., Id. 488.

Under the law, it is the duty of the curator of a vacant succession, or of absent heirs, to institute suit for the partition of property held in joint ownership by the deceased and third persons, in order that the part belonging to the deceased in the partnership property be ascertained. Succession of Dumestre, 42 La. Ann. 411, 7 South. Rep. 624; Rev. Civil Code, art. 1135. But, those principles of law being conceded, the question yet remains for ascertainment, had the executors of Charles Smith capacity to bring the partition suit and stand in judgment? Conceding for the argument, and nothing more, that article 123 of the Code of Practice has equal application to suits brought by, as to those brought against, executors,—which we do not undertake to decide,—it is evident to our minds that the "heirs" therein referred to are legal heirs, or heirs of the blood, (Rev. Civil Code, art. 879,) and not "the universal successors of the deceased," (Id. arts. 884, 1607.) In the former article it is provided "that the person who has become the universal successor of the deceased, who is possessed of all of his property and rights, and who is subject to all the charges for which the estate is responsible, is called the 'heir,'" etc. The latter provides that "the universal legatee is bound to demand * * * the delivery of the effects included in the testament." In this case the will was not introduced in evidence, and, presumably, it gave to the executors full seisin of the testator's effects. Id. art. 1659. But if they were not given full seisin, they were entitled "to execute the legacies contained in the will, and to cause any other conservatory acts of the property to be made." Id. art. 1660. To eliminate from the property of a succession the interest of a stranger is a matter of administration, and a suit for that purpose is such a "conservatory act of the property" as an executor may do in his own right and capacity. Id. arts. 1135, 1660. The universal legatees of the deceased have not been placed in possession of their inheritance. Until the partition was perfected, they could not be placed in possession of the testator's property and rights, nor could they legally become subject to the charges for which his estate is responsible. The executors have not discharged the special legacies. The contingency has not arisen in this case in which the universal legatees are entitled to be called "heirs" of the deceased. The defendant, Sinnott, filed an answer in the partition proceedings, admitted the joint ownership of the plaintiffs in the property, and submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court. That the executors of Charles Smith had capacity to sue and stand in judgment, and that the court had jurisdiction ratione materiæ et personæ, there is in our minds no doubt; at least, in a case like this, where there are no forced heirs, and when the execution of the will involves the administration and disposition of the whole estate. Entertaining this view, we must reverse the judgment. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled and reversed, and it is now ordered that the rule taken to compel the adjudicatee to accept title and complete the adjudication be made absolute, at the defendant's cost in both courts.

Succession of VIDAL. (No. 10,893.)

ACTION TO ANNUL WILL—RIGHTS OF HEIR—VALIDITY OF TESTAMENT—EXECUTION—RECITATION IN WILL.

1. In a proceeding, in a succession under administration by a testamentary executor, by an heir to annul the will and the probate thereof, and to be recognized as sole legal heir, and as such to be put in possession of the succession, questions of title to specific property are foreign to the issue, and should not be ingrafted on such a proceeding. The heir, when recognized, takes the rights of the succession as they are; no more, no less.

2. Under the law of Louisiana a testament is a solemn act, dependent for existence upon compliance with the forms prescribed by law.

3. The Code requires that a testament by public nuncupative act shall be received by the notary, dictated by the testator, written down by the notary, and read to the testator, all in the presence of the witnesses; and that express mention must be made in the will itself that all the foregoing requirements have been complied with.

4. Where such a will only recites that the will was read in the presence of the witnesses, and does not declare that it was dictated and written down in their presence, the omission is fatal.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; NICHOLAS H. RIGHTOR, Judge.

Petition of Antonio Bilbenny against Francisco Bilbenny, executor of the succession of Rosa Vidal, to set aside the will. Judgment for petitioner. The executor appeals. Affirmed.

W. S. Benedict, for appellant. Merrick & Merrick, for appellee.

FENNER, J. After the death of Rosa Vidal one Francisco Bilbenny, her cousin, presented to the court a notarial document, purporting to be the testament of deceased by public nuncupative act, by which he was constituted her universal legatee, and alleging that he was also her heir at law; prayed that the will be probated and ordered for execution; that an inventory be taken, and that he be appointed and qualified as testamentary executor. The will was accordingly probated. Francisco Bilbenny was appointed and qualified as executor, and an inventory was taken, exhibiting, as the only property of the succession, certain real estate, therein fully described, and valued at $3,000. No further proceedings had been taken when one Antonio Bilbenny, a resident of Barcelona, Spain, appeared, and filed a petition, in which he averred that he was the legitimate uncle of deceased, and her nearest of kin and sole legal heir; that the will which had been probated was null and void; that the succession owed no debts, and that, as sole heir, he accepts the same purely and simply; that the succession property consisted of the real estate which had been described in the inventory, together with the fixtures and stock in trade of the business therein conducted; that he was entitled to the recovery and possession of all said property; and he prayed for judgment annulling the will and the probate thereof, and recognizing him as sole heir of deceased, and, as such, entitled to recover and to be put in possession of all her estate, real and personal; and that Francisco Bilbenny, "so-called testamentary executor," be cited and be decreed to deliver the real and personal property belonging to the succession, and to account for the same and for the rents and revenues thereof. Francisco Bilbenny answered, pleading, first, the general denial, and further averring "that he is the owner in possession of the property referred to in good faith, and by just title and by right of law, * * * all of which he is ready to verify by proceedings at law in this honorable court as well as by fact." In the course of the trial under these issues the defendant sought to introduce certain evidence tending to show an independent title to the property not derived from the succession; to which the counsel for plaintiff objected on the ground (substantially) that Francisco Bilbenny was estopped from claiming adverse title to property which the inventory, taken and homologated at his own instance, declared to be the property of the succession. The judge a qua ruled out the testimony, but on grounds different from that stated in plaintiff's objection, viz.: "That the only question before the court here is as to heirship vel non, and not as to ownership of property, * * * and no evidence is admissible here as to ownership of any specific piece of property claimed to belong to the succession of Rosa Vidal." To this ruling the counsel for both sides excepted. Counsel for Antonio claims that by his answer Francisco had put at issue the title to specific property, and had propounded a title in himself, resting on nothing but his denial of Antonio's allegations, and that his title must stand or fall by the decision of the issues as to the nullity of the will and heirship. Counsel for Francisco contends that he has set up an adverse title generally, based on law and fact, and had the right to establish such title by all appropriate evidence. The judge concluded, as we think, rightly, that this is an action by an heir to annul a will and the probate thereof, and to be recognized as sole heir of deceased, and as such to be put in possession of her estate, and authorized to recover the same. Such is the obvious purport of the petition of plaintiff, as indicated by the prayer thereof, which we have epitomized above, and which, as we have often held, determines the character of the action. The obscure and vague assertion of adverse ownership contained in Francisco's answer cannot be permitted to ingraft upon such an action the features of a petitory action involving title to specific property, which features are entirely foreign to the relief sought. An heir, when recognized and put in possession, succeeds to the rights of the de cujus, whatever they may be, and must assert those rights against adverse claimants by independent proceeding after the decree recognizing his heirship and putting him in possession. We do not indicate what further proceedings may be proper in this particular case by reason of Francisco's relation as executor; and still less do we determine the soundness of the estoppel set up in the objection to evidence. This brings us to the consideration of the vital questions involved in the case.

1. As to the nullity of the testament. The instrument, which is intended as a will by public nuncupative act, is in the following words, (omitting the dispositions:) "Be it known that on this 20th day of March, 1888, I, R. H. Dowing, a notary public in and for the parish and state aforesaid, did repair to the house of Miss Rosa Vidal, inhabitant of the said parish of Orleans and state of Louisiana, where, at her request and dictation, the following instrument was written by me, the said notary, and declared by the said Miss Rosa Vidal to be her last will and testament. * * * In faith whereof said Rosa Vidal has signed or affixed her mark, she hereby declaring to me, notary, that, being unable to sign the foregoing instrument, owing to the fact that she was and has been for some time suffering from paralysis, she has hereto affixed her mark in presence of Messieurs Jacinto Bunal, P. Barrere, and Louis Macardby, witnesses of lawful age, residing in this parish, and me, said notary, after having read the same in a loud and audible voice in the presence of the said witnesses and the testator, and without turning aside to other acts, this 20th day of March, 1888." A comparison of this instrument with the one recited at length in the decision in the case of Succession of Wilkin, 21 La. Ann. 115, will exhibit a complete identity in every feature having the slightest bearing on the question. In that case the will was pronounced void because it contained no "express mention" that the will was "received," "dictated by the testator," and "written by the notary as dictated" in the presence of the witnesses. A like conclusion was reached in two other undistinguishable cases: Christine v. Verbois, 11 La. Ann. 108; Devall v. Palms, 20 La. Ann. 203. In presence of such perfect precedents, it is needless to cite others announcing similar principles in cases only analogous. Stare decisis would sufficiently support a similar ruling in this case, even if the principle were doubtful, but we consider it, beyond question, sound. Testaments, like donations inter vivos, belong, under our law, to the class of solemn acts; that is, acts that depend for their existence upon compliance with the forms prescribed by law. Our Code requires that the will by public nuncupative act shall be received by the notary, dictated by the testator, written down by the notary, and read to the testator, all in presence of the witnesses; and that "express mention" must be made in the will itself that the foregoing requirements have been complied with. No proof of the most scrupulous fulfillment of every formality would suffice without this "express mention." No particular form of words is required. They must be such as expressly declare in substance that the foregoing requirements were fulfilled. Implication cannot be resorted to, unless at least it be an implication necessarily involved in the meaning of the express words used. In this case it is apparent that there is no "express mention" that the dictation and writing down of the will took place in the presence of the witnesses. The only thing which the instrument mentions as having been done in the presence of the witnesses is the reading of the will. It does not follow by any necessary implication from the statement that the will was "read in the presence of the witnesses" that, therefore, it has been dictated and written down in their presence. Those acts succeed each other in point of time, and it might well be that the witnesses who were absent when the will was dictated and written might have been introduced in time to hear it read. The judge rightly annulled the will and the probate thereof.

2. The sufficiency of the proof of the sole heirship of Antonio Bilbenny is not questioned, and does not admit of question. The judgment of the court conforms substantially to the prayer of Antonio's petition, and is not subject to any complaint, because it reserves the right to all parties to contest the ownership of specific property in appropriate form of action. This reservation conforms to the ruling made on the evidence, which we have already approved. It passes on nothing, and reserves nothing beyond what would have been reserved by law without mention. Judgment affirmed.

WEINTZ et al. v. KRAMER et al. (No. 10,911.)

NOTARY PUBLIC — NEGLIGENCE — CONFECTION OF TESTAMENT—ACTION ON BOND—PRESCRIPTION.

1. The prescription of one year is not applicable to an action brought upon the bond of a notary public for failure to perform the duties incumbent upon him.

2. The obligations of the bond of a notary public in New Orleans are governed by section 2521, Rev. St., which is a special statute with reference to notaries of this parish, and which has heretofore been construed by this court to extend liability in favor of persons other than those who actually employ the notary.

3. A bond for the "faithful performance" of duties voluntarily assumed and done for personal profit involves something more than mere honesty; it involves care, attention, diligence, and reasonable competency.

4. The decision in Weick v. Henne, 41 La. Ann. 1153, 5 South. Rep. 528, is vindicated and approved.

5. A notary undertakes the confection of a testament by public act with full knowledge that its validity depends on the most exact fulfillment of the formalities required by law. He is reminded of this and guarded by the requirement to make "express mention" of these formalities, and that they have been complied with. The formalities are clearly and plainly stated, and the notary has only to follow the language of the law to be safe. If he chooses to deviate from the law, and to substitute language of his own choice to convey the same meaning, he does so at his own risk, and cannot throw resulting loss on innocent persons.

6. The measure of plaintiff's loss is the amount which she would have received on her legacy after payment of succession debts and privileges. Where the succession has been administered, and an account rendered and homologated, such judgment must be accepted as prima facie correct, and throws upon plaintiff the burden of proof in any attack on the items of the account.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FRANCIS A. MONROE, Judge.

Action by Maria Weintz and others against Peter J. Kramer and the sureties on his official bond as notary public to recover for the loss of a legacy, resulting from Kramer's fault in failing to properly execute the will, by reason of which it was annulled. Judgment for plaintiff Weintz. Defendants appeal. Modified.

W. S. Benedict, H. Heidenhain, A. J. Lewis, and E. Warren, for appellants. A. L. Tissot and Henry P. Dart, for appellees.

FENNER, J. The plaintiff was a legatee of the late Frank P. Burger, who bequeathed her two lots of ground, with the improvements, in New Orleans. Burger's will was taken in nuncupative form by public act before Peter J. Kramer, Esq., notary public. The will was subsequently attacked by certain of the heirs, and the same was annulled by this court upon the express ground "that the notary who executed it failed to state that the attesting witnesses were residents of the parish of Orleans,—the place where the same was executed." See 41 La. Ann. 1153, 5 South. Rep. 528. Being ousted of the legacy under this decision, she brings an action against Kramer and his sureties for the value of said legacy, alleging that she has lost the same by reason of the fault, negligence, imprudence, and want of skill and inattention to his business of the said notary. There is no dispute that Kramer was regularly appointed a notary public by the governor; that Thuem and Hassinger were his sureties on his official bond. The condition of this bond is that the notary "shall well and faithfully discharge and perform all the duties incumbent upon him in and for the parish of Orleans, and for the faithful performance of all duties required by law towards all persons who may employ him in his profession as notary in accordance with the act relative to notaries." The petition was met by exceptions of prescription of one year and no cause of action.

The plea of prescription is disposed of by our decision in a like action upon the bond of a notary, where we said: "The prescription of one year is based on the hypothesis that the action is one for damages for a quasi offense. We are not concerned here with the question as to whether defendant's breach of duty was or not technically a quasi offense. The action is on a bond, and therefore ex contractu, to which the prescription invoked is not applicable. Brigham v. Bussey, 26 La. Ann. 676." Fox v. Thibault, 33 La. Ann. 33.

The exception of no cause of action is based upon the idea that the obligations under the bond are governed exclusively by the terms of section 2503 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that the notary's bond shall be "conditioned for the faithful performance of all duties required by the law towards all persons who may employ him in his profession of notary," and therefore that, as plaintiff did not employ this notary, and the petition does not so allege, it sets forth no breach of the bond, and no cause of action thereon. Without deciding that this would be a proper construction of this statute, it is sufficient to say that, with reference to notaries in the parish of Orleans, the broader requirement of Act No. 109 of 1857 is reproduced and held in force by section 2521 of the Revised Statutes, which exacts a bond conditioned "for the faithful performance of his duties." The bond in this case, as shown by our above quotation of its terms, was evidently framed to comply with requirements of both these sections. The effect of the condition prescribed by the act of 1857 and section 2521, Rev. St., has already been construed by this court. The suggestion that it applied only in favor of persons employing the notary was repudiated, and the court said: "The act of 1857 fixes, as the broad and legitimate condition of the notary's bond, that he shall faithfully perform his duties in that capacity." Rochereau v. Jones, 29 La. Ann. 84. There can be no doubt that this bond, given by a notary of New Orleans, is governed by section 2521, Rev. St., which is a special statute, applying exclusively to notaries of this parish, and must prevail over the general provision of section 2503, which applies to the notaries of the state generally. We observe that section 2521 has been again reproduced in the latest act touching notaries in New Orleans, Act No. 42 of 1890. If the contention of defendants were well founded, there would be no liability under the notary's bond for any fault or misconduct, however gross, in that most important of all notarial functions, the confection of testaments. No one could be injured by the nullity of the testament except the legatees, and, as they are not the persons who employed the notary, they would have no recourse.

The further legal defense is interposed that the bond does not guaranty the competency of the notary, but only his fidelity and honesty. Such is not the tenor of the bond, which is conditioned that the notary "shall well and faithfully discharge and perform all the duties incumbent upon him," etc. Our jurisprudence recognizes no such restriction, but has held the notary and his sureties responsible for faults of omission or commission, unattended with any suggestion of fraud or dishonest intent. Brigham v. Bussey, 26 La. Ann. 676; Fox v. Thibault, 33 La. Ann. 33. In a later case we distinctly said. "The stipulations which the bond contains constitute the contract entered into, and must be strictly construed. The object contemplated was to make certain that the notary would discharge well and faithfully all the duties incumbent upon him, and, in case of his failure to do so, and loss was sustained thereby, to hold the surety liable. * * * Before the notary and his surety can be held, it is necessary to inquire whether the act done or not done, committed or omitted, was or was not authorized by law, was or was not incumbent upon him, was or was not required of him, whether he was directed to do it, whether he has failed to discharge the duty, and whether injury has been sustained." Schmitt v. Drouet, 42 La. Ann. 1064, 8 South. Rep. 396. It is true, the state takes certain other precautions to secure the competency of notaries by having them examined, etc., but, not content with these, it adds the obligation of the bond to protect people who are interested in the due and proper performance of their duties. That protection would amount to little if it only guarded against intentional dishonesty and fraud. Although the statute only requires a bond for "faithful performance," such "faithful performance" of duties voluntarily assumed and carried on for personal profit involves more than mere honesty; it involves care, diligence, attention, and reasonable competency.

tary here committed any fault, and they assail the correctness of the decision of this court in Welck v. Henne, 41 La. Ann. 1153, 5 South. Rep. 528, which annulled the will. As defendants were not parties to that suit, they are not technically bound by the judgment. But we see no reason to change the conclusion therein reached. If it was a strict application of the law, it was made in a matter in which, above all others, the law enjoins and requires the utmost strictness. Baudry-La Cantinerie, in his admirable commentary on the French Code, says: "The most common cause for annulling testaments by public act is for want of or defect in the express mention [of fulfillment of the forms required.] It would be wrong to blame the courts for the severity with which they enforce this requirement, because that only manifests the respect for the authority of the law which inspires their decisions. The blame, if any, ought to rest upon the legislator, who has perhaps exceeded the just measure of rigor in regard to these formalities." Baudry-La Cantinerie Droit Civil, No. 561. We rest our decision in the case referred to upon our respect for the authority of the law which requires that express mention should be made that the witnesses were persons "residing in the place where the will was received," meaning thereby residing in the same parish. To say that they were "witnesses residing in the neighborhood" certainly does not fill the requirements, and the reasons are sufficiently given in the opinion. Finally, it is contended that such an error on the part of the notary is not a fault of so grave a character as to subject him to responsibility, being a mere error of judgment which a discreet and diligent man might have committed. We have no desire to exaggerate the fault of the respectable notary who acted in this case; but his error was sufficiently grave to entail the nullity of the will, and to subject the plaintiff here to the loss of her legacy. He knew that the validity of the will depended upon the most exact and scrupulous fulfillment of the formalities prescribed by law. The directions of the law are precise and unambiguous. He had only to use the terms of the law itself to be absolutely safe. If he chose to substitute other terms, he did so of his own motion, and at his own risk, and cannot throw the resulting loss on innocent persons, who had the right to rely upon his proper performance of the duties incumbent on him. The words of the statute are not sacramental; but the words used must be such as expressly declare fulfillment of the formalities. "Implication is not to be resorted to, unless, at least, it be an implication necessarily involved in the meaning of the express words used." Succession of Vidal, 44 La. Ann. ——, 10 South. Rep. 414. It is important that notaries should be impressed with the gravity of their responsibility when they undertake the confection of testaments, which involve the devolution of entire estates, and the execution of the final wishes of the de cujus with regard to those who come after him. They know that their validity depends on the strictest compliance with the law, and they should follow the plain letter of the law, or assume the responsibility of any deviation. The very object of the requirement of "express mention" is to guard them against neglect or forgetfulness, and to fix their responsibility. Under the French law, from which our system is derived, we are referred to many authorities unequivocally upholding the responsibility of notaries for such errors. 39 Dalloz, Repertoire, Nos. 302, 307, 339, 424, et seq.; 8 Dalloz, Repertoire, pars. 1, 26, 29; where the authorities and decisions are referred to. We conclude, therefore, that the judge a quo did not err in holding defendants responsible for the damage suffered by plaintiff.

The measure of this loss is the amount which plaintiff would have received had the will been valid. It appears that the succession of Burger (the de cujus) was duly administered. It consisted exclusively of real estate bequeathed to plaintiff and to another legatee, which was sold under order of court, and realized (with some rentals) the sum of $2,505. The administrator filed an account showing disbursements on account of taxes, privileges, costs, etc., and leaving a net balance of $939.55. Among the liabilities on the account allowed by the court was an item of $500, paid to the widow "as per compromise." The judge a quo thought the defendants carried the burden of proof to show the correctness of this payment. We consider it fairly presumable that the court allowed the item as due to the widow, either in payment of a debt due or of her privilege as widow in necessitous circumstances, in either of which cases the claim would prime the legacies. The defendants are entitled to the benefit of the presumption that this judgment of the court was correct, and, if plaintiff desired to attack it, the burden of proof was on her. We must, on this ground, amend the judgment. It is therefore adjudged and decreed that the judgment appealed from be amended by reducing the amount thereof from $824.99 to $626.36, and, as thus amended, the same is now affirmed; appellee to pay costs of appeal.

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Jan. 4, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

ACCOUNTING BY MANDATORY—STALE CLAIM—EVIDENCE—PRESUMPTIONS.

1. A mandatary, who has acted as such continuously for a long period of years, without being called upon for an account, and who then renders an account, showing a balance in his favor, does not subject his demand to a charge of staleness because the credits giving rise to the balance arose in the first years of the mandate.

2. Presumptions of fact are not, like presumptions of law, governed by fixed rules. They are mere inferences, drawn by the judicial mind from the facts and circumstances of each particular case, dependent on their own natural efficacy in generating belief or conviction. Slight variations in the facts of any particular case alter the force of such presumptions, and all the facts must be considered together in determining their application.

3. The facts of this case are anomalous and peculiar, and, considering them all together, the presumptions invoked do not suffice to destroy the positive evidence to the contrary, or to justify a reversal of the judgment appealed from; which, however, is amended by reduction of amount.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Judge.

Application of the succession of Frank Borge for a rule on William C. Faust to show cause why he should not pay over certain money. Judgment for Faust. Plaintiff in the rule appeals. Modified.

F. Michinard and J. P. Blair, for appellant. Harry H. Hall, for appellee.

FENNER, J. The controversy in this case arises out of the following facts: William C. Faust was the son-in-law of the decedent, Frank Borge. In 1872 and 1874 Borge became the purchaser of a certain business known as the "New Orleans Transfer Company," and of the property engaged therein, consisting of coaches, wagons, horses, harness, office furniture, fixtures, etc. The purchases, however, were made by Borge through and in the name of William C. Faust, who alone appears as actor in the transaction, who paid the cash portion of the price, and who gave his individual notes for the deferred payments, all of which appears from the notarial acts of sale extant on the record. Borge was not known in the transaction, and was obviously solicitous of concealing his interest therein. His reason, as indicated by the testimony, was the embarrassed condition of his personal financial affairs. He took no counter-letter. The business was conducted entirely in the name and for the apparent account of Faust. Regular books were kept of the transfer business, which was a very lucrative one. At the end of each month these books were balanced, the net earnings were ascertained, and the amount thereof was paid over to Faust, who passed them to his individual credit in bank. These funds were disbursed by Faust either to Borge personally, or by his orders, or for his account. From 1875 to 1885 Faust worked for a salary. After the 1st of January, 1885, Borge allowed him an interest of one-fourth the net earnings. As Faust figured in the transfer business as sole owner, and received the whole earnings, of course the account of his salary and interest makes no appearance on the books of the transfer; and, as Borge did not appear in the business at all, the books are equally silent as to him. All the accounts of Faust's salary and interest, as well as of all payments between him and Borge, are outside of the books of the transfer, and are involved in the settlement of the account between the two touching the funds realized as net profits of the business, and paid over to Faust as apparent owner. Faust drew on account of the salary and share of profits due him as he saw fit, and he made payments to Borge or for his account, as directed. Borge forbade him to keep any regular accounts of the dealings between them, assigning as a reason that their production might show his ownership of the business, which he desired to conceal. Therefore Faust's accounts were kept solely in the shape of checks and private memoranda. This account remained entirely open and unsettled during the whole life-time of Borge, who died in March, 1889. It does not appear that Borge at any time ever demanded any account or settlement whatever. We have rarely encountered an instance of such unlimited confidence reposed by one person in another. Borge placed the legal title to his business and property in the name of Faust without a counter-letter. He placed the large revenues of the business in the possession and absolute control of Faust, intrusting him with their custody and disbursement, never exacting an account from him, and even forbidding him from keeping any regular books of the account. As late as March, 1888, Borge placed in the name of Faust two pieces of real estate which he owned and used in the transfer business, without requiring a counter-letter. In the mean time Borge's daughter, the wife of Faust, had died; and in September, 1888, Faust was about to contract a second marriage. At that time, and in view of that fact, two counter-letters were executed on September 26, 1888,—one acknowledging Borge's ownership of the real estate just referred to, and the other acknowledging his ownership of the transfer business and property. The last was executed in duplicate, and one was left in the possession of Borge and the other in that of Faust. Even after this Borge returned to Faust his copy, and told him to destroy it; but Faust, after consulting with Borge's confidential attorney, on his advice, determined not to destroy it.

In the latter part of 1888 Borge's state of health portended dissolution, and rumors reached Faust's ears that the widow and heirs would require of him a strict accounting. Then for the first time Faust undertook the task of compiling from his check-books and memoranda a statement of his receipts and expenditures of moneys for account of Borge during the long period of time covered by their peculiar relations. This statement was not concluded until shortly after the death of Borge. The statement is contained in a book, and includes many separate accounts. We find in it an itemized statement of the monthly profits of the transfer business, which were passed to his individual credit, and which, in absence of any suggestion to the contrary, we assume is correct, and corresponds with the transfer books. We find a long itemized statement of all moneys paid to or for the personal account of Frank Borge, covering many pages, and aggregating a sum of $87,257; also a like itemized statement of Faust's personal account, showing all moneys drawn by him against his salary and interest in profits from the beginning to the end of his employment, and crediting him with salary for the first 10 years at the rate of $1,500 per annum, and with interest of one-fourth of the profits after 1884. The account is closed by a balance struck in his favor of $5,000 as due to him at the date of Borge's death. The succession of Borge was opened, and the above book containing Faust's account and showing the balance due was handed to the attorney of the widow and heirs shortly after Borge's death. An arrangement was effected between Faust and the widow and heirs by which the transfer business was continued for account of the widow and heirs, with Faust as manager at a salary of $250 per month. In that capacity he not only conducted the new business in which he was employed only at a salary, but liquidated the old in which he had an interest of one-fourth in the earnings. At the instance of the administering tutor of minor heirs an expert was employed to investigate the books of the transfer business. The expert swears that he was expressly charged to examine into the account of Faust, but this is denied. At all events, he received not only the transfer books, but also the book containing Faust's statement of the account between himself and Borge, and seems to have acted under the belief that it was his duty to examine and report upon the whole. Accordingly he formulated and presented to the attorney of the widow and heirs a report which, besides other matters, included and approved Faust's account, and the balance due him. The widow and heirs claimed that in this respect the expert exceeded his authority, and the report was never filed. When offered in evidence in this case it was objected to, and excluded by the court, to which ruling a bill of exceptions was reserved, and the report is brought up as part thereof. We think it should have been admitted to prove rem ipsam that such a report was made; but the matter is of trifling consequence, as the testimony of the expert attesting that fact is in the record. After this examination and report by an expert selected by the widow and heirs, Faust considered that he had the right to pay himself out of the collections made under his management of the transfer business. He consulted his attorney, who advised him that, if the money was due to him, he had the right to pay himself, but not to act without informing opposite counsel. He then mentioned the subject to the attorney of the widow and heirs, who seems to have stated generally that, if the money was due to him, it should be paid. Faust drew out the money. This the widow and heirs strenuously objected to. Upon notice of this objection, Faust's counsel met the attorney of the widow and heirs, and an agreement was reached by which Faust made a special deposit of the $5,000 in bank, to be held subject to the joint order of the two attorneys. Thereupon the administering tutor took a rule upon Faust to show cause why the said fund should not be forthwith paid over to the succession of Borge, on two grounds, viz.: (1) That, even if the debt claimed by Faust were due, it formed no justification in law for the retention of the funds which had been collected by him in a fiduciary capacity, and which he was bound to pay over to the succession. (2) That the debt claimed was not due. No objection was made to the form of proceeding, and Faust filed an answer, squarely joining issue on both grounds of the rule.

1. It is evident there were two distinct businesses requiring separate settlements, viz.: (1) The business of the transfer company down to the death of Borge, in which Faust had an interest of one-fourth in the profits; (2) the business after the death, which, by agreement, was conducted for the exclusive benefit of the widow and heirs, Faust managing the same only as a salaried employe. We have critically examined the agreement between Faust and the widow and heirs, and it certainly seems to us to relate exclusively to the future business. Whether Faust was a technical partner or not in the old business, he was its manager, entitled to one-fourth of the profits, and had the right to have it liquidated in order that his interest might be ascertained and settled. He charged himself with its liquidation, collected its credits, and paid its debts, with the full knowledge and approval of the widow and heirs; and, conceding the debt claimed by him to be due, we think he had the same right to pay it from the collections of that business as to pay any other debt. This matter, however, is of slight consequence. The succession is abundantly solvent; the fund in controversy is intact and secure; the question of debt vel non is fairly at issue, and has been the subject of exhaustive evidence; and it is in the interest of all that it should be now disposed of.

2. The facts of this case, as we have detailed them, are anomalous and peculiar. Faust cannot be charged with laches in suffering the accounts between him and Borge to remain unsettled down to the day of the latter's death. Borge never demanded any account, and the evidence shows that he never desired one, and even objected to such an account being kept. The suggestion that he waited until Borge's death, and then rendered an account, which nobody but Borge could contradict, thus loses all force. If Borge chose that matters should be left in this shape, it does not lie in the mouths of his widow and heirs to complain or claim any advantage from it. If Borge's confidence in Faust was such that he intrusted him with uncontrolled powers, dispensed with all checks and safeguards, exacted no accounting, and left him at the end to make up his accounts according to his own conscience, the widow and heirs must abide by the result, unless they can prove unfaithfulness or fraud. Faust has rendered an elaborate and itemized statement of his dealings, presenting a full statement of all sums received by him, and how they were disbursed. These accounts, together with the books of the transfer company and Faust's check-books, etc., have been in the possession or under the control of adverse parties, and they have had ample opportunity to examine and investigate them. In all the evidence in the case we do not discover a suggestion that Faust ever received a dollar more than is shown in his statement, or that the disbursements reported by him do not cover the whole amount received. Neither do we discover any question made as to the correctness of any single item of the disbursements reported. Indeed, the only item in the whole of Faust's account upon which any attack is made is the entry crediting himself with $15,000 as the amount of his salary during the first 10 years of his agency. Now, it is evident that in making up his individual account covering the whole period of his employment, and purporting to charge himself with all that he received for himself, and crediting himself with all that was due to him, an entry of the amount due for his salary during the first 10 years was a necessary and proper entry. The only question that could possibly arise is whether the amount so entered is the true and correct amount. The evidence, not only of Faust himself, but of several other disinterested witnesses who learned the fact from Borge, establishes incontestably that his salary was $1,500 per annum, and this is corroborated by every fact in the case. The correctness of this entry being thus fixed, the resulting balance in his favor cannot be disputed, unless other entries in the account are falsified. This has not been done by any evidence, but plaintiffs invoke certain legal presumptions to throw discredit on the account. It appears that the balance claimed as due results entirely from Faust's having drawn less than his salary during the first 10 years of his employment. From this fact the charge is made that the claim is a stale demand. Under the facts of this case, such a charge has no basis. The whole fund out of which Faust was entitled to be paid was in his own hands. What he did not draw he held in his own name, and under his own control. It passed into the general account between him and Borge, which he was not required to render until it was demanded; and in now rendering his account his assertion of his claim, as a resulting balance of the whole, is timely, and free from any taint of staleness. The same considerations destroy the plea of prescription. Much stress is laid upon the improbability that Faust should have drawn so small a part of his salary during these years. We admit that, prima facie, it is improbable; but it is explained, and, while the explanation is not absolutely satisfactory, it is plausible, and leaves the presumption too weak to support judicial action.

The ingenious counsel for plaintiffs refer to other circumstances giving rise to adverse presumptions and discrediting Faust's claim. We have considered them very carefully, and, while not unimpressed, we can find in them nothing of sufficient strength to justify us in reversing the conclusions of the district judge, and in stamping as a thief and a cheat a man whose character is not otherwise impeached, who enjoyed the unlimited confidence of Borge, and who is further accredited by the trust which the parties assailing him have continued to repose in him. In the language of Mr. Greenleaf, presumptions of this kind "are, in truth, but mere arguments, of which the major premise is not a rule of law. They belong equally to each and every subject-matter; and are to be judged by the common and received tests of the truth of propositions and the validity of arguments. They depend upon their own natural force and efficacy in generating belief or conviction in the mind, as derived from those connections which are shown by experience, irrespective of any legal relations. They differ from presumptions of law in this essential respect: that, while those are reduced to fixed rules and constitute a branch of the particular system of jurisprudence to which they belong, these merely natural presumptions are derived wholly and directly from the circumstances of the particular case, by means of the common experience of mankind, without the aid or control of any rules of law whatever." 1 Greenl. Ev. § 44; Best, Ev. § 317 et seq. Cases do unquestionably arise in which such presumptions control the mind with such power of conviction as to undermine and destroy the effect of positive evidence to the contrary. Instances are presented in the cases quoted by appellants: Quock Ting v. U. S., 140 U. S. 420, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 733, 851; Wood v. Egan, 39 La. Ann. 684, 2 South. Rep. 191; Cutler v. Collins, 37 La. Ann. 95. Slight variations in the facts of any particular case alter the force of such presumptions, and inflexible rules cannot be prescribed for their application. Considering all the facts of this peculiar case together, we find no sufficient reason to disturb the conclusion reached by the district judge except in one respect. Faust's own testimony leaves us unsatisfied as to whether his salary of $125 per month began on the 1st of January or 1st of July, 1875. Up to the 1st of July, 1875, he was engaged in the warehouse business on his own account, and only kept the books of the transfer company. He himself says: "I continued the warehouse business for my own account until July, 1875. From January, 1875, to July, 1875, I kept the transfer company's books. Then, as Borge said it did not look well for me to be in the warehouse business, as I had the transfer business in my name, I went to work in the transfer business for $125 a month." He was doubtless entitled to something for prior services, but his salary of $125 a month is only shown to have begun in July. A reduction of $500 in the amount allowed him will do justice. It is therefore adjudged and decreed that the judgment appealed from be amended by reducing the amount allowed in favor of Faust from $5,000 to $4,500, and by ordering the difference to be paid over to plaintiffs in rule; and that, as thus amended, the judgment be now affirmed, appellees to pay costs of appeal.

SAYRE et al. v. WESCOTT.

SALE OF LAND BY TRUSTEE—ALLOWANCE OF DEBT AGAINST CESTUI QUE TRUST IN PAYMENT—FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION—VENDOR'S LIEN.

Where vendees buy land from a trustee, and, according to the contract, to which the cestui que trust is a party, pay merely half the stipulated price by allowing a credit on a supposed debt against the cestui que trust, and it subsequently turns out that the debt does not exist, a bill by the administrator of the cestui que trust to enforce a vendor's lien for purchase money to the amount of the supposed debt is without equity, since it seeks to enforce a money payment, which was never agreed to.

Appeal from chancery court, Montgomery county; JOHN A. FOSTER, Chancellor.

Action to enforce a vendor's lien, by W. D. Wescott, administrator, against H. A. Sayre and another. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

Tompkins & Troy and Stringfellow & Le Grand, for appellants. W. A. Gunter, for appellee.

WALKER, J. Moses Bros. purchased certain real estate in the city of Montgomery at the price of $10,000, upon the agreement and understanding that $3,950 of the stipulated price should be paid by a credit of that amount upon an indebtedness then supposed to exist in their favor against Lucy B. Noble, who was interested as a cestui que trust in the property sold, and who was a party to the agreement for the partial payment of the purchase price by the credit on the claim against her. This contract of purchase was carried out according to its terms. Moses Bros. received a deed to the property on allowing the credit as agreed, and paying the remainder of the price in money. Afterwards it turned out that the supposed indebtedness upon which the credit was allowed did not really exist. Lucy B. Noble having died, the bill in this case was filed by the administrator de bonis non of her estate to enforce a lien upon the property for $3,950 and interest, as a balance of the purchase money still due and unpaid. The claim is that the allowance of a credit on a debt which did not exist was no payment at all, and that the result is that the amount of the credit is still due on the purchase, and is secured by a vendor's lien on the property. The recognition of this claim would involve the enforcement of a contract which the averments of the bill show was never made. The stipulation as to the mode in which $3,950 of the purchase price was to be satisfied was a material feature of the contract of purchase. The bill does not show that Moses Bros. agreed to pay $10,000 in money for the property. They only agreed to pay in money the difference between that sum and the amount of the stipulated credit. It may very well be that the sale could not have been made except upon the condition of allowing the purchasers to use their claim in paying part of the agreed price. The opportunity of realizing on the claim may have been the principal inducement which influenced them to make the trade. The fact that, as a result of a mistake of the parties, a part of the consideration for the sale and conveyance turned out to be no consideration at all, cannot be allowed to have the effect of binding the parties to a contract different from the one they entered into. There cannot be a lien for purchase money which was never due or payable under the contract of purchase. The implied lien of a vendor of real estate is an incident of a debt for unpaid purchase money. Though the lien survives, and may be enforced after an action on the debt is barred, yet the existence of the lien presupposes a debt to be secured thereby. 2 Warv. Vend. 706. Where the sale is valid, though the vendee is not sui juris, so as to be personally bound for the payment of the purchase money, there is a lien in favor of the vendor, but it is only to secure the payment of the purchase money according to the terms of the sale. McDonald v. Land Co., 78 Ala. 382. In this case the lien is sought to be enforced for a debt not created by the terms of the contract of sale, as the purchasers did not agree to pay in money the amount for which a lien is claimed. There has been no failure on their part to comply with the contract as it was made. The court cannot change the contract of the parties so as to make all of the purchase price payable in money. The non-existence of the supposed debt upon which the credit was allowed may have conferred upon the seller the right to demand a rescission of the contract of sale upon offering to make restitution of what the purchaser had actually paid. Whatever rights Lucy B. Noble may have had against Moses Bros. as the result of other dealings between them, she was not entitled to a lien for purchase money which was never agreed to be paid for the land. The fifth and sixth grounds of demurrer interposed by the appellants pointed out the fatal defect in the claim to a lien. The bill was without equity, and should have been dismissed A decree to that effect will be rendered in this court Reversed and rendered.

ARBITRATION—POWER OF COURT—BUILDING CONTRACT—ARCHITECT'S CERTIFICATE—IMPLIED CONTRACT—ASSUMPSIT.

1. Under Code, § 3221, providing for submission to arbitration and for a continuance, but not "beyond one term, unless for good cause shown," it is within the discretion of the court, more than two years after submission to arbitration, to disregard the order of reference and try the case.

2. Where a building contract provides that no extra work shall be paid for, unless a separate estimate in writing shall have been submitted prior thereto, the contractors can recover for extra work furnished under a promise by the owner to pay therefor.

3. Where a contract for a building is not entirely performed, but the owner moves in before completion, and remains in possession after it is finished, he is liable for the labor and materials on an implied contract.

4. Where plaintiffs had contracted to build a house for defendants, payments to be made only on architects' certificates, and sues on the common counts, on an implied contract to pay for the labor and materials, they can recover, although they have not obtained the architects' certificates.

5. Where the evidence is not set out in full in the record, it will be presumed that there was evidence to support the instructions.

Appeal from city court of Anniston; THOMAS R. MATTHEWS, Special Judge.

This was an action brought by Badders & Britt against W. A. Davis and others to recover for the building of a residence for the defendants under a contract. Plaintiffs' evidence was that they had substantially complied with the contract, and that they had done extra work at the instance of the defendants, for which, after the execution of said contract and before said work was done, the defendant W. A. Davis agreed to pay plaintiffs; that the work on said house was not completed until about January 21, 1888; that defendant, with plaintiffs' permission, had moved into the house in December, 1887, when only two rooms were finished; that the defendant still occupies said house as a residence. Plaintiffs testified that they were entitled to the certificate of the architects, as provided in said contract, and that said certificate was wrongfully withheld by said architects; that after said written contract was entered into there was a subsequent parol contract between the plaintiffs and defendants by which the plans were altered, and that on account of said alteration extra work had to be done on said house, for the doing of which it would take more time to complete said house than was provided for in the written contract; and that the plans and specifications were so altered and extra work done thereunder. Defendants testified plaintiffs had not complied with the contract; that much of the work was poorly done; that inferior material was used; and that plaintiffs had departed from the plans without authority, and had abandoned the work before it was completed, and had never obtained the certificate of the architects. The defendant W. A. Davis denied that he had ever agreed to pay for extra work. The court of its own motion, among other things, charged the jury as follows: "If the plaintiffs did not comply with the original contract sued on in this case, they are not entitled to recover upon it for the work done under it, unless you find from the evidence that a departure from the original plan and specifications was agreed on between the parties before it was made, and the work as done was performed in lieu of that originally contemplated; but it does not necessarily follow that plaintiffs in this action would not be entitled to recover for such work: If plaintiffs did the amount of work they have agreed to do under the contract, and it was of value to and accepted by defendants, although it may not have been done in strict compliance with the original plan and specifications, you may nevertheless, under the principles I have submitted to you, find that plaintiffs are entitled to recover under the common counts of the complaint whatever the evidence shows that the work which was done under the contract is reasonably worth, or, rather, the contract price for the work, less the difference in value of the work as done and what it would have been worth had it been done in compliance with the contract; but in no event would they be entitled to recover more than the contract price, although the work so done may be of greater value than was to be paid for it under the contract. To allow plaintiffs to recover what the work was reasonably worth, regardless of the contract price for the work they were to do, might not be any punishment to them for a violation of the contract, if you should find from the evidence that they violated it." The court refused the following charges of defendants: (1) "If the jury believe from the evidence that the contract between plaintiffs and defendant was for the erection of a building upon the land of defendant, and that performance of the terms of the contract was to precede payment, and was the condition thereof, and that plaintiffs have substantially failed on their part to perform the contract, then plaintiffs cannot recover in this action, notwithstanding defendant has chosen to occupy and enjoy the building." (2) "That, if the jury believe from the evidence that the final payment of the contract price of the building depended upon the plaintiffs obtaining the architects' certificate that the work and building was completed according to the contract, then plaintiffs cannot recover in this action, unless they show such certificate, or such facts are shown by the evidence as to convince the jury that such certificate is obstinately, unreasonably withheld." (3) "That if the jury believe from the evidence that said building is not completed according to the contract, in a workman-like manner, and that the last payment of seven hundred dollars was only to be made on the certificate of the architects, and such certificate is withheld because of the failure to complete the building in a workman-like manner, and according to the contract, then said certificate is not obstinately, unreasonably, or unjustly withheld, and without such certificate plaintiffs cannot recover as to the last payment of seven hundred dollars." (4) "All persons entering into contracts are bound by the terms of the contract, and such contract is the law of the particular case; and if the plaintiffs in this case agreed to do the work strictly in accordance with the plans and specifications in said contract, then they are bound to comply with the requirements of such plans and specifications strictly; and unless the jury is satisfied that said plaintiffs have complied, then they cannot recover without showing to the satisfaction of the jury that such failure to comply on plaintiffs' part has been expressly or impliedly waived by the defendant." (5) "The terms of all contracts, unless waived, must be strictly complied with before any party thereto can have a right of action thereon; and the contract in this case stipulating that 'no new work of any description done on the premises, or any work of any kind whatsoever, shall be considered extra, unless a separate estimate in writing for the same before its commencement shall have been submitted by the contractors to the proprietor, and his signature obtained thereto,' then no charge for extra work under the contract in this case can be made or judgment recovered therefor unless said stipulation in said contract has been complied with by the contractor, or the same has been expressly waived or impliedly by the proprietor, the defendant in this cause." (6) "The mere fact that part performance of the contract has been beneficial to the defendant is not enough to render the party benefited liable to pay for the advantage. It must appear from the evidence that he has taken the benefit under circumstances sufficient to raise an implied promise to pay for the work done, notwithstanding the non-performance of the special contract. Therefore in a case of building on land, under a contract which the builders fail to complete, or which they complete in a manner not conforming to the contract, so that the owner cannot be charged with the contract price, the mere fact of the building remaining on the land, and the owner moving into and taking possession of it, and enjoying the fruits of the labor, is not such an acceptance as will alone imply a promise to pay for it, and, without more, plaintiffs cannot recover on the common counts in the complaint in this action." (7) "If the jury believe from the evidence that the last payment of seven hundred dollars depended upon the certificate of Chisholm & Green, the architects, that the work was completed in accordance with the drawings, plans, and specifications, and that such certificate has not been obtained, nor unjustly, unreasonably, nor collusively withheld; and they further find that defendant has paid on said contract twenty-six hundred dollars on the contract price of three thousand dollars; and they further find that plaintiffs have done extra work for which defendant is bound to pay under the stipulations of the contract,—then the defendant is entitled to offset such amount for extra work with the three hundred dollars overpaid to such contractors under said contract." (8) "The plaintiffs are not entitled to recover on the common counts in this case unless the jury believe, from all the evidence, that defendant accepted the work, and went into possession and occupied and used the same, under such circumstances as will amount to an express or implied waiver of the failure upon the part of plaintiffs to perform said contract, and the mere fact of moving in and occupying the house alone is not sufficient to amount to an express or implied waiver." (12) "If the evidence shows that the plaintiff asked no further time to do extra work, defendant is entitled to reasonable damages for delay after November 1st, the time of completion, as provided in contract." (14) "The burden of proof is on the plaintiffs, Badders & Britt, to show performance of their contract, or a waiver by the defendant Davis in this case." (16) "The use of a building which has been partially erected, though for the purpose for which it was intended, is not an acceptance of the work, or any part thereof; the duty to pass upon the work does not arise until its completion." (18) "A special contract for work must prevail unless a departure from it has been so general as to render it impossible to connect the contract with the work." (19) "When a building is in process of construction under a special contract, and additions and alterations are to be made, the original contract is held to exist and be binding as far as it can be followed." Judgment for plaintiffs; and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Blackwell & Keith and Knox & Bowie, for appellants. Brothers, Willett & Willett, for appellees.

CLOPTON, J. On August 24, 1888, the circuit court, in which the suit was originally instituted, made the following entry: "Came the parties by attorneys, and by agreement this cause is submitted to the arbitration of M. J. Miller and J. B. Goodwin, and they to call in a third man, whose award, when made according to law, to be made the judgment of this court in this case." When the case was called for trial in the city court, to which it had been transferred under the statute, at the January term, 1891, defendants moved to refer it to the arbitrators under the order of the circuit court. The motion was overruled, and the city court proceeded to try and determine the cause. Section 3221 of the Code declares: "It is the duty of all courts to encourage the settlement of controversies pending before them by a reference thereof to arbitrators, chosen by the parties or their attorneys; and, on motion of the parties, must make such order, and continue the cause for award; but such continuance must not extend beyond one term, unless for good cause shown or by consent." While it is made the duty of the court, in pursuance of the legislative policy declared in the statute, to make an order of reference on motion of the parties, such order does not, under the statute, oust the court of jurisdiction of the case. It remains pending in court, subject to be called at each succeeding term for trial. The suspension for award is not indefinite. The statute places a limitation upon the discretion of the court as to continuing the cause,—the continuance must not extend beyond one term, unless good cause be shown or the parties consent. So far as the present record discloses, and we can look no further, no action was taken in execution of the order of reference either by the arbitrators or by the parties, and no cause shown when the case was called for trial why it should longer be continued for award. Several terms having elapsed since the order of reference, and no award made, nor cause shown for a further continuance, it became the duty of the court, unless the parties consented to a further continuance, to disregard the order of reference, and proceed with the trial of the case. Iron Co. v. Cobb, 55 Ala. 636. The complaint contains several counts,—one on a special contract for the erection of a dwelling-house, a common count for materials furnished and work and labor done, and a count for extra materials and extra work. The special contract contains a provision that "no new work of any description done on the premises, or any work of any kind whatsoever, shall be considered as extra, unless a separate estimate in writing for the same, before its commencement, shall have been submitted by the contractors to the proprietor, and his signature obtained thereto." On the former appeal (88 Ala. 367, 6 South. Rep. 834) this clause of the contract was construed. It was then held that if no estimate in writing for the extra materials and work was submitted to defendant and his signature thereto obtained, and no promise to pay for the same, no recovery could be had therefor; but if during the progress of the work alterations in the plan were made by mutual assent, and defendant promised to pay for the extra work required by the alterations, plaintiffs, if such work was worth more, considering materials and workmanship, than the work for which it was substituted, are entitled to recover the difference, although no written estimate was submitted and signed. The count contains an averment that, while the building was in course of erection, defendant promised to pay for the extra work and materials, and there is evidence tending to show such promise. Charge 5, requested by defendants, ignores the effect of this evidence, and excludes it from the consideration of the jury. The liability of defendants for the extra work and materials does not rest upon a waiver of the special condition of the contract, but upon a subsequent and distinct agreement to alter or modify the contract, and to pay the increased costs of such alteration or modification. The jury would have understood from the charge that they could not allow for the extra work and materials, unless defendants expressly or impliedly waived the condition, though they may have verbally promised to pay for the same. The charge is misleading.

The part of the general charge excepted to, and several of the charges asked by defendants, relate to the liability of the owner of land for materials furnished and work done in the erection of a building thereon under a special contract, when the contractor has failed to perform it. This has been regarded as a vexed question, growing out of the fact that the building may add to the value of the land, and be of benefit to the owner, in connection with the practical difficulty of enforcing the right of rejection. Whatever contrariety of judicial views may exist, the rule in such cases has been long and well settled in this state. In Thomas v. Ellis, 4 Ala. 108, the rule is thus stated: "Indeed, nothing is more common than to permit a recovery upon an implied contract to pay the value of the labor, although it may not have amounted to a performance of the special contract; and this is always the rule when the defendant has accepted the work, or entered into possession and use of the house actually erected." The same doctrine has been reasserted in the subsequent cases of Merriwether v. Taylor, 15 Ala. 735; English v. Wilson, 34 Ala. 201; Bell v. Teague, 85 Ala. 211, 3 South. Rep. 861. The doctrine practically rests upon the acceptance of the building by the owner of the land, not as finished according to the contract, but in its uncompleted condition, and that in such condition it is of benefit to him. The acceptance need not be express. When there is no gross or fraudulent violation or abandonment of the contract, it may be inferred from the use and enjoyment of the property by the owner of the land upon which value has been conferred by the erection of the building. The charges relating to this matter asked by defendants are defective in this: they assert the proposition that plaintiffs cannot recover, even under the common counts, without showing a strict performance of the contract, or that an acceptance cannot be inferred from merely moving into, taking possession, and using and enjoying the house. It may be that moving into the house before its completion, by consent of plaintiffs, would not, of itself, amount to an acceptance; but it is also shown that defendants remained in possession after the completion of the house, and have used and enjoyed it up to the time of trial. In such case, liability does not rest on strict performance of the provisions of the contract on the part of plaintiffs, or a waiver thereof by defendants; but upon an implied agreement, raised by the law, to pay for labor done and materials furnished, which were of value and benefit, and accepted by them. On these principles, charges 1, 4, 6, 8, 14, and 16 asked by defendants were properly refused. They predicate plaintiffs' right to recover under any count of the complaint on performance of the special contract, or a waiver of performance by defendants, or assume, as matter of law, that moving into the house, taking possession and enjoying the benefit, is not an acceptance. Besides, charge 8 is argumentative. The question of acceptance was properly submitted to the jury. No question is raised as to the measure of recovery in such cases.

By the special contract, defendants agreed to pay for the erection of the house in installments as the work progressed, the fourth and last payment of $700 to be made when the building was completed and the drawings and specifications returned to the architects. The contract contains the provision "that, in case of the final payment, a certificate shall be obtained from and signed by Chisholm & Green, architects, to the effect that the work is done in strict accordance with drawings and specifications, and that they consider the payment as properly due; said certificate, however, in no way lessening the total and final responsibility of the contractor. Neither shall it exempt the contractor from liability to replace work, if it be afterwards discovered to have been done ill, or not according to the drawings or specifications, either in execution or materials."

The fourth count declares specially on the contract, setting it out in hæc verba. To this count a demurrer was interposed, assigning as the ground of objection that it did not specifically aver that the certificate of the architects was obtained. It avers that plaintiffs "have complied with all the provisions of the contract on their part, and erected said building according to said contract." The count is substantially in the form of a complaint "on a dependent covenant or agreement," as prescribed by the Code. Under the statutory form, a mere statement of the contract, with a general averment that plaintiffs had complied with all its provisions on their part, and that defendants have failed to comply with specific provisions, is sufficient. These forms have the force of a statute. Insurance Co. v. Bledsoe, 52 Ala. 538.

ducing the certificate of the architects was also raised by charges 2 and 3 asked by defendants. Counsel for appellants have called our attention to cases decided by the New York court of appeals, in which it was held, under contracts containing similar provisions, that when the parties have made the production of the certificate of the architect, to the effect that the work was completely finished, a condition precedent to final payment, the plaintiff is bound to procure the certificate, if not impracticable to get it without fault on his part; and, if he does get it, the defendant is bound to pay, unless he can show that it was obtained by fraud or mistake. Smith v. Brady, 17 N. Y. 173; Wyckoff v. Meyers, 44 N. Y. 143; Wangler v. Smith, 90 N. Y. 38. Parties competent may fix the terms of their contract as they deem proper, and, in the absence of fraud or mistake, the court is not justified in displacing or altering them, though regarded imprudent or unwise. But whether, under the provisions of the contract, the obtainment of the architects' certificate is a condition precedent to final payment, we deem it unnecessary to decide. If conceded that it is requisite to entitle plaintiffs to recover the final payment under the counts declaring on the special contract, if the contract has not been performed, and defendants have accepted the house, the production of the certificate is not essential to recovery under the common counts on an implied contract to pay the value of the labor done and materials furnished. Charge 2 is too broad, and was properly refused, for the reason that it predicates the production of such certificate, or proof of facts showing that it was obstinately or unreasonably withheld, as an element of plaintiffs' right to recover "in this action;" that is, under both the common and special counts. And charge 3 is obnoxious to the objection that it submits to the jury the construction of the written contract, which it is the province and duty of the court to construe. Bernstein v. Humes, 60 Ala. 582; Claghorn v. Lingo, 62 Ala. 230. Charges 18 and 19 were properly refused, not only because argumentative in their nature, but also on the principle that when the bill of exceptions does not set out all the evidence, if the legal propositions asserted by the charges might be met and avoided by proof of facts which would render the charges erroneous, this court will presume that such other facts were proved. Railway Co. v. Kolb, 73 Ala. 396; McLemore v. Nicholls, 87 Ala. 662. The same observation applies to charge 12, which is to the effect that, if plaintiffs asked no further time to do extra work, defendants are entitled to reasonable damages for delay in finishing the building after the time of completion provided in the contract. If to do the extra work directed by defendants, and for which they promised to pay, necessarily required longer time to complete the building than allowed by the contract, a reasonable extension of the time will be implied, and defendants are not entitled to damages for the delay, under such circumstances. Affirmed.

ALLBRITTON v. STATE.

CAFFEY v. SAME.

CRIMINAL LAW—ALIBI.

1. In a criminal case, where the defense is an alibi, it is error to charge that an unsuccessful attempt to prove an alibi is always a circumstance of "great weight" against the prisoner, since there is no distinction between the consequent weight of an unsuccessful attempt to establish an alibi and of an unsuccessful attempt to prove any other material fact in defense.

2. It is also error to charge that the evidence as to the alibi must account for so much of the time of the transaction as would render it "impossible" for defendant to have committed the offense, since such an instruction violates the rule that defendant is entitled to an acquittal if the whole evidence generates a reasonable doubt as to his guilt.

Appeal from city court of Montgomery; T. M. ARRINGTON, Judge.

John Allbritton and Willis Caffey were separately indicted and tried for wantonly and maliciously throwing a stone or rock into a passenger-car of a railroad train. The state's evidence tended to show that the defendants were guilty as charged in the indictment. The defendants "introduced evidence to show an alibi." Both defendants were convicted, and now appeal; both cases being submitted together. Reversed.

Sayre & Pearson, for appellants. Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

CLOPTON, J. At the instance of the prosecution the court gave, in each of these cases, the following charge: "An unsuccessful attempt to prove an alibi is always a circumstance of great weight against the prisoner." Speaking in reference to this statement of the principle, in Burrill, Circ. Ev. 519, as quoted from Wills, and from which the charge is copied, it is said in Porter v. State, 55 Ala. 95: "We are inclined to think Mr. Burrill states the principle too strongly. We cannot perceive why a failure in an attempted proof of alibi should be visited with severer intendments than a failure in the attempt to prove any other fact in defense. Of course, a fraudulent attempt to prove a simulated alibi, sustained by perjury, will, when detected, be a circumstance of great weight against the prisoner. The connection in which Burrill employs the expression above copied tends to show that he had reference to an unsuccessful fraudulent attempt to establish an alibi. In that sense, we agree with him." An alibi is not, in the strict and accurate sense, a special defense, but a traverse of the material averment in the indictment that the defendant did, or participated in, the particular act charged, and is comprehended in the general plea, "Not guilty." Because susceptible of easy fabrication, and often attempted to be sustained by perjury, whereby the accused endeavors to break the net-work of facts and circumstances surely bringing him to conviction and punishment, the proof of an alibi is, and should be, subjected to careful scrutiny; but it is an error to assume that the law looks on such attempt with suspicion. A general prejudice against such attempt, it must be admitted, has resulted from the unquestioned fact that an alibi is often forged, constituting an artifice or contrivance to shield the guilty. Such proof, however, is positive evidence, which, when founded in truth, negatives the defendant's presence at the time and place of the crime, and disproves the prima facie case made by the prosecution. In some cases it is the only resort accessible to the innocent for the protection against a false accusation; and, though subjected to more rigid scrutiny, should receive from the jury the same consideration as any other evidence offered in denial or excuse. Being a defense which may be lawfully made, and which in legal contemplation is of the same favor as other lawful defenses, there can be no rule of law, founded on logic or principle, common sense or justice, which recognizes a distinction between the consequent weight of an unsuccessful attempt to establish an alibi, and of an unsuccessful attempt to prove any other material fact in defense. In Miller v. People, 39 Ill. 457, BREESE, J., speaking for the court, says: "Failing to prove an alibi should have no greater weight to convince a jury of the guilt of the prisoner attempting it than the failure to prove any other important item of defense. A prisoner is entitled to rely on the facts in his favor he may suppose he is able to prove, and if he is so unfortunate as to fail in his proof it should not, generally speaking, operate to his prejudice. Proof of an alibi is a defense as legitimate as any other; and the court should not say, lest it prejudice the minds of the jury, that failure to establish it should have great weight against the prisoner." The reason given by Mr. Wills for the principle stated by him—because the resort to that kind of defense implies an admission of the truth and relevancy of the facts alleged, and the correctness of the inference drawn from them, if they remain uncontradicted"—is not logically the nature and effect of such defense. An alibi is not a defense of confession and avoidance, but, if established, merely negatives the guilt of the defendant. The charge is not a correct statement of the rule applicable to alibi evidence, and is an invasion of the province of the jury.

The court further charged, at the instance of the state: "In order to make the defense of an alibi successful and worthy of serious consideration by the jury, it is essential that the evidence to establish this defense should cover and account for the whole time of the transaction in question, or at least so much of it as to render it impossible that the defendant could have committed the offense for which he is indicted." There are respectable authorities holding that to successfully establish an alibi the evidence must so cover the time when the offense is shown to have been committed as to preclude the possibility of defendant's presence at the time and place of its commission. In this statement of the rule we do not concur. It is undoubtedly true that the value and effectiveness of the proof of an alibi largely depend upon the extent to which it embraces the period of the commission of the crime. In order to be conclusive, the entire time must necessarily be covered; but without such completed extension the evidence is admissible, and, in ordinary cases, worthy of consideration; and, though not conclusive, may be effectual to originate a reasonable doubt, which will entitle the defendant to acquittal. The strong and stringent rule asserted in the charge is not only inconsistent with, but contradictory of, the fundamental rule, founded in justice and humanity, and resting on the presumption of innocence, that an acquittal must follow a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, engendered by the whole evidence. The proposition of the charge requires the defendant to affirmatively prove that it was impossible for him to have been present at the scene of the crime,—tantamount, when proof of an alibi is attempted, to a requirement of proof of his innocence beyond a reasonable doubt. Evidence of an alibi, though insufficient of itself to establish that defense, should not be excluded from the consideration of the jury, nor should they be instructed, unless satisfied that it is simulated, that the defense is not worthy of serious consideration. Though it may not cover the entire time during which the crime may be shown to have been committed, or so much as to render it impossible that defendant could have committed the offense, it is sufficient, if it reasonably satisfies the minds of the jury, or, in connection with the other evidence, generates a reasonable doubt, that the prisoner committed the act. This rule is consistent with other universally recognized principles of the criminal law, and is supported by reason and by authority. People v. Fong Ah Sing, 64 Cal. 253, 28 Pac. Rep. 233; Landis v. State, 70 Ga. 654; Pollard v. State, 53 Miss. 410; 6 Crim. Law Mag. 656. Reversed and remanded.

JOHNSON v. STATE.

WITNESS—COMPETENCY—HUSBAND AND WIFE.

On the prosecution of a husband for an assault committed on his wife, the wife is not only competent, but she may be compelled, to testify against the husband.

Appeal from city court of Montgomery; I. M. ARRINGTON, Judge.

Wesley Johnson was indicted and tried for an assault with intent to murder his wife. He was convicted of an assault and battery, and now appeals. Affirmed.

John Gindrat Winter, for appellant. Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

MCCLELLAN, J. The sole exception reserved on this record goes to the action of the trial court in compelling the defendant's wife to testify on his trial upon a charge of assault and battery committed upon her person. The right of the wife to testify in such case—her competency as a witness—is admitted. We do not think there can be any doubt of the power of the court to compel her to testify. She is made competent for her own protection, not as an individual simply, but as an individual member of society; and that society—the public—has interest in her testimony, to the end that crime may be punished, which is distinct from any purely personal right of hers, and which she cannot waive. Upon considerations of this character, the law has come to be well settled in recognized texts and by adjudications of courts of high standing that the wife is not only competent in such cases, but is compelled, to testify. Mr. Justice Stephens, in his Digest of the Law of Evidence, which is incorporated bodily in the American and English Encyclopædia of Law, as "containing the most clear and concise statements of the law of evidence extant," declares the rule to be "that in any criminal proceeding against the husband or wife, for any bodily injury or violence inflicted upon his or her wife or husband, such wife or husband is competent and compelled to testify." 7 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 102. And so it has been expressly declared in the following well considered cases: Turner v. State, 60 Miss. 351; Dumas v. State, 14 Tex. App. 465; Bramlette v. State, 21 Tex. App. 611.[1] Moreover, the wife's competency being conceded, and her testimony being relevant, it is not perceived that any legal wrong is done to the defendant by compelling her to testify. As was said in Turner v. State, supra: "If the proposition be [as is contended in this case] that the wife has only a privilege of testifying or not, as she may elect, it is clear that the appellant cannot assign for error the action of the court in compelling her to give testimony over her objection; for, if the action of the court be error, it is the privilege of the witness, and not the legal right or immunity of the defendant, which is impaired. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 451; 2 Phil. Ev. 941; Rosc. N. P. Ev. 146; Reg. v. Kinglake, 11 Cox, Crim. Cas. 499;" Bramlette v. State, (Tex. App.) 2 S. W. Rep. 765. In State v. Neill, 6 Ala. 685, may be found expressions which seem to give importance to the wife's willingness to testify in cases of this sort; and so in Cotton v. State, 62 Ala. 12, and Woods v. State, 76 Ala. 35, some basis for an argument opposed to our conclusion of the first point considered may be afforded; but in the first case the language used was a mere dictum of the court, employed casually and argvendo only; in the last two what was said had no reference to the competency of the wife to testify against her husband when an offense against her person is charged; and in all of them the declarations of the court were palpably made in view of or with reference to the principles which obtain in cases where the husband's rights are only collaterally involved, and, of course, where the element of violence towards the person of his wife is not the gravamen of the proceeding. There is nothing in any of these cases which militates against the power of the court to compel the wife to testify upon the trial of the husband on a charge of assault and battery committed upon her. The judgment of the city court is affirmed.

TOLIVER v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—STRIKING OUT—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. On a prosecution for the larceny of cattle, where the defense is that defendant had purchased them from a third person, paying for them with a horse and wagon, evidence drawn out by the prosecuting attorney, in cross-examining one of defendant's witnesses, that defendant's wife had told witness that defendant had traded said horse and wagon for some cattle, though clearly illegal, should not be stricken out on motion of the prosecuting attorney, since a party calling out illegal evidence has no right to have it excluded on his motion.

2. On a trial for grand larceny, defendant's evidence that he fled the country, on hearing that he was to be prosecuted, because he was poor, and unable to give an appearance bond for so serious a charge, is properly excluded, since it is incompetent for a witness, giving evidence in his own behalf, to testify to his uncommunicated intentions.

3. In a criminal case, a charge that if the evidence is susceptible of two reasonable constructions, one of which is consistent with defendant's innocence, it is the duty of the jury to favor or adopt that construction rather than the other, tends to confuse and mislead them, is an invasion of their province, and should not be given.

Appeal from city court of Montgomery; T. M. ARRINGTON, Judge.

Solomon Toliver was indicted for grand larceny. He was convicted, and appeals. Reversed.

On the trial of the case it was shown by the state that the defendant had fled the country, and was afterwards arrested in Birmingham by a detective. The defendant, testifying in his own behalf, offered to explain his object in fleeing, as follows: That he was poor, and unable to give an appearance bond for so serious a charge, and after his conviction before the recorder for the same offense, and after working out his sentence on the streets, he heard he was to be prosecuted by the state for the same offense, and that he thereupon went to Birmingham. The court, on the objection of the solicitor, refused to allow the said testimony, or any part thereof, to be introduced, and to this ruling the defendant duly excepted. The defendant, among others, requested the following charge: "(1) It is the duty of the jury to reconcile the evidence, if they reasonably can, consistently with innocence; and if two hypotheses are presented, the one showing guilt, the other innocence, each being reasonably credible, it is their duty to acquit." The court refused to give this charge, and the defendant duly excepted to its refusal.

John G. Winter, for appellant. Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

STONE, C. J. The defendant was indicted and convicted of grand larceny, cattle being the subject of the theft. The indictment was joint against defendant and Alfred Thomas. The testimony was that, shortly after the cattle disappeared, four of them were brought by defendant to the city of Montgomery, and there offered for sale. He was arrested, tried before the city recorder, and, under his sentence of conviction for a violation of the city ordinance, suffered the punishment imposed.

On being discharged from the custody of the city authorities he fled, and two years later he was captured in the city of Birmingham, and brought to trial in the present case. Thomas was never arrested, he having fled the country when Toliver was first arrested. The defense attempted by the defendant was that he purchased the cattle from Thomas, paying for them with a horse and wagon. A witness introduced by defendant was asked "if defendant requested him, when told that the cattle were stolen cattle, to go and get his horse and wagon from Alfred Thomas." This question was not objected to by the state. The witness answered that "defendant's wife told him that the horse and wagon were at Alfred Thomas' house." It will be observed this answer was not responsive to the question. The prosecuting attorney "then asked the witness to state what defendant's wife said about the horse and wagon." He answered "that defendant's wife told him that defendant had traded said horse and wagon to Alfred Thomas for some cattle." After this answer was given, the prosecuting attorney "moved the court to exclude all the testimony of the witness; and the court, contrary to the objection of defendant, granted said motion to exclude; and the defendant then and there duly objected to said ruling of the court, and then and there duly excepted to the same." It will be observed that all the testimony of this witness was in its nature illegal.

Three propositions are settled by many rulings of this court: First. The court may exclude illegal testimony at any stage of the trial. McCreary v. Turk, 29 Ala. 244; Bush v. Jackson, 24 Ala. 273; 1 Brick. Dig. p. 887, § 1190; Warren v. Wagner, 75 Ala. 188. Second. A party calling out illegal testimony has no right to have it excluded on his motion. Edgar v. McArn, 22 Ala. 796; Furlow v. Merrell, 23 Ala. 705. Third. Parties may try their issues on illegal testimony if they choose to do so, provided no objection is raised by either. Moon v. Crowder, 72 Ala. 79. The principle raised in this case is somewhat novel. The testimony being patently illegal, if we ignore the manner of its introduction it fell clearly within the rule which allows its exclusion at any stage of the trial. On the other hand, that part of it which, it seems, could alone exert any influence on the jury's finding, was called for and brought out by the solicitor himself, and he clearly had no right to demand or ask its exclusion. We think the city court erred in entertaining and granting the motion to exclude. The solicitor, as we have seen, had no right to make the motion, and the effect of entertaining it was to give some sanction to a practice of experimentation, which it would be dangerous to allow in cases involving life or liberty. A witness giving evidence in his own behalf is not permitted to testify to his uncommunicated intentions. Fonville v. State, 91 Ala. 39, 8 South. Rep. 688. A charge which instructs the jury that if the evidence is susceptible of two reasonable constructions, one of which is consistent with defendant's innocence, it is their duty to favor or adopt that construction rather than the other, tends to confuse and mislead them, is an invasion of their province, and should not be given. Gibson v. State, 91 Ala. 64, 9 South. Rep. 171. Charge No. 1, asked by defendant, was properly refused. There is nothing in the other questions reserved. Reversed and remanded.

Ex parte JONES.

MANDAMUS TO COURT—DISCRETIONARY ORDERS—HABEAS CORPUS.

1. Mandamus will not lie to compel a criminal court to allow a writ of habeas corpus for the purpose of giving bail, such action being within the judicial discretion of that court.

2. Under Const. art. 6, § 2, and Code, § 675, defining the jurisdiction of the supreme court, where a criminal court refused a writ of habeas corpus for the purpose of giving bail, the remedy is by renewing the application in the supreme court, rather than by mandamus to the criminal court.

Application of Lewis Jones for mandamus to the city court of Selma to grant a writ of habeas corpus for the purpose of giving bail. Denied.

J. W. Mabry, for petitioner. Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

MCCLELLAN, J. The petitioner, upon being arrested on a warrant charging him with murder, waived preliminary examination before the justice of the peace before whom the warrant was returnable, and was thereupon committed to jail without bail, to await the action of the grand jury of Dallas county. He then applied to the judge of the city court of Selma for a writ of habeas corpus, alleging that the offense for which he had been committed was on the facts a bailable one, and praying that he be brought before the judge on said writ; that a hearing on the facts be then had; and that he be allowed to give bail. Judge HARRALSON of the city court refused to award the writ of habeas corpus, and said Jones now applies to this court for a mandamus directing and requiring said judge to award the same, and proceed thereunder to examine into the matter as prayed in the original petition. The application made here must be denied. If the petitioner has any remedy it is not mandamus. That remedy can only be invoked when a specific legal right is clearly shown, and there is no other adequate remedy for its enforcement. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 625, §§ 2-4. Assuming that petitioner was entitled to the writ, and of consequence that its refusal was erroneous, his remedy lay in a renewal of his application therefor to this court, which could either grant the writ absolutely or declare his right to it, so that, upon a second application to the judge of the city court, or other officer authorized to act in the premises, his right would be effectuated. Code, § 675; Const. art. 6, § 2; Ex parte Chaney, 8 Ala. 424. Mandamus, moreover, does not lie to control judicial action. It never issues to direct a judicial officer how to act, or what conclusion to reach, upon a judicial question, but only to compel some action when a matter is presented for decision before an officer charged in that regard, and he refuses to hear and determine it. Ramagnano v. Crook, 85 Ala. 226, 3 South. Rep. 845; Dunbar v. Frazer, 78 Ala. 538. Now, whether the writ of habeas corpus will be awarded in any case is a judicial question. It is not to be granted as matter of course, but such facts must be made to appear to the judge to whom the petition therefor is presented as, in his judgment, prima facie entitled the petitioner to the writ. Ex parte Campbell, 20 Ala. 89; Hurd, Hab. Corp. 219-222; Code, §§ 4761, 4762, 4766. And this power to determine in limine whether the writ should issue is essentially judicial power, the exercise of which may be revised on appellate application to this court, but never by a mandamus commanding the judge below to do that which he has determined he should not do. High, Extr. Rem. § 155. We do not think that the cases of Ex parte Mahone, 30 Ala. 49, and Ex parte Champion, 52 Ala. 311, to which our attention has been invited, conflict with the foregoing views, at least so far as the matters really decided are concerned. Had the judge awarded the writ, and then refused to proceed with the case, the cases cited would be in point, and mandamus would lie, not to control his action, but merely to compel him to take some action, to hear and determine the matter involved in the premises. But he did not do this. His only action was to refuse to award the writ. This being judicial action,—not a failure or refusal to act,—as we have seen, mandamus is not petitioner's remedy, and his application, therefore, is denied.

JOHNSON et al. v. OEHMIG et al.

SALE—ACTION FOR PRICE—DEFECTIVE TITLE.

In an action for the price of goods sold, it is no defense that the title to the goods was in a third person at the time of the sale, while defendant still holds possession of the goods.

Appeal from circuit court, De Kalb county; JOHN B. TALLY, Judge.

Assumpsit by Oehmig & Wiehl against Henry Johnson and L. M. Gordon for goods sold and delivered. The defendants pleaded a special plea, which set up that the account sued on was made for an engine and a set of mill-rocks; that after said purchase, and after defendants had paid the $100 in cash, they ascertained that plaintiffs had no title to the engine sold them by plaintiffs; that the said engine was the principal inducement for said purchase; and that before the defendants ascertained the want of title in plaintiffs to said engine they had made valuable improvements on the same. The plaintiffs demurred to the special plea. The court sustained the demurrer, and there was verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. W. Haralson, for appellants. L. A. Dobbs, for appellees.

WALKER, J. In Ogburn v. Ogburn, 3 Port. (Ala.) 126, it was held that the vendee of personal property cannot, while holding possession thereof, defend against an action for the purchase money by proof of want of title in the vendor. In the course of the opinion in that case it was said: "We think no defense can be made to an action for the purchase money when the facts relied upon to make it would not, if the parties were changed, and the money had been paid, enable the vendee to recover it back for the breach of the warranty of title." The defendants would not be entitled to such recovery on the facts stated in their second plea. In an action by a vendee of personal property against his vendor for a breach of warranty of title, only damages for actual loss can be recovered. The plaintiff in such an action must not only establish that his vendor is without title to the property sold, and that another is the true owner, but also that he has restored the property to such owner, that it has been taken from him under compulsory proceedings, or that he has parted with money or property in consequence of a judgment obtained against him, or voluntarily in answer to a claim made for the property. O'Brien v. Jones, 91 N. Y. 193. In Harris v. Rowland, 23 Ala. 644, the property sold had been recovered on the adverse title. No such state of facts is shown by the second plea in this case. It is not averred that the defendants have in any way been disturbed in their possession of the property. If that possession remains undisturbed, their title will be perfected by lapse of time. If a paramount title is asserted, the plaintiffs may settle with the adverse claimant, or they will be answerable in damages on their warranty of title if the defendants shall be required to deliver up the property in response to a claim by one who may prove to be the true owner. So long as the vendee of personal property remains in undisturbed possession, he cannot recover damages in an action of an implied warranty of title, or set up want of title in his vendor as a defense to an action for the purchase money, unless there were fraudulent representations made by the vendor in regard to the title. Such a vendee, in peaceable possession, has nothing substantial to complain of in the fact that his vendor was not the true owner of the property. When nothing more is shown than that he may suffer loss in the future in consequence of the outstanding claim to the property, he must rely upon his warranty, and he cannot sue thereon until he has suffered damages because of its breach. Case v. Hall, 35 Amer. Dec. 605, and note; Sumner v. Gray, 38 Amer. Dec. 39; Burt v. Dewey, 100 Amer. Dec. 482, and note; 2 Benj. Sales, (C. Corbin's Ed.) §§ 948, 1347, and notes. There was no error in sustaining the demurrer to the second plea. Affirmed.

HARMON et al. v. SILER.

SEPARATE ESTATE OF DECEASED WIFE—ACTION FOR NECESSARIES.

An action at law will not lie against the estate of a deceased wife to charge her separate estate for the payment of articles used for the support of the family during coverture.

Appeal from circuit court, Pike county; JOHN P. HUBBARD, Judge.

Action by Harmon & Son against W. D. Siler, as executor of one L. N. Pickett. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal.

John Gamble and Tompkins & Troy, for appellants. Gardner & Wiley, for appellees.

COLEMAN, J. The complaint as amended presents a case in which it is sought to subject the statutory estate of a deceased wife to the payment of a debt contracted during coverture for the purchase of articles of comfort and support of the household and family, and for which the husband would be liable at common law. The suit is against the executor of the deceased wife alone. The liability of the separate estate of the wife to such debts is purely statutory. The only judgment which the statute authorizes, so far as it affects the estate of the wife, must be founded on proceedings against the husband and wife jointly, or upon a judgment against the husband alone, followed by a motion against the wife. The estate of the wife cannot be condemned to sale for the satisfaction of such claim by independent original proceedings against her alone, if living, or her estate, if she be dead. O'Connor v. Chamberlain, 59 Ala. 435. In the case of Rodgers v. Brazeale, 34 Ala. 512, it was declared that an action at law does not lie against the administrator of a deceased wife to charge her separate estate with the payment of articles of comfort and support of the household, furnished during coverture. These principles of law were fully recognized in the case of Carter v. Wann, 45 Ala. 346. It is unnecessary to consider the rulings of the court in regard to the admissions of testimony, or the legal questions decided relative to the statute of non-claim, as under the averments of the complaint and the undisputed proof, or facts offered to be proven, plaintiff cannot possibly recover in this action. Affirmed.

HOOPER v. PAYNE.

MORTGAGES ON CROPS—LIEN—EFFECT OF PENDING EJECTMENT SUIT—INFANCY—EVIDENCE.

1. A judgment in ejectment is not conclusive upon a person occupying part of the land, not made a party; and a mortgage by such person on the crops, pending the suit, creates a valid lien thereon, though the mortgagee has notice of the ejectment suit.

2. The fact that the mortgagor was an infant son of the defendants in the ejectment suit does not invalidate the mortgage in favor of the landowner, where the son had exclusive control of the crops grown by him, and executed the mortgage with his father's approbation; since infancy is a personal privilege, and cannot be taken advantage of by a stranger.

3. Evidence that the son, though living or boarding with his parents, furnished his own supplies, cultivated the crops with his own labor, and had exclusive control and ownership thereof, justified a presumption that he executed the mortgage with his father's approbation.

Appeal from circuit court, Tallapoosa county; LEROY F. BOX, Judge.

Statutory trial of the right of property by John F. Hooper, interposing a claim to certain cotton seized under writ of detinue issued in a suit by W. H. Payne against R. A. Smith. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas L. Bulger, for appellant. W. D. Bulger, for appellee.

STONE, C. J. In August, 1888, Hooper, the appellant, instituted a statutory action of ejectment against Araminta and G. W. Smith. The subject of the suit was a tract of land on which the said G. W. and Araminta Smith were then residing. Only the husband and wife were made parties defendant. Hooper recovered in that action September 10, 1890, and also recovered $250 damages for use and occupation of the premises while they were withheld from him, (Hooper.) No part of this $250 was for the use and occupation of the part of the land cultivated by R. A. Smith, to be explained presently. R. A. Smith is a son of G. W. and Araminta Smith, and was under 21 years of age. He in 1890, and for three years before that time, cultivated a part of the tract of land which Hooper recovered in the action of ejectment. He lived or boarded with his parents, and the agreed statement of facts shows that, while the part of the land he cultivated was in the joint possession of himself and his mother, he cultivated on his own account, procured his own supplies, and had the entire management, control, ownership, and disposition of the crops grown by him. He in January, 1890, mortgaged the crop to be grown that year to Payne, to procure supplies to enable him to make the crop, which gave rise to this suit. At that time Payne knew that Hooper's ejectment suit was pending against G. W. and Araminta Smith for the recovery of the land.

The infancy of R. A. Smith is not, per se, a controlling factor in this case. If a disability, it was personal to him, and could not be set up by a mere stranger. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 563, §§ 16, 17. Hooper sustained no relation to him which authorized him to assert and maintain the proposition that G. W. Smith, his father, was the owner of the crop grown by the son. True, under ordinary circumstances, and in the absence of R. A. Smith's mortgage to Payne, which secured the supplies with which the crop was made, it is possible the father could have claimed and disposed of the crop at any time while it remained under the control of the minor son. Stovall v. Johnson, 17 Ala. 14. He asserted no such right. The testimony, as we have seen, shows that R. A. Smith, with the consent of his father and mother, furnished his own supplies, and cultivated the crop with his own labor and for his own use. We think the circumstances justify the presumption that the mortgage to Payne was with the father's approbation. Coming to these conclusions, we hold that this case must be tried without any reference to the relationship between R. A. Smith and G. W. and Araminta Smith.

When the ejectment suit was instituted, and continuously until he was evicted under the writ of possession, R. A. Smith was in possession and cultivating the particular land on which the cotton was grown, the subject of this suit. He was not sued in the action, and hence was not concluded by the judgment recovered. As to him it established nothing; accomplished nothing. So far as the rights of these parties are concerned, that suit cuts no figure. The case then stands as if Hooper had dispossessed him without suit and without process; a mere forcible eviction. Such being the case, the right to the crop, in a personal action brought for its recovery, cannot be determined by showing that the title to the land was in Hooper. To conclude R. A. Smith, he should have been made a defendant to the ejectment suit. Smith v. Gayle, 58 Ala. 601, 604, 605; Cooper v. Watson, 73 Ala. 252. The mortgage vested in Payne a sufficient title to maintain the suit. Act No. 44, Acts Ala. 1888-89, p. 45. Affirmed.

THOMAS v. STATE.

JURORS — SELECTION FROM LIST SERVED ON DEFENDANT — POSTPONEMENT OF TRIAL.

1. Sess. Acts 1886-87, § 11, (Crim. Code 1886, p. 134, note,) provides that when the day of the trial of a capital case has been fixed to begin in a succeeding week the sheriff shall serve defendant with a copy of the list of jurors drawn for such week. Held, that the fact that the trial was not entered on until the week succeeding the one originally fixed, for which week a different venire was summoned, did not render it necessary that a new order should be made, setting another day for trial, or that a new venire should be summoned or served on defendant; and that the latter could not complain of an order directing the selection of the jury from the list originally served on him.

2. The fact that the sheriff placed on the list the names of several jurors who had not been summoned cannot be taken advantage of on motion in arrest of judgment, after conviction, since the action of the sheriff should have been called to the attention of the court before the trial was begun.

Appeal from city court of Montgomery; T. M. ARRINGTON, Judge.

William Thomas was indicted for murder in the first degree, was convicted, and sentenced to be hanged. He now appeals. Affirmed.

The day set for his trial was August 14, 1891; and the defendant was duly served with a list of 75 names, which list contained the names of 36 persons who were purported to have been summoned on the regular jury for the week commencing August 10, 1891. On that day—August 14, 1891—the court, at the request of the solicitor, set said case for trial on the following Monday, August 17, 1891, a day of a different week, and for which week commencing August 17, 1891, a different venire had been summoned than for the week commencing August 10, 1891. When the case was called for trial on Monday, August 17, 1891, the defendant moved to quash the venire on the ground "that the list served on him did not contain the names of those summoned on the regular jury for the week commencing August 17th." The court overruled this motion, and allowed the defendant to select a jury from the names contained in the list served on him, and to this action the defendant duly excepted.

Edwin F. Jones, for appellant. Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

STONE, C. J. The order made for summoning the venire in this case strictly conformed to the statute. The order setting the case for trial was made July 29, 1891. The day set for the trial was August 14, 1891. This was during a week subsequent to the one in which the order was made, and consequently "the jurors drawn and summoned for such week"—the week during which the trial was to take place—were, by the statute, made a part of the venire from which the jury was to be organized. Sess. Acts 1886-87, § 11, (Crim. Code 1886, p. 134, in note.[1]) The order conforming to the very letter of the statute, we do not think the city court erred in requiring the jury to be selected from that venire. The fact, or accident, by which the trial was not entered upon until a day during the succeeding week, could not properly render it necessary that a new order should be made, setting another day for the trial, or that a new venire should be summoned or served on the defendant. Had such course been pursued, possibly it would have been regular; but the defendant cannot complain that it was not done. There was no error in overruling defendant's motion to quash the venire.

The motion to quash the venire, based on the ground stated above, being overruled, the organization of the jury and the trial were entered upon, without further preliminary objection. After the trial was concluded, and the jury had returned a verdict of guilty, the defendant moved in arrest of judgment. The ground of the motion did not appear on the record, but arose as follows: Under the order to the sheriff to place on the venire the names "of the jurors drawn and summoned for the week" of the trial, that officer had placed the entire 36 names drawn as petit jurors for that week. These constituted a part of the list served on the defendant. It was stated in the motion that 5 of the 36, though drawn as jurors, had not been summoned. The venire for that week, and the sheriff's return upon it, proved this statement to be true. Had that motion been made before the trial was entered upon, it should, and doubtless would, have been sustained. But it came too late. Such motion, not raising the question of the guilt or innocence of the accused, should always be made before the trial on the merits is entered upon. Parties must not be permitted to speculate on the chances of a favorable verdict, and, failing, then fall back on some preliminary, ministerial error, not previously called to the attention of the court. We cannot suppose, and do not charge, that such was the intention in this case, but the tendency of such practice is not favorable to a proper administration of the law. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 264, § 163 et seq. Motions in arrest of judgment must, as a rule, rest on something apparent on the record. That which is available in arrest of judgment is, in general, equally available on error. There is nothing in the record before us to authorize the arrest of the proper judgment on the verdict rendered. Banks v. State, 72 Ala. 522; Diggs v. State, 77 Ala. 68. There is no error in the record, and the judgment of the city court must be affirmed. The day appointed for the execution of the prisoner having passed, it is ordered and adjudged that the sentence of the law be executed on Friday, February 19, 1892, within the walls of the jail of Montgomery county, by hanging the said William Thomas by the neck until he is dead. In executing this sentence the sheriff will conform to statutory regulations. Affirmed.

[1] This section provides: "When the term of the court continues two or more weeks, and by law the criminal docket is not taken up until the second or third week of the same, the court, in its discretion, may, on any day of the term, fix the trial of a capital case for any day of a subsequent week of the term, during which such case may be tried; and if the sheriff shall serve a copy of the special jury drawn to try said case, together with a copy of the jurors drawn and summoned for such week, together with a copy of the indictment, one entire day before the day set for trial, that shall be held a compliance with the law requiring a copy of the jury and indictment to be served on the defendant, as hereinbefore provided."

McQUEEN v. STATE.

JURY — SPECIAL VENIRE — MURDER — EVIDENCE — CONFESSIONS — ARGUMENTATIVE INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Where the court orders a special venire of 50 jurors to be drawn, and one of them proves to be on the regular panel, defendant is deprived of his rights to the full number of jurors ordered, and the venire must be quashed. Darby v. State, 9 South. Rep. 429, 92 Ala. 9, followed.

2. On a trial for murder it appeared that decedent was wounded by a gunshot in the back at the lower end of the spinal column, and the day before his death said to a witness: "I want you to do all you can for me. I believe— I don't think I will live." Held that this was a sufficient foundation for the admission of his dying declarations.

3. The fact that a defendant makes confessions in answer to questions by the officer having him in custody does not render them inadmissible, where it appears the confessions were made voluntarily, and without threat or inducement.

4. Defendant requested a charge that unless the jury were convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that the killing was done "'willfully,'—that is, governed by will, without yielding to reason; 'deliberate,'—that is, formed with deliberation, as distinguished from a sudden rash act; 'malicious,'—that is, with fixed hate, or done with wicked intentions, not the result of sudden passion; and 'premeditated,'—that is, contrived or designed previously,"—then they could not find him guilty. Held, that it was argumentative, and was properly refused.

5. The giving of argumentative charges on request of the state is not reversible error, unless it appears to have misled the jury.

Appeal from circuit court, Butler county; JOHN P. HUBBARD, Judge.

Indictment against Peter McQueen for murder. Verdict of murder in the second degree, and judgment thereon. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

On examination of J. F. Brown, sheriff of Butler county, as a witness for the state, he testified "that, after defendant was arrested and in his custody, he made a statement to him about the difficulty, and that said statement was voluntary; that he made no threats, nor offered any inducements." On cross-examination, Brown said that defendant said nothing to him, except in answer to the questions propounded by him. The defendant objected to the introduction of any statement made by him to the sheriff, on the ground that it was not shown to be voluntary, and, upon the court's overruling his objection, the defendant excepted. The testimony for the defendant tended to show that he shot the deceased in self-defense. At the request of the solicitor, the court gave the following written charges to the jury: (4) "The court further charges the jury that 'premeditation' means determined on beforehand, but the required operation of the mind—the reflection and premeditation—may take place in the shortest interval of time, even at the moment of committing the act, as well as a month beforehand, and, like any other fact, it may be proved by circumstantial evidence which excludes every reasonable doubt." (5) "The court further charges the jury that a doubt which requires an acquittal must be actual and substantial,—not mere speculation or possibility. It is not a mere possible doubt because everything relating to human affairs, and depending on moral evidence, is open to some possible or imaginary doubt." The defendant excepted to the giving of these charges, and also excepted to the court's refusal to give the following charge requested by him: "The court charges the jury that unless they are convinced beyond a reasonable doubt, from the evidence in the case, that the killing of the deceased by the defendant was 'willful,'—that is, governed by the will, without yielding to reason; 'deliberate,'—that is, formed with deliberation, in contradistinction to a sudden and rash act; 'malicious,'—that is, with fixed hate, or done with wicked intentions or motives, not the result of sudden passion; and 'premeditated,'—that is, contrived or designed previously,—then they cannot find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment."

Gamble & Powell, for appellant. Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

CLOPTON, J. In Darby v. State, 92 Ala. 9, 9 South. Rep. 429, it was decided that when the presiding judge draws from the jury-box the names of 50 persons, and orders them to be summoned to appear on the day set for the trial of a capital case, and a copy of the list of the names so drawn, with the list of the regular jurors drawn and summoned for the week, to be served on the defendant, he is entitled to the full number; and, if one whose name is drawn and put on the special venire is also on the regular panel for the week, the defendant is deprived of his right to the full number ordered, and it is good ground for quashing the venire. The motion to quash the venire in the present case is made on the same ground as in Darby's Case, and the facts in the two cases, the name of the juror being changed, are identical. On the authority of that case the motion to quash the venire, which was made in due time, should have been granted. It is unnecessary to consider the exceptions to the refusals of the court to send, while the jury was being impaneled, for the special jurors who were serving on the grand jury. A like proceeding will not probably occur on another trial.

The deceased was wounded in the back, a little to the left of the spinal column, and near the lower end of the spine. It was a gunshot wound, the deceased dying next day. The evidence shows that he said to the witness: "I want you to do all you can for me. I believe— I don't think I will live." The circumstances, and the statement of the deceased to the witness, prima facie show that he was under a conviction of approaching death, and had lost hope of recovery. A sufficient predicate was laid to admit the dying declarations, leaving to the jury to consider the circumstances under which they were made in determining the weight which should be given to them. Jordan v. State, 82 Ala. 1, 2 South. Rep. 460; Ward v. State, 78 Ala. 441.

The ruling as to the admissibility of the confessions of defendant in evidence is in accord with the decisions of this court. It is affirmatively shown that the confessions were not made under the influence of threats, promises, or other improper inducements, but were voluntary.

The mere fact that the defendant was under arrest, and made the confessions in answer to questions propounded to him by the officer having him in custody, does not render them inadmissible. Spicer v. State, 69 Ala. 159.

The charge requested by defendant is argumentative, and for this reason, if no other, was properly refused.

The same observation is applicable to the first two charges requested by the state; but the giving of an argumentative charge will not operate to reverse the judgment, unless it appears to have misled the jury. For the error in refusing to quash the venire the judgment is reversed.

Reversed and remanded.

GATCHELL et al. v. FOSTER.

GARNISHMENT—LIABILITY ON NEGOTIABLE NOTE—TRANSFER—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

1. A garnishee disclosed that on November 2, 1889, he was indebted to the principal defendant by three notes, giving amounts, and when due, the first being due in six months; that he did not know whether the payee owned the notes at the date of the disclosure, or whether they would be transferred before maturity; but did not disclose their negotiability or where payable. Held, that judgment against garnishee February 18, 1890, was authorized by Code, § 2976, providing for judgments against garnishees, and suspending execution thereon until the maturity of the debt.

2. Where the maker of negotiable notes payable at a banking-house disclosed the indebtedness by the notes, without mentioning their negotiability, or where payable, he will not be allowed in a collateral proceeding to defeat a judgment against him as garnishee by showing that the notes were transferred before maturity.

3. Where a garnishee was in court, and allowed judgment to be entered against him without objection, or setting up an existing available defense, such as the negotiability of notes, he is estopped to set up such defense on a petition for supersedeas, though the notes were transferred before maturity, and he compelled to pay them to the transferee.

4. The omission in a judgment against a garnishee to recite the amount of judgment against the principal defendant is an irregularity not affecting the validity of the judgment on a collateral attack, where it appeared to have been a clerical omission, to be corrected on motion.

Appeal from city court of Anniston; B. F. CASSADY, Judge.

Petition of J. D. Foster to supersede and vacate an execution on a judgment against him, as garnishee, at the suit of A. D. Gatchell & Co. against W. T. Farrar. Gatchell & Co. demurred to the petition on the grounds that the petitioner seeks to obtain relief on matters which were in existence and pleadable before the rendering of the judgment against which relief is sought; that the petitioner seeks to go behind the judgment, and bring forward matters which existed prior to the rendition of said judgment; that it is not alleged in the said petition that the petitioner was injured by reason of the failure of the judgment rendered against him to set out the amount of the judgment against Farrar, the defendant in the original suit; that the facts set forth in said petition did not entitle petitioner to any relief in the present proceedings. The demurrer was overruled, and Gatchell & Co. appeal. Reversed.

Blackwell & Keith, for appellants. Gordon McDonald and Matthews & Whiteside, for appellee.

CLOPTON, J. The object of this proceeding, instituted by appellee, is the supersedeas and vacation of an execution issued on a judgment rendered against him February 18, 1890. The judgment was rendered against him on his answer to a writ of garnishment sued out by appellants in a pending suit brought by them against W. T. Farrar. The garnishment proceedings leading to, but exclusive of, the judgment, seem to be regular. It appears, however, from the petition for supersedeas and the exhibits thereto, that the indebtedness admitted in the answer of the garnishee was evidenced by promissory notes payable at the First National Bank of Anniston, and that the judgment was rendered before maturity of the notes, or either of them. Such being the real character of the indebtedness, appellee contends that the judgment was not warranted by the answer, on which alone it was rendered; and that in such case, on the principle declared in Corbitt v. Pynes, 45 Ala. 258, it may be set aside at a subsequent term. It may be conceded that the weight of authority maintains the proposition that the maker of a negotiable note cannot be charged as garnishee of the payee while it is still current as negotiable paper, subject to be transferred to a bona fide purchaser without notice before maturity. But the mere fact of negotiability does not exempt the note from garnishment at the suit of a creditor of the payee, so long as he remains the proprietor. Mills v. Stewart, 12 Ala. 90. It may be that in such case, when the answer of the garnishee does not disclose that the note is still the property of the payee, judgment should not be rendered before maturity of the note, and only then when it affirmatively appears, from the answer or otherwise, that the payee is the proprietor at the time of maturity. This question we do not decide, for, conceding that an answer disclosing an indebtedness by negotiable paper does not warrant a judgment against the garnishee before maturity, in order to avail himself of this defense against the rendition of judgment, it is essential that the negotiable character of the note be disclosed in the answer. In the present case the answer admits that the garnishee and one Letcheuwalter were indebted to Farrar, the original defendant, on or about November 2, 1889, by three promissory notes, described as follows: "One note for five hundred dollars, due at six months after date; one for one thousand dollars, due at twelve months after date; and one for five hundred dollars, due at eighteen months after date." The answer further states that the garnishee does not know whether the payee held and owned the notes at the time of the answer, or whether either or all of them have been transferred by him to innocent purchasers, or whether they will be transferred before maturity. There is no further or other description of the indebtedness, no statement or indication that the notes were payable at a bank or banking-house, or at any particular place, so as to constitute negotiable paper,—notes of such character that, if transferred before maturity, for value, without notice, the transferee could enforce their payment, though they may have been held by the payee at the time of the service of the garnishment, and though the maker may have suffered judgment to be rendered against him as garnishee, and may have paid the same. The notes set forth in the answer are subject to any defenses which the maker may have against them, or which may accrue before notice of their transfer. The court was not bound to inquire into the character of the notes, but could act upon the description as given in the answer. The answer disclosing only non-negotiable notes, on which the maker may be charged as garnishee, and failing to disclose that he had received notice of their transfer, or that any person other than the payee asserted any claim to them, the court was authorized to render judgment against the garnishee, and suspend execution until the maturity of the debt, as provided by section 2976 of the Code. The judgment was warranted by the answer. In all instances in which the matter of discharge insisted upon in the petition does not appear on the record, a proceeding by petition and supersedeas, it has been said, may be properly regarded as a substitute for a bill in equity, and that any matter of discharge which constitutes an equitable satisfaction of the judgment which the writ of execution is used to enforce may be inquired into on such proceeding, and the execution perpetually superseded. Bank v. Coleman, 20 Ala. 140. But, as a general rule, on supersedeas, matters which go behind the judgment or errors or irregularities in the course of the proceedings cannot be inquired into. The ground of relief must rest upon the facts occurring subsequently to the judgment. When the answer warrants the judgment, antecedent facts will not be considered, unless there is want of jurisdiction in the court, apparent on the face of the record, or fraud is alleged and shown. Gravett v. Malone, 54 Ala. 19. The negotiability of the notes was an antecedent fact, which the garnishee could and should have set up in his answer as a defense to the rendition of the judgment. As appears from the judgment entry, it was rendered on motion of plaintiffs, the garnishee appearing by counsel. Being present when it was rendered, and having suffered it to be rendered without objection, or without setting up an existing available defense, he will not be permitted to set up such defense on petition and supersedeas. The judgment is conclusive on him. The notes having been in fact transferred before maturity, and the maker having been compelled to pay them to the transferees, the payment of the judgment is certainly a hardship; but a hardship resultant from the filing of an insufficient answer from which the court cannot relieve him without violating the elementary principles on which the conclusiveness of judgments rests when collaterally assailed.

The next ground of relief is that the judgment omits to recite the fact and amount of the judgment against the original defendant. It will be admitted that a garnishment issued as a remedy to obtain satisfaction of a judgment, though in some respects a new suit, being consequential and auxiliary to the judgment, a dependency thereon, it is essential to the regularity of a judgment against the garnishee that it should recite the fact and amount of the recovery against the original defendant. The recitation, however, of the fact and amount is the duty of the clerk, and its omission may be corrected on motion. Whorley v. Railroad Co., 72 Ala. 20; Randolph v. Little, 62 Ala. 396. The omission to recite the fact and amount of the judgment against the original defendant is an irregularity not affecting its validity when collaterally assailed. By the judgment, execution was suspended until the maturity of the first note, and was not in fact issued until after the maturity of the second. The record does not show the amount of the judgment against the original defendant, but from the amount of the judgment rendered against the garnishee the presumption is that the sum of the note first maturing exceeded the sum of the judgment against Farrar. On this state of the record we cannot hold the judgment void on collateral attack. Judgment reversed, and judgment rendered sustaining the demurrers to the petition.

NORTON et al. v. NORTON et al.

HOMESTEAD—RIGHTS OF WIDOW—CONVEYANCE—APPEAL—SETTLEMENT OF ESTATE—QUESTIONS NOT RAISED BELOW.

1. Where no objection is made, in the court below, to the removal of a settlement from the probate to the chancery court on the application of an administrator, and the questions to be determined are those of which the chancery court has exclusive jurisdiction, no objection can be taken on appeal.

2. Code, §§ 1892–1900, 2543, confer upon a widow the right of quarantine until her dower is assigned, the right of homestead, exempt from the payment of debts, and dower in all the lands of which her husband was seised in fee during the coverture. Held that, as the rights of quarantine and homestead are personal rights, which cannot be alienated, but which may be forfeited by removal, a conveyance of the widow's entire dower interest, and her removal from the homestead, entitles the grantee only to the rents and profits to which the widow would have been entitled had she removed from the homestead without making the conveyance.

Appeal from chancery court, Barbour county; JOHN A. FOSTER, Chancellor.

This comprises two suits,—the first, a bill by E. T. Norton, administrator of John T. Norton, asking that his administration be removed to the chancery court; the second, a bill by Henry T. Norton, setting forth his purchase of the widow's dower interest, and asking for a decree that he be entitled to dower, and to the rents of all the land of the decedent.

J. W. Williams, for appellants. H. D. Clayton and G. W. Peach, for appellees.

CLOPTON, J. E. T. Norton was appointed, in September, 1887, administrator of the estate of John T. Norton, by the probate court of Barbour county. In November thereafter, Josephine Norton, the widow of the decedent, sold and conveyed to Henry T. Norton, one of the heirs, all her right, title, interest, and claim in and to the real property of her deceased husband, including the homestead, and moved off the land, Henry T. Norton entering into possession under his purchase. No assignment of dower has ever been made. E. T. Norton, having been removed from the administration, filed in the probate court an account for final settlement, which was contested by the heirs. Thereupon he filed the bill for the purpose of removing the settlement of his administration into the chancery court. Henry T. Norton, whose cross-bill had been dismissed without prejudice, filed an original bill, setting forth his purchase of the dower interest, and the widow's conveyance thereof, and basing thereon a prayer for a decree to the effect that he is entitled to dower, and also to all the rents of all the lands of the decedent. By agreement of counsel both suits were heard together, and one decree rendered. It is well settled that to authorize the removal of the settlement from the probate to the chancery court on the application of the administrator, there must arise some question or matter which the probate court, by reason of its limited powers, is incompetent to determine. When, however, a special equity exists, there can be no sufficient reason why the final settlement of a removed administrator may not, on his application, be transferred to and made in the chancery court. Though his office and functions as administrator are terminated by removal, he is required to make final settlement of his administration, which should be made in a court having jurisdiction and power to determine and adjust all the equities arising thereon. The ascertainment of the amount of rents to which the heirs and the widow or her assignee are respectively entitled is preliminary and essential to a full and complete settlement of the administration. It is well settled that the chancery court has exclusive jurisdiction to award to the widow rents or mesne profits between the death of her husband and the assignment of dower. Wood v. Morgan, 56 Ala. 397. No objection having been made during the pendency of the suit to the bill on the ground that the administrator has no right to remove the settlement into the chancery court, and as the bills and all the pleadings show that questions arise which should be determined before the final settlement is completed, of which the chancery court has exclusive jurisdiction, and as the parties agreed that the two suits should be submitted and heard together, and a decree rendered settling all the equities of all the parties in both suits, we shall not regard such objection, made for the first time in this court.

No objection is urged to the execution of the order for the sale of the lands, made by the probate court, or to the payment to H. T. Norton of a fair equivalent for the dower interest out of the proceeds of the sale in lieu of an assignment of dower by metes and bounds. The main point of contention is whether H. T. Norton is entitled, by virtue of his purchase of the dower interest, to one-sixth of the proceeds of the sale, and to the rents of all the lands, including the homestead. Appellants concede that he is entitled to one-sixth of the proceeds of the sale and one-third of the rents of the lands, exclusive of the homestead. The statutes confer on the widow the right to retain possession of the dwelling where her husband most usually resided next before his death, with the offices and buildings appurtenant thereto, and the plantation connected therewith, free from the payment of rent, until her dower is assigned. Also to have set apart the homestead, not exceeding in value $2,000, and in area 160 acres, as exempt from administration and the payment of debts; and dower of all lands of which the husband was seised in fee during coverture. Code, §§ 1892–1900, 2543. These rights are essentially distinct, and different incidents attach. The widow's quarantine is a personal right or privilege,—the right to the use and occupation of the property, by herself or tenants, until dower is assigned. This right is not an estate in the land, which can be sold under execution at law, or alienated. It terminates whenever the widow deprives herself of the right to dower by release to the heir, or in any other manner. Boynton v. Sawyer, 35 Ala. 497. Not being alienable, the transferee of her dower interest can base no claim to all the rents of all the lands on her right of quarantine. Neither can such claim be founded on the widow's conveyance of the homestead. The statute exempts the homestead in favor of the widow and minor children, if any, in any event, during the life of the widow, or the minority of the children, whichever may last terminate; and, if there be no minor child, the rents and profits of such homestead inure to the benefit of the widow during her life. The statute having the beneficent purpose of furnishing the widow a home, confers the right of occupancy as a dwelling place during her life. Under the law as it was at the time of the alienation of the dower interest, she may abandon it, and acquire a new homestead; she could not convey or incumber it. In Barber v. Williams, 74 Ala. 331, it is said: "The abandonment works a destruction of her privileges, and, as she has no power of alienation, if she does alien it, like the alienation of her right of dower before assignment, the descent to the heir is not intercepted, and he may maintain ejectment against her alienee, or those entering under him. By her removal from the homestead after alienating it, the widow forfeited the rents and profits which inure to her benefit under the statute, and her alienee acquired no claim thereto by virtue of her conveyance to him. The rights of the parties are not affected by the act of February 28, 1889, "for the protection of widows and minor children." The second section applies to homesteads previously set apart, but not abandoned at the time of the passage of the act. Acts 1888–89, p. 113. It may be that, when a homestead has been set apart to the widow,—being a larger use and enjoyment during her life,—the right of dower and its allotment are in abeyance, but the right is not thereby extinguished. As we have said, she is, under the statute, dowable of all the lands of which her husband was seised in fee during the marriage. On her abandonment of the homestead, if it has been set apart, her right to dower in the premises so set apart becomes operative, the same as if no homestead had been selected and set apart. In this case, however, no homestead was set apart; the order of the probate court being void for want of jurisdiction. James v. Clark, 89 Ala. 606, 7 South. Rep. 161. The alienation of the homestead being void, Henry T. Norton, the complainant in the second bill, is only entitled to the rents or mesne profits to which the widow would have been entitled had she abandoned the homestead without conveying her dower interest. In such case she would have been entitled to one-sixth of the proceeds of all the lands including the homestead, and to one-third of the rents of all the lands of which she is dowable from the death of her husband to the assignment of dower. The decree is in accord with these views. The assignment of error that the chancellor in the decree does not require Henry T. Norton to account for the rents during his possession of the premises is not well founded. The decree, as we understand it, requires him to account for them. The decree is affirmed on the original appeal. Henry T. Norton takes nothing by the cross-assignment of error. Affirmed.

JERNIGAN et al. v. FLOWERS.

CREDIBILITY OF WITNESS—INTEREST—EJECTMENT—ADVERSE POSSESSION—EVIDENCE—BOND FOR TITLE.

1. Where a person conveys to his wife land, in which he holds only an equitable interest, and is then called by the wife as a witness in ejectment, it is competent for the defendant to show the interest of the witness, and his relationship to the party in whose favor he is called.

2. Where the evidence in ejectment is conflicting as to who was in possession of the premises at a certain time, and a witness for plaintiff testifies that plaintiff and her husband took possession in 1882 or 1883, and stayed two or three years, it is competent for defendant to introduce the record of an ejectment suit instituted by him in 1885, and the recovery in that suit, and delivery of possession, so that the jury may determine from the conflict whether or not plaintiff and her husband were in possession at that time, and, if they were, the character of the possession.

3. Where a person buys land at a tax-sale, and before receiving the deed executes a bond conditioned for the conveyance of title to another, the bond is, in effect, an agreement to convey all the equitable interest of the grantor, and is effectual to prevent any one, claiming under him with notice, from afterwards acquiring any interest through the said sale.

4. Where a person who is in possession of land, under a bond conditioned for the execution of a deed upon payment of the purchase money, complies with the agreement as regards payment, his possession becomes adverse to that of the vendor, and a conveyance by the latter is void as against him.

Appeal from circuit court, Coffee county; JESSE M. CARMICHAEL, Judge.

Ejectment by Emma Flowers against D. W. Jernigan and others. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. D. Roberts, for appellants. P. M. Hickman, for appellee.

COLEMAN, J. Appellee brought suit in ejectment to recover certain lands. The rule is that to recover in this action plaintiff must rely upon the strength of her title. In August, 1878, George P. Roberts sold to R. O. Flowers the land in controversy, and executed to him a bond to make a quitclaim title upon the payment of the stipulated purchase money. In August, 1881, George P. Roberts, the same vendor, sold and conveyed by quitclaim deed the same land to the defendants in this ejectment suit. The evidence tends to show that R. O. Flowers, the first purchaser, took possession of the land, and complied with the terms of his purchase by the payment of the purchase money at the time or before it was due, but that George P. Roberts died without making him or his vendee a quitclaim deed, as stipulated in the bond for title. On the 8th of December, 1881, R. O. Flowers by deed conveyed the land to Emma J. Faussett, who is the same person as Emma Flowers, plaintiff. The evidence tends to show that she went into possession under her purchase, and remained in possession until ousted by the sheriff, in April, 1888.

It will be seen, from this statement of the facts, that when R. O. Flowers sold and conveyed to plaintiff he did not have the legal title, but only an equity; and it will be further seen that plaintiff's possession, coupled with that of the vendor, lacked a few months of completing 10 years, the time necessary under the statute to perfect a legal title by adverse possession. The defendant offered to prove that R. O. Flowers and plaintiff were husband and wife at the time he executed the deed to her, and were living together as husband and wife in the year 1885, and at the time of the trial of the present suit. The court refused to permit this proof to be made. This ruling of the court was clearly erroneous. It is elementary that the interest of a witness in the result of a suit may be shown, and his relationship to the party in whose favor he is called to testify. It was erroneous for the further reason that, if they were man and wife, his deed of conveyance at the time of its execution did not operate to vest in her more than an equitable title. Whether the act of February 28, 1887, (Code, § 2341,) had the effect to vest in her the legal title, also, as against the defendants, would depend upon the further fact that no rights had been acquired by the defendants before the adoption of that act. Maxwell v. Grace, 85 Ala. 579, 5 South. Rep. 319; Manning v. Pippen, 86 Ala. 857, 5 South. Rep. 572. G. R. Flowers, the father of R. O. Flowers, testified that plaintiff and R. O. Flowers "went on said place in the year 1882 or 1883, and they stayed on it two or three years." In view of this testimony, it was competent for the defendants to introduce the record of the ejectment suit instituted by the defendants in the year 1885 against R. O. Flowers, and the recovery in that suit, and delivery of possession of the land by the sheriff in consequence of the recovery. It was for the jury to determine, from the conflicting testimony, whether R. O. Flowers was in possession of the land, and the character of his possession, if the proof showed he was in possession, at the time of the institution of the ejectment suit against him.

The facts are not presented in the bill of exceptions as fully and satisfactorily as desired, but we will lay down the material principles of law which appear to bear upon the case. George P. Roberts, from whom both parties claim, purchased the land in controversy at a tax-sale. In August, 1878, the time he executed his bond for title to R. O. Flowers, he had the tax collector's certificate of purchase, but had not received the tax-deed. By quitclaim deed, in August, 1881, he sold and conveyed the same land to the defendant Jernigan; and it was by virtue of the legal title conveyed by this tax-deed Jernigan brought the suit in ejectment in 1885 against R. O. Flowers, and received possession of the land. In August, 1881, when the quitclaim deed was made to Jernigan, the tax-deed had not been executed to any one, and the bond of Roberts to Flowers to make him a quitclaim deed upon the payment of the purchase money had been executed in August, 1878, some three years before the sale to Jernigan. The bond of Roberts to R. O. Flowers, in effect, was an agreement to convey all the equitable interest he then owned in the land, and was effectual to prevent the grantor from subsequently acquiring, any right or interest in the land through or by virtue of the equitable interest acquired by his purchase at the tax-sale, and which he had sold and agreed to convey to R. O. Flowers. It was equally effective against any who might claim under him by descent, or a subsequent purchaser purchasing with notice of his sale to R. O. Flowers. This principle is sustained by the following authorities: Smith's Heirs v. Bank, 21 Ala. 134; Nolen v. Gwyn, 16 Ala. 725; Derrick v. Brown, 66 Ala. 166, 167. There is no controversy as to the fact that R. O. Flowers went into possession in August, 1878, and that he or his grantor, the plaintiff in this suit, remained in possession continuously until dispossessed by the sheriff, in April, 1888.

The evidence also tends to show that R. O. Flowers complied with his agreement as regards the payment of the purchase money, and was entitled to receive a quitclaim deed from Roberts, the common vendor of both claimants. Upon the payment of the purchase money in full, the possession of R. O. Flowers became adverse to that of his vendor; and if fully paid, as the testimony tends to show, before the quitclaim deed to Jernigan was executed, the holding of R. O. Flowers was adverse at the time of its execution. Whatever rights R. O. Flowers had acquired passed to Emma Flowers by his deed of conveyance to her. The assignment of the tax collector's certificate by Roberts to Jernigan conveyed no greater interest than that held by the assignor. R. O. Flowers, or his grantee, being in possession, under his purchase, at the time Jernigan bought the land from Roberts, Jernigan cannot be said to have purchased without notice. Whether the superior equity and possession of R. O. Flowers acquired by his purchase from Roberts is available to plaintiff in a court of law, or whether her remedy is in a court of equity, depends upon the facts which may be introduced on another trial. Bare peaceable possession by an actual occupant under claim of ownership is ordinarily sufficient to authorize a recovery against a mere trespasser who has no claim or color of title. Russell v. Erwin, 38 Ala. 48; Guilmartin v. Wood, 76 Ala. 211; Childress v. Calloway, Id. 134; Wilson v. Glenn, 68 Ala. 386; Anderson v. Melear, 56 Ala. 622; Lucy v. Railroad Co., (Ala.) 8 South. Rep. 806. Whether the proof will show that the suit in ejectment by defendants against R. O. Flowers, and recovery and possession of the land, were, as to Emma Flowers, the plaintiff, res inter alios acta, and the dispossession of her by the sheriff a bare trespass, cannot be anticipated. We cannot say from the evidence that Robert Flowers and plaintiff were man and wife; neither does the evidence disclose the character of the possession of Robert Flowers, if, in fact, he was in possession, in contemplation of law, when the ejectment suit against him was instituted, or during the time "they stayed together two or three years" on the place, as testified to by one of the witnesses. It is settled law in this state that a conveyance of lands in the possession of a third person, adversely held by him under a bona fide claim of ownership, is void as against the adverse holder. Bernstein v. Humes, 60 Ala. 582. The jury must determine from the facts in evidence, under proper instructions, whether there was such adverse holding, at the time of the execution of the conveyance by Roberts to Jernigan, as to render the conveyance void. If the jury find the facts to be that the land was adversely held when Jernigan purchased and acquired the quitclaim deed from Roberts, and further find, under the rule of law we have declared, that the dispossession of Emma Flowers was a bare trespass, he will not be permitted to defeat a recovery by plaintiff by setting up the title acquired by his purchase from Roberts, or by showing an outstanding legal title in Roberts. The property, under such proof, being adversely held when the deed to him was executed, the deed was a nullity as to Mrs. Flowers. The necessary link is wanting by which he can connect himself with that title. On the other hand, if the jury find there was no such adverse holding when Jernigan acquired the legal title through his purchase from the common vendor, Roberts, as to render his deed null and void, then in a court of law his title must prevail, whatever may be the superior equities or rights of plaintiff in another court. Reversed and remanded.

SIDEL v. ELYTON LAND CO.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—PROPERTY PURCHASED WITH WIFE'S MONEY.

Plaintiff's husband conducted the negotiations for the purchase of land. The first payment was made by him with his individual check. The receipt from the vendor stated that the land was sold to plaintiff, and that the money was paid by her. Plaintiff alone signed notes for the deferred payments. The contract of the vendor obligated it to make the title to plaintiff, and recited that the lot was sold to her, and the money paid by her. Plaintiff had nothing to do with the negotiations, nor was she ever in possession of the lot. On the occasion of her marriage, the husband gave her money as a wedding present, which she afterwards redelivered to him for safe-keeping, and which he never returned or accounted for. Held, that this was not sufficient to establish that the money used by the husband to make the first payment was plaintiff's separate estate, and she was therefore not entitled to disaffirm the contract, and recover it back.

Appeal from city court of Birmingham; H. A. SHARPE, Judge.

This was a suit by Jeannie Sidel against the Elyton Land Company for money had and received. There was judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. B. Feagin, for appellant. Alex. T. London, for appellee.

CLOPTON, J. This suit, which is an action for money had and received, brought by the appellant against the appellee, was tried in the city court without a jury, on an agreed statement of facts, and judgment rendered for defendant. The admitted facts may be stated as follows: The husband of plaintiff negotiated with defendant for the purchase of a lot of land near the city of Birmingham, which negotiations terminated in the purchase of the lot for $4,347,—one-fourth cash, and the balance in three equal annual payments. The contract of sale and purchase was consummated August 13, 1887, in the manner following: For the purpose of making the cash payment, the husband of plaintiff drew, in his own name, a check payable to defendant on the Alabama National Bank for the sum of $1,086.75, which was paid by the bank. For the amount of the check defendant executed a receipt, dated August 13, 1887, of which the following is a copy: "Received of Mrs. Jeannie Sidel ten hundred and eighty-six and 75-100 dollars, being on account of purchase of lot one, and west half lot number two, in block 754, in Birmingham, Ala., which was sold to her Aug. 4th, 1887, for $4,347, the balance to be paid, with interest, as follows: Three equal annual payments." Plaintiff signed three several notes for the deferred payments, each reciting that it was given on account of the purchase money of the lot mentioned in the receipt. Plaintiff's husband did not join in the execution of the notes. Defendant made a bond obligating itself to make titles to the plaintiff on payment of the notes. The bond also recites that the cash payment was paid by plaintiff, and the lot bargained and sold to her. Though the bond and notes are dated August 4, 1887, the bond and receipt were delivered to plaintiff's husband, and the notes and check to defendant, at the same time. Plaintiff had nothing to do with negotiating for the purchase of the lot, except to sign the notes after the terms of the contract were agreed on. Plaintiff and her husband went to France, where he died, in December, 1889; and after her return to Birmingham she, through her agent, notified defendant, June 18, 1890, that she renounced and disaffirmed the purchase, and offered to transfer and convey to defendant the bond for title, and all interest she might have in the lot. The bond and receipt were never delivered to plaintiff, but were found among the papers of her husband after his death: neither was she ever in possession, nor assumed any ownership or control, of the lot On the occasion of their marriage, her husband gave to plaintiff $2,500 as a wedding present, which, some days afterwards, she delivered to him to keep for her, and which he has never returned or accounted for, unless his statement to her after the purchase of the lot is admissible in evidence.

The claim of appellant to recover the money is based on the alleged fact that the money used by her husband to make the cash payment was her statutory separate estate; and on the proposition that a married woman has no statutory power to make an executory contract for the purchase of land, except with the assent or concurrence of the husband expressed in writing; and if, independent of the statute, she had capacity to purchase the lot with the assent, or without the dissent, of her husband, she also had capacity to disaffirm the contract after the termination of her coverture, and that her disaffirmance reinvested her with the right to the money. This proposition cannot and does not arise unless plaintiff first shows that the money with which the cash payment was made was her separate estate. The present action is maintainable only on the theory that the money sued for ex æquo et bono belongs to plaintiff, and that defendant, in equity and good conscience, ought not to retain it. The burden is on the plaintiff to show that she is entitled to the money; it is not sufficient to show that defendant has no right to keep it. Hungerford v. Moore, 65 Ala. 232. The admitted facts show that the entire transaction was negotiated by the husband, without the knowledge of plaintiff, so far as appears, until she signed the notes. There being no explanatory evidence, the nature and character of the transaction must be determined from the papers, in connection with the admitted fact that the negotiations were conducted exclusively by the husband. Looking to these, the transaction was, on its face, a purchase of the lot by the husband in the name of plaintiff, and, giving a check for the cash payment in his own name, is prima facie a payment by the husband from his own funds. When a portion of the purchase money is paid by the husband, and title taken in the name of the wife, the presumption arises that it was intended as a provision for the wife. Harden v. Darwin, 66 Ala. 55. This presumption may be rebutted, but the recitals of the receipt and bond, and the notes, in the absence of other evidence, do not, under the circumstances, rebut, but rather support, the presumption. The testimony of plaintiff that her husband told her, after the payment of the money, that the money he had used to make the cash payment was hers, was properly excluded; it was an ex parte declaration when defendant was not present,—mere hearsay. The only other fact on which plaintiff relies to show that the money was her own is the wedding present of $2,500, some time before the lot was purchased. There is no evidence tending to show that this money was ever in Alabama, or what disposition her husband made of it, or how and where he kept it, or that it was deposited as plaintiff's money in the bank, or that her husband had no money of his own on deposit. Actual notice that it was plaintiff's money, against which the check was drawn, is not pretended; and, if it be said that the recitals of the receipt and bond were sufficient to put defendant on inquiry, there is an entire absence of evidence that the utmost diligence would have led to the discovery that it was plaintiff's money. All these facts, if they be facts, lay peculiarly within her knowledge, and yet she fails to give any information in regard to them. Some proof that the money with which the cash payment was made was plaintiff's is an essential element of her right of recovery. It cannot be inferred from the mere facts that her husband gave her, some months previously, $2,500, which she afterwards delivered to him, and for which he has never accounted. The evidence is not of that full and satisfactory character which the law requires in such cases. Affirmed.

CONSOLIDATED ELECTRIC LIGHT CO. v. PEOPLE'S ELECTRIC LIGHT & GAS CO.

INJUNCTION—INTERFERENCE WITH ELECTRIC LIGHT WIRES.

In an injunction suit by one electric light company against another, the bill alleged that defendant was about to erect its wires along the streets and alleys on which complainant's wires were located, and to place them in such close proximity to complainant's wires as to do irreparable injury to complainant, and greatly endanger the lives of its servants. Held, that the answer, which merely denied that danger would ensue "with a reasonably prudent management of complainant's system of wires," was insufficient to authorize a dissolution of the temporary injunction.

Appeal from chancery court, Jefferson county; THOMAS COBLES, Chancellor.

Bill by the Consolidated Electric Light Company against the People's Electric Light & Gas Company to enjoin it from erecting wires along the route of complainant's wires. Decree dissolving the temporary injunction. Complainant appeals. Reversed, and injunction reinstated.

R. H. Pearson and Jas. H. Little, for appellant. Bulger & Heflin, for appellee.

STONE, C. J. This case brings before us a subject which, in some of its bearings, is comparatively new in jurisprudence. It is the utilization of electricity, alike as a mechanical force and as an illuminator. This use being relatively new, and probably not perfected in its adaptations, it behooves us to take our steps cautiously,—very cautiously,—lest our rulings may sanction or encourage conduct which would lead to great destruction of property, if not of life itself; and, while we confess ourselves ignorant of the scientific principles on which this new discovery and use are based, it is common knowledge, in which we must be supposed to share, that very great skill and circumspection must be employed in directing and controlling its application. The world has learned that the electric current, when heavily charged, is so instantaneously destructive of life that it has, in some places, displaced the guillotine and the halter in the execution of criminals. All men know that when it is sufficiently intensified to subserve the purpose of illumination, or the propulsion of machinery, to come in touch with its charged apparatus is inevitable destruction. The authorization and supervision of the apparatus necessary to each of the enterprises brought to view in the record before us are certainly matters which pertain to the municipal government of the city of Birmingham. The privilege or franchise of each company to construct its plant and works within the city must have been first obtained, for no prudent company or corporation would enter upon so expensive an enterprise without such authority; and the authority of the city government in the premises would not terminate with the grant of the franchise. It doubtless could and would assert its power to prevent any and all abuse of the privilege. Vested rights, properly so called, are respected in judicial administration; but no one, under ordinary circumstances, can assert and maintain a vested right to the exclusive enjoyment of a public street. Monopolies are not favorites of the law, and if a street have sufficient width and capacity to admit of more than one public enterprise, without unduly obstructing it as a public highway, an exclusive right should not be granted to one company; and if granted, except under peculiar circumstances, it may and should be revoked. In the case before us it is averred, and not denied, that the Consolidated Electric Light Company—complainant below and appellant here—first established its plant, and first occupied certain streets with its poles and wires. The attempt of the defendant company to establish its service along the same streets gave rise to this suit. It is certainly true that the company which, with authority, first occupies a reasonably sufficient space for its works along a street border thereby acquires the right not to be molested in its possession. It cannot, however, claim more space than is reasonably sufficient for the safe and successful operation of its works. Nebraska Tel. Co. v. York Gas & Electric Light Co., (Neb.) 43 N. W. Rep. 126; Grand Rapids, E. L. & P. Co. v. Grand Rapids, E., E. L. & F. G. Co., 33 Fed. Rep. 659. It is averred in the bill that the defendant company "is now erecting poles along the streets and alleys named in paragraph fourth, [those in which complainant was maintaining poles and wires,] which extend into the space occupied by orator's wires and conductors, and between said wires and conductors; and that it is now preparing to place, and will immediately place, its wires and conductors, unless restrained therefrom by your honor, which are to be used in a business similar to your orator's, and to be charged with electrical currents the same as orator's, on the top of said poles, in and among orator's wires, and within orator's right of way, as hereinbefore described, in such manner as will continually interfere with orator's business, and cause orator irreparable injury, and burn out orator's electrical apparatus, and so deteriorate orator's light and power service, and so prevent orator from supplying its customers and lighting the streets of said city, as to become a public nuisance, and will destroy orator's business; and that it will, if permitted by your honor, greatly endanger the lives of orator's servants, and cause such constant and irreparable injury to your orator that it ought not to be permitted." The answer of the defendant does not deny the acts and intentions done and entertained by it, as charged in the foregoing extract, but denies the danger that would ensue, "with a reasonably prudent management of complainant's system of wires." Its exact language is: "Respondents deny that the character of electrical currents is such that another wire, or system of wires, placed in closer proximity, would give more frequent contact with orator's wire, and irreparably injure them by deteriorating orator's light and power service, or that it would destroy complainant's business, but aver that, with a reasonably prudent management of complainant's system of wires in said city, another system of wires might be operated along all of the said alleys, streets, and avenues in said city, with the greatest security to both complainant and respondent. * * * Further answering said section, respondents say that by the erection of respondents' system, and the observance of care on the part of complainant in the tightening of their wires, and the management of their business, with a view of serving their business, rather than obstructing respondent's business, the danger to their employes [would] be greatly reduced, rather than increased, by respondent's system they are now proposing to erect, and there would be no difficulty for the servants of complainant to observe the wires, and to avoid contact therewith."

We think applied electricity has been long enough employed, and its uses and dangers sufficiently ascertained, to authorize the statement of certain propositions as falling within the purview of common knowledge. Among them, may we not state the following? (1) Contact with electrical conductors, sufficiently charged to subserve the purposes of city illumination, destroys animal life. (2) To properly regulate the apparatus for distributing electric light requires that the employes or servants shall ascend the poles and go among the wires. (3) Two sets of wires, occupying the same space, and charged from different dynamos, located apart, and controlled by separate and independent engineers, could not fail to be dangerous in many ways. We cite the following authorities, which shed light on the questions we have been discussing: Thomp. Electr. §§ 43, 92, 93; Teachout v. Railroad Co., (Iowa,) 38 N. W. Rep. 145; Gas-Light Co. v. Hart, (La.) 4 South. Rep. 215; Nebraska Tel. Co. v. York Gas & Electric Light Co., (Neb.) 43 N. W. Rep. 126.

We do not think the specific allegations in complainant's bill, setting forth interference, actual and threatened, with its previously established rights, have been sufficiently answered and negatived by the defendant. Giving to the answer a fair interpretation, and not taking its affirmative allegations into account, we think very great danger and loss would likely ensue to complainant's employes and its property if defendant be allowed to proceed with its work as projected. We therefore hold that the chancellor erred in dissolving the injunction on the denials in the answer.

We do not feel authorized to presume the city did or would grant to one company the right to occupy all the available space of its streets, unless such monopoly is shown to have been a necessary condition of obtaining the service. We will not discuss this question in detail at this time. Monopolies, as we have said, are not favored, and are never sanctioned, unless a necessity for their tolerance is shown, or unless that necessity springs out of the very circumstances of the case or the transaction. Many affirmative averments are set up in the answer which, if true, call loudly for redress. It is charged that complainant is claiming and occupying much more space than is necessary for the amount of service it renders. This is accomplished, it is charged, in various ways. By sometimes occupying both sides of streets; by crossing streets from side to side; by maintaining dead wires, etc. All this is done, it is charged, to maintain its monopoly and to keep down competition. If these charges are true, they show great public wrongs, which call loudly for municipal interference and correction. They would not authorize a rival company to attempt their redress by measures which would probably lead to a destruction of property and of life itself. The conservation of public security is of infinitely more importance than the success of either of the contending enterprises. As we have said, we think the denials in the answer are not sufficient to authorize the dissolution of the injunction. The decretal order of the chancellor is reversed, and the injunction reinstated. Reversed and remanded.

STATE v. WARD. (No. 11,056.)

Appeal from district court, parish of East Baton Rouge; GEORGE W. BUCKNER, Judge.

Prosecution against William Ward. From a judgment on conviction, he appeals. Affirmed.

Walter H. Rogers, Atty. Gen., for the State.

FENNER, J. The record presents no bill of exceptions or assignment of errors, and a careful scanning of the proceedings discloses no error. The defendant, unrepresented by counsel, has addressed a letter to the clerk of the court full of protestations of innocence and of complaints of the proceedings. We have read it, but it discloses no matters within the cognizance of this tribunal under the record as presented. Judgment affirmed.

(94 Ala. 352)

THORNTON v. HIGHLAND AVE. & B. R. CO.

RECEIVERS—POWER TO INCUR DEBTS—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS—APPEAL.

1. A receiver who by the decree appointing him is authorized to "run an hotel," and "for that purpose to make such purchases as may be necessary," has power to purchase on credit.

2. A bill was filed to recover rent due on certain property; and a receiver was appointed, who managed the property until, with the consent of all the parties to the action, a decree of the court restored the property to the possession of complainant. Thereafter, but during the pendency of the action, and before the discharge of the receiver, a petition was filed in the suit, alleging a debt contracted by the receiver in the management of the property, and praying that complainant might be required to pay the amount due petitioner, or, on failure to pay within a time to be appointed, that the property be sold for the debt. Held, that the court erred in dismissing the petition, as at that time it was the proper and only forum to give petitioner the relief he was entitled to receive.

3. In such case an appeal will lie from the decree dismissing the petition, as the petitioner is a principal to a side issue growing out of the main case.

4. In such case the appeal may be taken from the decree at the time it is rendered, without awaiting the action of the court on the matters involved in the main case.

Appeal from chancery court, Jefferson county; THOMAS COBBS, Chancellor.

The Highland Avenue & Belt Railroad Company filed a bill in chancery to enforce the collection of a debt due for rent of an hotel; and a receiver was appointed, who managed the hotel until, with consent of all the parties to the action, a decree of the court restored the possession of the hotel to complainant. Thereafter, but during the pendency of the action, and before the discharge of the receiver, T. F. Thornton filed a petition in the case, alleging a debt contracted by the receiver in the management of the hotel, and praying that complainant might be required to pay the amount due petitioner, or that the hotel be sold to pay the debt on failure of complainant to do so. The demurrer of complainant to the petition was sustained, and the petition was dismissed by decree of the court. Petitioner appeals. Reversed.

Cabaniss & Weakley, for appellant. Alex T. London, for appellee.

COLEMAN, J. On the 26th day of July, 1890, the Highland Avenue & Belt Railroad Company filed its bill in the chancery court against M. Clifford to enforce the collection of a debt due for the rent of the Lake View Hotel. With other relief, the bill prayed for "a temporary injunction to restrain the said Clifford from removing any part of said personal property," and "for a receiver to take charge of the hotel property therein," etc. The court granted the temporary injunction and appointed the receiver, as prayed for in the bill, and directed M. Clifford to surrender to the said receiver the Lake View Hotel, with the personal property. The decree proceeds as follows: "And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said receiver, until the further order of this court, is authorized to conduct and run the hotel; and for that purpose the receiver is authorized to make such purchases as may be necessary." The receiver took possession of the property under his appointment, and undertook "to conduct and run the hotel" as authorized in the decree. Having no money or cash on hand, and no provision made by the court for raising money, the receiver purchased the necessary supplies for the hotel on a credit. The debt of petitioner, Thornton, was contracted by the receiver for groceries supplied to the hotel. The petition shows that after the debt due him was contracted, by an order of the court made December, 1890, "by consent of the said parties to the cause, the possession of said hotel and other property was restored to the complainant," and "that, since the restoration of the property to the complainant, said Merrill, [who was the receiver] has remained in possession and operated the hotel as the agent of the complainant." The Highland Avenue & Belt Railroad Company interposed a demurrer to the petition. The court sustained the demurrer, and, petitioner declining to amend, his petition was dismissed out of court. From this decree dismissing the petition the present appeal is prosecuted.

The cause was submitted to this court by appellant upon the decree dismissing the petition, and, if an appeal does not lie, in the alternative, for the writ of mandamus, as a counter-motion to the motion of appellee to dismiss the appeal. This practice has been recognized for a long time in this court. Tabor v. Lorance, 53 Ala. 543. It is not denied that the decree of the court dismissing the petition ordinarily is such a final decree, as to the petition, as will support an appeal; but it is contended that petitioner, Thornton, is not a party to the litigation between the original parties, has no right to make himself a party, and consequently cannot appeal. The principles of law declared in the cases of Ex parte Printup, 87 Ala. 148, 6 South. Rep. 418, and Renfro v. Goetter, 78 Ala. 313, cited in brief and argument and opinion of the chancellor, are not applicable to the question at bar. The petitioner in the present case does not seek to be let in to prosecute or defend as plaintiff or defendant in the original case. He is not interested whether plaintiff or defendant succeeds, in the matter litigated, and the determination of their respective rights in no way can affect his standing in court or his right to relief. Receivers are appointed to hold and preserve the property until it is finally determined by the court who is entitled to it, or its proceeds if sold. Until then it is in the custody of the law, and the receiver holds it as an officer of the law. Expenses more or less necessarily result from its conservation. To prevent irreparable damage and loss, sometimes it is necessary to make provision, in cases of a going business, that the business be continued. Such seems to have been the view taken by the court in the present case. Whether correct or not in this instance, we will not consider. The parties interested acquiesced in the order, and do not complain. Contracts made with a receiver in his official character, within the scope of his duties and the limits of his authority, are not binding on him personally. If such was the case, no one would accept the responsible office of a receiver. The party contracting with the receiver looks to the res, the fund or property in gremio legis, backed by a pledge of the court that it shall be liable for all costs and expenses legitimately incurred in pursuance of its orders and decrees. Kerr v. Little, 39 N. J. Eq. 83. Any one who attempts to interfere or sue a receiver without leave, in a matter pertaining to his official duties, will be regarded as in contempt of court, and may be punished accordingly. If there is an income from the property, the current expenses should be first paid out of this; but, this failing, there is no doubt but that the corpus may be applied to such necessary expenses. Beckwith v. Carroll, 56 Ala. 12; Meyer v. Johnston, 53 Ala. 237; Union Trust Co. v. Illinois M. Ry. Co., 117 U. S. 437, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 809. Any one contracting with a receiver is charged with notice of the duties required of him, and the extent of his authority. It becomes necessary, therefore, to ascertain whether petitioner's debt was contracted within the scope of the duties and authority of the receiver. The court made no order by which the receiver was entitled to raise money to "conduct and run the hotel." By the decree appointing him, he was authorized to run the hotel, "and for this purpose the receiver is authorized to make such purchases as may be necessary." The petition avers that the receiver, as such, had no money with which to make cash purchases, and the purchase of the groceries was necessary in order to conduct and run the hotel. When the order was made the court knew its own officer had no money, and it made no provision for raising any. How was the receiver to perform his duty unless he purchased on a credit? We are of opinion that the order gave the power and the discretion to the receiver to make purchases, if necessary, upon a credit. If the averments of the petition that the purchase of the groceries were necessary under the order of the court to "conduct and run the hotel," as directed, are true, and the sale of the goods was made to the receiver in his official character, it is a proper charge upon the income first, and, if there was no income, then upon the corpus of the property. Under such conditions the court should never surrender its custody of the property or discharge the receiver until all claims incurred by the receiver in the proper discharge of its duties have been adjusted and provided for. When the petition was filed and heard, and dismissed by the decree of the court, the original cause was still pending, and the receiver had not been discharged. The order of the court, made in pursuance of an agreement between the original parties, as averred in the petition, by which the property was placed in the hands of the complainant, did not deprive the court of authority to resume possession and control of it for the purpose of enforcing all claims to or liens upon it, the result of its own orders or decrees. That court at that time was the proper and only forum to give petitioner such relief as he may have been entitled to receive. We are of opinion the court erred in dismissing the petition. Whether the charges for the groceries were reasonable, and whether necessary, as averred, was a matter for proof, to be taken under the direction of the court. It was within the province of the court, and proper practice, to have referred these questions to the register for examination and report; and all parties in interest should have had due notice of the time and place of executing such reference.

An attorney has a lien upon the funds in court, held for distribution or payment to the proper party, secured by his professional services, which may be enforced by petition in the court. If the court refuses to enforce the lien in a case where it exists, the action of the court will be reviewed on appeal by this court. Weaver v. Cooper, 73 Ala. 320. The judgment of the court upon a petition to set aside a sale of land, sold under execution or decree of court, may be reviewed on appeal. Allen v. Allen, 80 Ala. 154. When a writ of possession is directed by the chancellor to issue against the person in possession, an appeal by a party improperly dispossessed against the purchaser is the proper remedy. Creighton v. Bank, 3 Ala. 156. An appeal lies in favor of a receiver from the decree of the court confirming the report of the register allowing to him compensation. Magee v. Cowperthwaite, 10 Ala. 967. The correctness of this ruling was fully recognized in the later case of State v. Railroad Co., 54 Ala. 140. It has been held often that an appeal will lie after final decree from any decree rendered for or against a receiver on the settlement of his accounts, although he is not a party to the original suit. Hovey v. McDonald, 109 U. S. 155, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 136; Hinckley v. Gilman, 94 U. S. 468; Farmers' L. & T. Co. v. Central R. R. of Iowa, 7 Fed. Rep. 539. It cannot be doubted that the petition was filed in the proper court, and that the court had jurisdiction to hear and determine the questions involved. If the court had improperly granted relief, those injuriously affected were not without redress by appeal. In such case the proper remedy would be by appeal. We cannot see why an appeal would lie against petitioner and not in his favor, if the court erroneously ruled to his prejudice. It is one of those side issues growing out of the main case to which the petitioner is a principal party, and in which it has been repeatedly held in other courts that an appeal will lie. The cases cited from 109 U. S., 3 Sup. Ct. Rep., and 94 U. S., supra, and Kerr v. Little, 39 N. J. Eq., are directly in point. In the case of Dorsey v. Sibert, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 288, the receiver appealed in a matter in which he had no interest, and from a decree from which he had no right to appeal. The court there says, in regard to the merits of the question: "We can consider it only when it shall arise on appeal by some party to the suit who complains that it is injurious to him." Conceding the facts of the petition to be true, the court erred in dismissing the petition. We are of opinion that an appeal may be taken in such cases, from the decree, at the time it is rendered, and that the parties are not required to await the final action of the court upon the matters originally involved in the litigation. In some cases, as where the litigation extends over a great many years, and continued from term to term, perhaps, by consent of parties, or for causes in regard to which a petitioner would not be heard, to hold that an appeal could not be prosecuted until the final determination of the main case would amount to a denial of justice without delay. The parties to the original cause were before the court when the petition was filed. It was not necessary to formally make them parties to the petition. It was the duty of the court, under the rules of practice, to make no order or decree affecting their interest in the property, without seeing that they had notice. They had the right to demur or plead to the petition, and exercised this right. The register was bound to give notice to the parties interested in the matter of the petition of the time and place of executing any reference referred to him. The decree dismissing the original bill concludes all questions as to the parties to the original bill. The effect of the reversal is simply to open the cause to hear and adjudicate the rights of the petitioner as to the matter therein contained. The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied. Reversed and remanded.

MAXWELL v. MOORE.

CHATTEL MORTGAGES—DISCHARGE OF LIEN—TENDER AFTER DEFAULT.

A tender of full payment of a chattel mortgage debt after a default, but before the mortgagee has taken or demanded possession in order to foreclose, if kept good, and if the money be brought into court, discharges the lien of the mortgage, and extinguishes the mortgagee's title.

Appeal from circuit court, Tuscaloosa county; S. H. SPRATT, Judge.

Detinue by B. S. P. Moore against J. R. Maxwell to recover possession of a mule. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wood & Mayfield, for appellant. Fitts & Somerville, for appellee.

CLOPTON, J. The principal question involved in the special pleas, replications, and demurrers to the replications is whether a tender of the amount due on a mortgage of personal property after condition broken operates, when kept good, to discharge the lien of the mortgage, and revest the title in the mortgagor, so that he may maintain an action of detinue against the mortgagee, who has taken possession after tender made, sold the property under the mortgage, and purchased at the sale. The contention of appellants is that, as mortgages are governed in this state by the principles of the common law, a tender cannot effectually extinguish the lien unless made at the time of payment fixed by the contract of the parties,—an offer of strict performance of the condition. In those states where mortgages are rendered as a mere lien or security for a debt, and the title as remaining in the mortgagor until divested by foreclosure, the rule generally adopted is that a tender at any time during the continuance of the right of redemption is the equivalent of payment as to things incidental and accessorial to the debt, and extinguishes the lien of the mortgage, though the tender is not kept good. Kortright v. Cady, 21 N. Y. 373, though not the first, may be regarded as the leading, case holding this view. A qualified and more conservative rule is adopted in those states where a mortgage is considered as immediately transferring the legal title to the mortgagee, subject to be defeated by the payment of the debt at the time and in the manner specified in the mortgage. In a few the courts hold that an accepted tender after default will not, at law, reinvest the mortgagor with the title, and that his only remedy is in equity to redeem; but in the others the common-law rule, that after condition broken the title vests absolutely in the mortgagee, has not been applied so strictly, where the mortgage is of personal property, as to hold that a tender after default, when kept good, cannot under any circumstances operate the destruction of the lien. There are dicta in some of our early cases, and probably the weight of authority is, that a tender after default, in order to effect the extinguishment of the title of the mortgagee, must be made before he has rightfully and peaceably taken possession for the purposes of foreclosure. This question, however, has never been decided in this state, though directly presented in Frank v. Pickens, 69 Ala. 369; the disposition of that case not calling for its decision. It is not presented in this case; the replications averring that the tender was made before the mortgagees acquired possession. We shall, therefore, leave it, as it has heretofore been, undecided.

It may be conceded that by the strict rule of the common law a tender after failure to perform the condition of the mortgage will not, at law, destroy the title, which has become absolute in the mortgagee by the forfeiture. In equity, however, a mortgage being regarded as incident to and security for the debt, the rigor and harshness of the common-law rule has been greatly relieved by holding that the mortgagor has the right to redeem, if not barred by unreasonable delay, by payment or tendering full payment at any time before foreclosure. But courts of equity will not enforce the equity of redemption so as to deprive the mortgagee of his security by discharging the lien of the mortgage. Its enforcement is dependent upon payment of the debt by the mortgagor, or by a sale of the property. In many of the states, courts of law, while not taking cognizance of the equity of redemption for the purpose of enforcing the right to redeem, but acting upon and applying the equitable principles, have extended to a tender after default the effect of a tender made at the time and in the manner specified in the mortgage, modified so as to prevent the mortgagee's deprivation of his security without satisfaction of a debt. In Frank v. Pickens, supra, it was expressly held that a tender of payment of the mortgage debt cannot operate to extinguish the title of the mortgagee unless the money tendered is kept ready to be paid to the mortgagee whenever he may manifest a willingness to receive it; and if the benefit of the tender is claimed in court the money must be placed in the custody of the court, so that, if the tender be adjudged good, it may be awarded to the mortgagee,—otherwise the mortgagor is regarded as having abandoned the tender. Recognizing the mortgagor's right of redemption, and observing the principles on which courts of equity enforce it, the current of the later decisions is that an unconditional tender, after default, of the full amount due on the mortgage, if kept good, and the money brought into court, discharges the lien of the mortgage. We cite a few of the cases: Crain v. McGoon, 86 Ill. 431; Knox v. Williams, 24 Neb. 636, 39 N. W. Rep. 786; Matthews v. Lindsay, 20 Fla. 962; Musgat v. Pumpelly, 46 Wis. 660, 1 N. W. Rep. 410; Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 635.

The effect of a plea of tender accompanied by bringing the money into court came incidentally before this court in the case of Foster v. Napier, 74 Ala. 393. In that case, the suit was founded on a bond executed by Foster in the institution of a statutory action for the recovery of mules and a wagon. The record of the proceedings, pleadings, and judgment in the action of detinue brought by Foster against Napier was read in evidence. In the action of detinue Foster claimed the property under two mortgages executed by Napier. A special plea was filed by Napier, averring payment of the mortgages, except $175, which the plea alleged had been tendered to the mortgagee before action brought; and the money was brought into court. It is said: "The issues being thus formed, if the defendant proved the truth of his second plea, he was entitled to a verdict, but the money tendered would become the property of the plaintiff. In such case the issue is confined to the question of the debt, or its payment, for which the mortgage was given as security. * * *" The defense set up in that suit, and the verdict and judgment thereon, taking into the account the pleadings and charge of the court on the trial, settled conclusively that Napier did not, at the commencement of that suit, owe Foster exceeding $175 on the debts secured by the mortgages, and that before suit was brought he had tendered that sum, and had it in court for Foster. The principle of the decision is that a tender before suit brought by the mortgagee to recover possession, when the money is brought into court and the truth of the plea of tender is established, is tantamount to and has the same effect as actual payment in extinguishment of the lien and title of the mortgagee. In fact, it was treated as a payment.

Section 1870 of the Code declares: "The payment of a mortgage debt, whether the mortgage is of real or personal property, divests the title passing by the mortgage." Under section 2685 a plea of tender of money must be accompanied by a delivery of the money to the clerk of the court. If the money is deposited in court, and the truth of the plea established, the effect is to stop the running of interest from the time of tender. The money becomes the property of plaintiff, by relation, as of the time when the tender was made. That such is the intention and effect of the statute is manifest from the further provision, that if the tender be of personal property the plea must aver readiness to deliver it to the plaintiff, and judgment for the defendant upon the plea vests the title to the thing tendered in the plaintiff, subject to any claim the defendant may have for his trouble in keeping it. A tender so made, and kept good, and the money brought into court, so as to be the equivalent of payment, if the tender be adjudged sufficient, comes within the spirit, equity, and policy of section 1870. On the foregoing principles, and in line with the current of the decisions in those states where mortgages are governed by the principles of the common law, we adopt as a safe and wholesome rule—conserving the ends of justice, protecting the mortgagor against oppression or undue advantage, and preventing injustice to the mortgagee—that a tender of full payment of the mortgage debt after default, and before the mortgagee has taken or demanded possession for the purposes of foreclosure, if kept good and the money brought into court, operates to discharge the lien of the mortgage and extinguish the title of the mortgagee.

True, only the first replication avers that the money is brought into court, but the omission of this averment in the others is not assigned as a ground of demurrer. While we have left undecided whether a tender after the mortgagee has taken or demanded possession will be effectual to discharge the lien of the mortgage, we hold that possession acquired after the tender is made does not affect its operation. The replications not being obnoxious to any of the objections assigned as grounds of demurrer, the demurrers were properly overruled. Affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Mississippi. Jan. 11, 1892.)

USE AND OCCUPATION—INSTRUCTIONS—AMENDMENT OF PLEADINGS.

1. In an action for use and occupation of land, the answer admitted use and occupation, and set up an outstanding term in W., to which plaintiff replied that W. had, previous to the period of occupation, sued for, surrendered, and abandoned his lease. Held, that it was error to instruct the jury that plaintiff could recover under a state of facts which failed to show that W. had surrendered and abandoned his lease, such surrender and abandonment being the single issue joined.

2. Where the original complaint states a single cause of action against two defendants, the court may allow an amended complaint which dismisses as to one defendant, and such amended pleading does not constitute a new cause of action, under Rev. Code, § 1581, allowing the court to authorize the amendment of pleadings so as to bring the merits of the controversy fairly to trial.

Appeal from circuit court, Lauderdale county; S. H. TERRAL, Judge.

Action by the City Compress Company against J. S. Solomon. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Fewell & Brahan and Hamm, Witherspoon & Witherspoon, for appellant. A. J. McLaurin and Miller & Baskin, for appellee.

COOPER, J. The appellee commenced this suit against appellant and one Fred Wolfe to recover certain rents reserved in a lease from L. A. Ragsdale to Wolfe of date August 5, 1881, for a term of 10 years. The declaration consists of a single count, by which it was averred that Ragsdale leased certain lands to Wolfe by writing for the term of 10 years; that the plaintiff had become the assignee of the reversion, and of the rent due under the lease; and that Solomon was assignee under Wolfe of the undivided one-half interest in the term, whereby the defendants were liable to the plaintiff for the rent then due, for which judgment was demanded. Pleas were interposed by Solomon, the substance of which it is unnecessary to state, for, after interposing demurrers to them, the plaintiff abandoned its original declaration, and filed an amended one. To the amended declaration the defendant, Solomon, demurred, and the demurrer was sustained, and leave given plaintiff to file an amended declaration. Under this leave the plaintiff filed a declaration containing three counts against Solomon alone. Each count sought to recover from this defendant rent accrued from August 15, 1888, to November 30, 1889, for the property known as the "City Compress Company," the same being the rent sought to be recovered by the original and first amended declaration from Wolfe and Solomon. By the first count the plaintiff, as assignee of the reversion and rent, sought to charge the defendant as assignee of the term. The second count was for use and occupation of the premises by Solomon. The third count, after stating in effect the contents of the first, gave a somewhat detailed statement of the following circumstances relied upon as establishing an estoppel against the defendant to deny that he was the assignee of the term secured to Wolfe by the lease from Ragsdale. In this count this history of the transactions between the plaintiff or some of its members and the defendant Solomon is given: Some years after the execution of a lease from Ragsdale to Wolfe, of the City Compress, Ragsdale died, devising said compress property, and a large quantity of other real estate, to his son, L. A. Ragsdale, Jr. Solomon, with six other persons, had entered into contract with L. A. Ragsdale, Jr., for the purchase of the compress and other lands, agreeing to pay therefor the sum of $256,000, of which sum they had paid $9,000, and had bound themselves for the payment of the remainder. Solomon and his associates became alarmed by the magnitude of their engagement, and feared it would result disastrously, because of their inability to meet the deferred payments as they matured, and were desirous of procuring other persons of financial ability to join them in the purchase. To accomplish this purpose, Solomon approached Robinson and Lyerly, and proposed that they, with Broach, or Barbee and Watkins, should join in the purchase of the whole property from Ragsdale; and, as an inducement to them to do so, he stated that the other purchasers would sell to these gentlemen, or to a corporation to be formed by them, the compress property, at and for the sum of $50,000, and transfer to them the rents from August 15, 1888, and that he (Solomon) was the assignee of the term of Wolfe, and as such would pay the rents from said date, without any set-off or recoupment against the same. In accordance with this understanding, and relying upon the representations and promises of Solomon, these gentlemen joined in the agreement for the purchase of the property from Ragsdale, and bound themselves with those who had originally purchased said property for the payment of the purchase price. That afterwards they formed the plaintiff corporation, to which the compress property and the rights to the rents from August 15, 1888, were conveyed, and that Solomon had failed and refused to pay the rents from August 15, 1888, as he had agreed to do. There was a demurrer to the declaration, which was overruled, and three pleas and demurrers thereto, some of which were overruled and some sustained, and replications and demurrers thereto, some of which were also overruled and some sustained. The final result of the pleading was that the general issue to all the counts, with notice thereunder of the special matter attempted to be set up in several of the pleas, remained. To the second count there was a plea that the plaintiff was not owner of the demised premises, because of an outstanding term in Wolfe, and to this plea a replication that Wolfe had surrendered and abandoned his term, to which replication there was a traverse. To the third count there was a special plea denying that the defendant was the assignee of the term of Wolfe, or had so represented to the plaintiff, or to Robinson, Lyerly, or others, or had made any promise to pay to them or the plaintiff the rents for the compress property. Before referring to the instructions on which the cause was submitted to the jury, we will dispose of the errors assigned to the action of the court in permitting the plaintiff to amend its declaration, and to its rulings in making up the issues upon which the trial proceeded.

The first error assigned is that the court permitted the plaintiff to so amend the declaration as to set forth a new and different cause of action than that counted on in its original declaration; that in the original the rent sought was demanded of Wolfe and Solomon, while in the amended declaration Solomon alone is sought to be charged. In Miller v. Bank, 34 Miss. 412, (which is relied on by appellant in support of this assignment of error,) there was a declaration against two defendants, on a cause of action joint as to them. The suit was dismissed as to one of the defendants, but the declaration was not amended. After the evidence had been introduced and demurred to by the defendant, the plaintiff was permitted to add other counts as against the defendant severally, and the court then proceeded to hear and determine the demurrer which had been introduced under the original count. This was held to be error, but the judgment was reversed, and cause remanded, with leave to both parties to amend their pleadings; the court stating that the proper course to have been pursued would have been for the court to have discharged the demurrer, and directed the defendant to plead to the new counts. We find nothing in this decision denying to the plaintiff, who is proceeding to recover on a distinct and single cause of action, to so amend his pleadings, by dismissing, as to one defendant or otherwise, as to bring "the merits of the controversy between the parties fairly to trial."[1] The real controversy between the parties has been greatly obscured and confused by the course of pleading pursued. It would be unprofitable to examine in detail the wilderness of pleas and demurrers and replications appearing in the record. It is sufficient to say that, as to the first count and the pleadings thereunder, they are eliminated by the instructions of the court to the jury, which were, in effect, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover by reason of anything contained therein. The same observation may be made in reference to the third count, except that the jury were permitted to find for the plaintiff thereunder, if from the evidence it believed the defendant made the representations and promises therein relied upon as constituting an estoppel against the defendant to deny that he was the assignee of the term of the lessee, Wolfe. Upon these two counts, the first and third, we think the defendant by the pleadings secured all the issues it was entitled to. We fail to perceive what application the statute of frauds, set up in the sixth, seventh, and eighth pleas, has to the controversy.

Recurring to the second count, and the issue made thereunder, we find the substance to be as follows: By the count the plaintiff says it was the owner of the premises which were occupied by the defendant by its consent from August 15, 1888, to November 30, 1889; wherefore the plaintiff is entitled to recover for the use and occupation. The defendant pleaded, confessing the use and occupation, but setting up an outstanding term in Wolfe for the time rent was demanded; and to this the plaintiff replied that at and before the 15th of August, 1888, Wolfe had surrendered and abandoned his term. The single issue, concisely and clearly joined under this count, was whether there had been a surrender and abandonment by Wolfe as pleaded. On the trial of the cause the plaintiff, by the instructions of the court, was permitted to free its controversy from the trammels of the issue it had accepted on this count. By the first instruction for the plaintiff the jury was told that the plaintiff was entitled to recover for use and occupation if the evidence proved "that Solomon, with a view to inducing Lyerly, Robinson, and Watkins to join the land syndicate and buy the compress, represented to them, in substance, that he had bought out the interest of Wolfe in the compress,

[1] Rev. Code, § 1581: "The court shall have full power and authority to allow all amendments to be made in any pleading or proceeding, at any time before verdict, so as to bring the merits of the controversy between the parties fairly to trial, and may allow all errors and mistakes in the name of any party, or in the form of the action to be corrected. * * *" and that he had no offsets that he would claim against them for rents after the 15th day of August, 1888; and that, if they purchased the compress, the rents would be coming to them after the 15th day of August, 1888, and promised to pay the rent from that date; and if the jury further believe from the evidence that upon these representations Lyerly, Robinson, and Watkins purchased the compress, and had the right to say who should be admitted into a compress company afterwards to be organized, and did afterwards organize, with such parties as they chose to admit, the compress company which is plaintiff in this suit,—then Solomon is liable for the use and occupation of the property, provided they believe from the evidence that Solomon occupied and used the compress, and enjoyed the same, for the time sued for." The instruction is a clear and total departure from the issue tendered by the plaintiff and accepted by the defendant. By that issue the plaintiff conceded the non-liability of the defendant under the second count of the declaration, unless Wolfe had surrendered and abandoned his lease. If that should be proved, the defendant, by his pleading, admitted liability under that count. But the court, at the plaintiff's instance, told the jury that a totally different and distinct state of facts would entitle the plaintiff to recover. This was erroneous. Parties must recover upon the issues upon which the trial proceeds or not at all. The orderly administration of justice would be subverted, if those which have been established as essential to judicial proceedings are ignored or their limitations disregarded. The parties to legal proceedings must know the facts they intend to establish, and their legal effect when proved. Facts and law may be confessed by the pleadings, and by confessions so made litigants must be bound to the extent, at least, of the controversy in which they are made. Without passing upon any other of the very numerous errors assigned, the judgment, for the error above noted, must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

CANTON COTTON WAREHOUSE CO. v. POTTS.

ABATEMENT OF NUISANCE—OBSTRUCTING HIGHWAY—EQUITY.

1. Where the only means of access for the occupants of plaintiff's lodging-house was through a public street on which such lodging was located, or across plaintiff's lot, and defendant unlawfully closed the street by erecting buildings thereon, plaintiff has sustained such peculiar injury as entitles her to maintain a private suit.

2. The remedy of complainant being incomplete at law, equity has jurisdiction of the suit.

Appeal from chancery court, Madison county; H. C. CONN, Chancellor.

Action by Rosanna Potts against the Canton Cotton Warehouse Company to abate a nuisance. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Robert Powell and W. H. Powell, for appellant. E. E. Baldwin, for appellee.

COOPER, J. The appellee is the owner of a lot in the town of Canton situated in a square bounded on the east by the Illinois Central Railway, on the south by Peace street, and on the north by Franklin street. Her lot extends through the square from Peace to Franklin streets. Her residence fronts on Peace street; and in it she conducted the business of keeping boarders, who were servants of the adjacent railway, and resorted to her house because of its nearness to their place of business. On that part of the lot fronting on Franklin street, she has a cottage, the furnished rooms of which she rented to her boarders and others. The defendant owned the lot east of the lot of the plaintiff in the same square, and also a lot north of Franklin street, and north of the lot lying in the same square with the lot of complainant. The defendant, for the prosecution of its business, has erected certain buildings on its property, and also upon that portion of Franklin street by which its lots are separated, closing up the eastern end of Franklin street, which is the point towards the railroad and the business portion of the town. Complainant's lot, fronting on Franklin street, is thus placed in a cul-de-sac, closed at the end, through which those who patronized her furnished rooms were accustomed to approach them. The purpose of her bill is to compel the defendant to remove the obstructions from Franklin street, and for damages sustained by her by reason of their existence. The relief prayed is challenged by demurrer on the following grounds: First, that the obstructions complained of are, if a nuisance at all, a public nuisance, and that complainant has sustained no special injury authorising her to maintain any action; second, that she cannot maintain a bill for injunction until she shall have recovered in an action at law; third, that she has an ample and complete remedy at law for all injury she has sustained. The court below overruled the demurrer, and from that decree the defendant appeals.

Though the obstruction of the street by the defendant may be a public nuisance, and liable to abatement as such, the complainant has sustained such injury, peculiar to herself, as to warrant a private suit. Benjamin v. Storr, L. R. 9 C. P. 400; Soltau v. De Held, 9 Eng. Law & Eq. 104; Corning v. Lowerre, 6 Johns. Ch. 439; Frink v. Lawrence, 20 Conn. 117; Conrad v. Smith, 32 Mich. 429; Pratt v. Lewis, 39 Mich. 7.

The right of the complainant is clear, and its infraction manifest. The injury is of such nature that the remedy by action at law is incomplete, and under such circumstances the jurisdiction of equity is undoubted, without regard to whether there has or has not been a recovery at law. Learned v. Hunt, 63 Miss. 373. The decree is affirmed.

SANFORD v. STARLING & SMITH CO.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS — ILLEGAL SALES — ACTION FOR PRICE.

Rev. Code 1880, § 1108, making non-collectible any debt for liquors sold in less quantities than one gallon, and declaring void all notes and securities given therefor, does not apply to a purchase on credit of liquors from an unlicensed dealer, as the statute is expressly limited to licensed dealers. Cotten v. McKenzie, 57 Miss. 418, distinguished.

Appeal from circuit court, Washington county; R. W. WILLIAMSON, Judge.

Action by R. B. Sanford, as trustee, against Starling & Smith Company, for money had and received. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Jayne & Watson and Dabney & McCabe, for appellant. Orrick & Baker, for appellee.

WOODS, J. This action was brought by appellant for the recovery of $1,340, the proceeds of 40 bales of cotton alleged to have been sold by appellee to and for the use of appellant. Under the general issue the appellee gave notice that evidence would be offered to prove that a part of the consideration of the debts secured by the deed of trust executed by L. D. & E. H. Raiford to Sanford, trustee, to secure W. H. Andrews & Bro., is illegal, because some part of said debt was for whisky. Under this insufficient notice, evidence was permitted to be presented to the jury, on the trial below, showing that two or three items in the account of W. H. Andrews & Bro. against L. D. & E. H. Raiford, in settlement of which the note and deed of trust offered in evidence were given, were for spirituous liquors sold in quantities less than one gallon; and this evidence would appear to have exercised controlling influence in the determination of the cause. The court, on appellee's motion, excluded the note and deed of trust from the consideration of the jury on the ground that a part of the consideration of the note was for spirituous liquors sold in less quantities than one gallon, and hence that the note, with the trust-deed given to secure its payment, was void, and that therefore appellant had no title to the 40 bales of cotton for whose proceeds this suit was instituted. This action of the court was naturally followed by a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for the defendant.

The action of the trial court is sought to be upheld by counsel for appellee, as we infer, by virtue of section 1108, Code 1880, and the interpretation of that section contained in Cotten v. McKenzie, 57 Miss. 418. But this contention is fatally erroneous, in omitting to notice that the stringent provisions of that section are, by the very terms of the statute, applicable only to persons who are licensed to retail vinous and spirituous liquors in less quantities than one gallon. The section, in pursuance of the general public policy of our legislation, to control and hamper the retail liquor traffic, undertook to limit the extent of that particular business by requiring it to be conducted on a strictly cash basis, and made non-collectible, in whole or in part, any debt contracted for liquors sold at retail on a credit, at the same time declaring all notes or securities given therefor to be void. This section, (1108,) by its plain terms, applies only to licensed retail liquor dealers; and its penalty is imposed upon this class of persons alone. The succeeding section (1109) prescribes the penalty to be imposed upon merchants and others who sell or give away liquors at their places of business without having been licensed as retail liquor dealers. To enlarge section 1108 by such judicial construction as to make it include, not only licensed retail liquor dealers, but all other classes of persons engaged in all other species of trade, would not only be repugnant to all rules of statutory construction, but would clearly violate the expressed legislative intent in the enactment of the statute, which was, as already stated, to further burden and restrict the retail liquor traffic.

The thoroughly considered case of Cotten v. McKenzie, 57 Miss. 418, affords no support for the views of appellee. In that case a recovery was sought on a note, the consideration of which was an account for supplies for family use, and various items of vinous and spirituous liquors, in less quantities than one gallon, which had been sold by a licensed retail liquor dealer to his customer on a credit; and the court, in an exhaustive opinion, held that the note, having been given for supplies and for liquors in less quantities than one gallon, which had been sold on a credit by a licensed retail liquor dealer, must be treated in that proceeding as a whole, and was therefore void as a whole. The ground upon which that opinion rests is that a part of the consideration of the note in that case was illegal,—not insufficient,—and the contract was wholly void. The illegality consisted as clearly appears in the opinion, in the sale of liquors in less quantities than one gallon, on a credit, by a licensed retail liquor dealer. The proof in the case before us is undisputed that W. H. Andrews & Bro. were not licensed retail liquor dealers, but merchants carrying on a general supply business, who laid themselves open to punishment under section 1109. We cannot agree that the merchant who has sold to his customer family and plantation supplies to the amount of $1,340, and who has, in that amount, either inadvertently placed two or three small items of spirituous liquors purchased elsewhere at the buyer's request, or who has willfully sold, at the customer's request, two or three small items of liquors, in less quantities than one gallon, and charged the same in the customer's general account, shall lose his entire demand under a mistaken application of a rule never designed for him, but which is confined, by its own terms, to persons licensed to carry on an unfavored retail traffic in liquors. Reversed and remanded.

DAVIS v. LOUISVILLE, N. O. & T. RY. CO.

CARRIERS — INJURIES TO PASSENGERS — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. In an action against a railroad company to recover for personal injuries, plaintiff's evidence showed that when the train was approaching the station at which plaintiff desired to get off the conductor told plaintiff that he must hurry off, as the train did not have time to stop; that the train was running three or four miles an hour; and that plaintiff received certain injuries in attempting to pass from the car in which he was sitting to the baggage-car to get his baggage, preparatory to getting off, as ordered by the conductor. Held that, as the facts did not disclose negligence per se in plaintiff, it was a question for the jury whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

2. Whether, in such case, there was apparent danger in attempting to obey the conductor, was also a question for the jury.

3. In such case a statement of plaintiff that he knew it was dangerous to obey the conductor is not conclusive of the question, as it was for the jury to say whether in fact it was apparent that there was danger.

Appeal from circuit court, Washington county; R. W. WILLIAMSON, Judge.

Action by Henry Davis against the Louisville, New Orleans & Texas Railway Company for personal injuries. A verdict for the defendant was directed. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wilford H. Smith, for appellant. Mayes & Harris, for appellee.

WOODS, J. If the plaintiff's evidence, taken alone, would not have upheld a verdict in his favor, then the peremptory instruction for the defendant was correct; otherwise, it was not. The evidence of the plaintiff was to this effect: That having been admonished by the conductor of the train on which plaintiff was being transported as a passenger, after the engineer had given the customary signal of the approach of the train to the station to which plaintiff was to be carried, and at which he desired to disembark, that he (the plaintiff) must hurry off, as the train did not have time to stop at the station then near at hand; that the train was running three or four miles an hour; that plaintiff, as directed by the conductor, attempted to pass from the car in which he was sitting to the baggage-car, to get his mason's tools, preparatory to getting off, as ordered by that servant of the company; and that in so doing, without fault on his part, he received the injuries complained of.

We are of opinion that this state of facts did not disclose negligence, per se, in the plaintiff. On the evidence of the plaintiff alone the case was one peculiarly for the consideration of the jury, and whether, on all the evidence, the plaintiff was shown to have been guilty of contributory negligence, should have been passed upon by the jury. One may avoid the charge of contributory negligence by showing that he received the injury complained of while performing an act required to be done by the defendant; such act not being apparently dangerous. Of course, if the act required to be done was plainly dangerous, no recovery could be had. For example, if the train in question had been running at the rate of 20 miles an hour when the plaintiff undertook to get ready to leave it, under the direction of the conductor, and he had received the hurt in attempting to jump from the train, the court might and should have declined to submit the question of contributory negligence to the jury. In this case there would be no question of fact to submit, for the recklessness of behavior of the plaintiff in endeavoring to jump from a train, under such circumstances, is manifest. But suppose, as in the case at bar, the train was only moving three or four miles an hour, and the attempt was not, even then, to jump from the train, but, under the direction of the conductor, to pass from one car to another, preparatory to leaving the train; the plaintiff being about 20 years of age, a man, and accustomed to railway travel. Can it be affirmed that there was apparent danger, under this evidence, in attempting to obey the officer having charge of the train and the passenger? Or, rather, shall not this question, and the question of the plaintiff's negligence, be submitted to the jury, to be determined in the light of the surrounding circumstances?

It is said, however, by appellee's counsel, that there was no question as to the apparent danger to plaintiff in attempting to comply with the conductor's order, because the plaintiff, in his own evidence, swears he knew it was dangerous to attempt to obey the conductor. We do not so understand the matter. The plaintiff's statement of his belief that the act was apparently dangerous is not conclusive of that question. The real point to be considered is, not what the plaintiff thought of the danger of the situation, but was it in fact apparent that there was peril? And this question was one of fact, to be determined by the jury, on all the evidence in the case. Reversed and remanded.

LANDLORD'S LIEN.

A lessee of a plantation sublet a part thereof, and his tenant, after making a crop of cotton, and before it was gathered, abandoned the premises, and the lessee sold the cotton to defendants. The lessor of the plantation held a claim against the lessee for rent, and for supplies furnished, and assigned such claim to plaintiff, who thereupon claimed a lien on the cotton sold. Held, that under Code 1880, § 1301, which gives a lessor a lien on all crops grown on the leased premises for rent, and advances made for supplies to lessee, plaintiff was entitled to recover.

Appeal from circuit court, Yazoo county; J. B. CHRISMAN, Judge.

Replevin by D. M. Hollingsworth against Allan Hill and others for the recovery of seven bales of cotton. Attachment by Powell against the same defendants of the same property, and the actions consolidated and tried as one. Verdict for defendants by direction, and judgment thereon. Plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Dr. Hill rented a plantation for 1890 from Hudson, and executed a deed of trust conveying some mules, and the crops to be grown on the land, to secure the rent, and supplies to be furnished, and a considerable debt past due, and it was stipulated in this deed that Hudson might apply any payments made as he saw proper. The deed of trust was duly recorded. Hill delivered 83 bales of cotton of the crop of 1890, and Hudson so applied it as to extinguish the old debt and the rent, and leave his account for supplies advanced, to the sum of $1,706, unpaid. This claim was assigned by Hudson to Powell, who caused the trustee in the deed of trust to bring replevin for seven bales of cotton, and himself sued out an attachment against Hill on the account for supplies, and the seven bales were seized under both writs, and claim was made to this cotton by Allan Hill and his mother, whose claim arose in this way: Dr. Hill sublet 20 acres to Squire Jefferson, who, after making a crop of corn and cotton on the land, in the fall, after its maturity, but before gathering, abandoned the leased premises, owing Dr. Hill for rent of land, rent of a mule, and for advances furnished him; and Dr. Hill accepted the situation, gathered and appropriated the corn, and disposed of the cotton in the field by selling it to Allan Hill and mother for payment by them of Squire Jefferson's indebtedness, with some reduction. Under this contract the cotton was gathered by Allan Hill and mother, who paid Dr. Hill as agreed. The two cases were consolidated by agreement, and tried as one. The evidence showed that the claim for advances by Hudson to Dr. Hill was due and unpaid.

Calhoon & Green and T. H. Campbell, for appellants. E. E. Baldwin, for appellees.

CAMPBELL, C. J. The court erred in instructing for the appellees. They claim under J. A. Hill, and have no greater right than he has, and it is clear that, as against him, the appellant was entitled to recover the cotton. Hill had expressly stipulated that Hudson might apply payments as he saw proper, and he had so applied them as to leave the account for advances unpaid. It was a lien on the cotton superior to any claim derived from dealing with Hill. Code, 1880, § 1301.[1] When the tenant, Squire Jefferson, abandoned the premises he had leased, and Dr. Hill took possession, as he had the legal right to do, he proceeded, as well he might, to deal with the crop as owner; and, after appropriating the corn raised by Jefferson, procured the cotton to be picked under an arrangement with Allan Hill and his mother, who, as Allan Hill testifies, bought the crop from Dr. Hill. As they dealt with Dr. Hill as owner, as in law he was, because of the surrender by the abandonment of Jefferson, (12 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 758, and cases cited,) they took the cotton acquired by dealing with him charged with whatever bound it as his, and must look to him for compensation for their labor and expenses. Dr. Hill regarded the crop raised by Jefferson as his own after its abandonment by Jefferson, and it was his in legal contemplation, and it was so regarded by those who dealt with him about it; and the legal consequences of his ownership must follow, whatever the hardship. Reversed, and remanded for a new trial.

[1] Section 1301 gives the lessor of land a lien on all the agricultural products raised thereon for rent and advances made by him and supplies furnished by him to the tenant.

ALABAMA & V. RY. CO. v. BRENNAN, Sheriff, et al.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—TAXATION—INJUNCTION.

1. Under the city charter of Vicksburg, § 30, providing that, where property is reported by the assessor as undervalued, the owner is entitled to notice before the board of aldermen can change the valuation, such owner cannot be deprived of his notice by an ordinance passed under section 33 of the charter, providing that the assessment is to conform to such time and method as may be prescribed by ordinance. The former section is not affected by the latter, and the two, being harmonious, must both stand.

2. In such case, where the board changes the valuation returned, without notice to the owner, an injunction will lie against the collection of all the excess of taxes over the sum due on the valuation rendered by the assessor.

Appeal from chancery court, Warren county; CLAUDE PINTARD, Chancellor.

Action by the Alabama & Vicksburg Railway Company against J. M. A. Brennan, sheriff, and others. Judgment for defendants. Reversed.

Birchett & Shelton and Nugent & McWillie, for appellant. Gibson, Henry & Bien, for appellees.

CAMPBELL, C. J. The dealing by the board of mayor and aldermen with the valuation of property of the appellant, as rendered to the assessor, was not according to the charter of the city of Vicksburg, but in disregard of the plain requirement of section 30, which provides for precedent notice to the owner of the property reported by the assessor as undervalued, "with his statement of what he believes to be the reasonable taxable value of said property," before action on it by the board. It is true that the tremendous and dangerous power is conferred on the board of mayor and aldermen finally (and without any opportunity for redress against confiscation, practically, it might be, under some conditions) to determine the taxable value of all property; and, in view of this, there is the greater need for observance with scrupulous exactness of the few safeguards for the property owner. The provision mentioned as contained in section 30 is about all he has, and he may justly invoke that. His valuation rendered to the assessor may be changed by the board, after a hearing or opportunity for it, upon notice to him, where the assessor has reported an undervaluation, and stated what he believes to be a proper one. Section 30 of the charter is not affected by section 33, as supposed. By the latter it is declared that the "assessment [is] to conform to such time and method as may be prescribed therefor by ordinance," but this general declaration cannot be held to abrogate the specific provision of the former section as to dealing with undervaluation of property. The board may by ordinance prescribe the time and method of assessment, in conformity to the particular provisions of the charter. The two sections are harmonious, and must both stand. It is a great mistake to suppose that the board has the right to meet in secret session, (or open one either,) and without precedent notice to the property owner, and upon no other basis than its own will, to change the valuation of property by the owner. No such practice can find any sanction in the charter under consideration. The injunction should have been perpetuated as to all the excess of taxes over the sum due upon the valuation rendered to the assessor. Decree reversed, and decree for such injunction to be entered.

NESBITT v. CITY OF GREENVILLE.

DANGEROUS STRUCTURES ON STREET—LIABILITY OF CITY.

1. Where a city permitted the maintenance of a water-tank in a defective condition in a public street, and plaintiff's decedent, being lawfully engaged at work in such street, stepped under the defective structure for a few minutes,—there being no apparent danger,—and was killed by the falling of the tank, the question of the city's negligence, and as to whether the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, are for the jury.

2. In such case the city is chargeable with notice of, and is liable for injury resulting from, such defects in the structure as ordinary care and reasonable diligence would discover.

Appeal from circuit court, Washington county; R. W. WILLIAMSON, Judge.

Action by M. M. Nesbitt against the city of Greenville. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Jayne & Watson, for appellant. Yerger & Percy, for appellee.

WOODS, J. There is much evidence in the record tending to show that the highway at the point where the plaintiff's deceased husband received his injuries was a public street in Greenville, and we have no reason to suppose that the peremptory instruction of the court below had any relation to this phase of the case. Let us examine briefly the evidence which was offered for the purpose of showing negligence in the municipality in permitting an obstruction for a long while in a public street,—an obstruction, as it now appears, which was dangerous to persons passing along or using such street. The obstruction was erected by one Pace about two years before the injury complained of occurred. Whether erected by the permission of the municipality does not appear from the record, but this is not important, since the city's liability for its continuance is clear. There is no dispute as to the knowledge of the city of the existence of the structure in the street. The structure was a tank, holding 70 or 80 barrels of water, placed on a frame-work which was itself placed on posts from 4 to 6 feet high above the surface of the street. The water which was stored in this tank was used for street-sprinkling purposes, and for consumption by citizens. It was immediately in the street, and very near the base of a levee which had been erected across the west end of the street by the board of levee commissioners. To this tank, directly, persons using the river water were accustomed to come for their supplies, and to it the street sprinklers came directly, also. Within about 70 feet of the tank there were two coal-yards, and all the business of these yards was conducted near it. Now and then small steam-boats landed at the foot of this street, and fishing vessels sometimes tied up at its foot, also; and persons from such boats and vessels passed up the street in question, and by this tank, from the river. Persons on foot occasionally used this particular portion of the street to reach the levee. This tank, thus built, and thus situated, and thus used, suddenly fell one day in August, 1890; and in its fall the husband of appellant, who at the moment was under it, received injuries which resulted in his death. The immediate cause of the fall of the tank was found to be the breaking in two of one of the timbers constituting the frame-work upon which the tank sat. This broken piece of timber was found to have been unsound,—"water-sobbed," as the witness who testified to this fact characterized it. The same witness had not a great while before discovered the water-sobbed and unsafe condition of this piece of timber.

We agree with counsel for appellee that ordinary care over its streets is the measure of diligence imposed upon municipal corporations, and that they are not insurers against injury to persons using the public streets. We do not dissent from the elementary principle, that before the municipality can be held liable for injuries resulting from nuisances or defects in its streets, it must have knowledge of the nuisance or the defect, and its danger. Notice there must be to charge the municipality, but this notice may be actual or constructive or implied. When the obstruction is created by the city itself, or where it permits an obstruction erected by another in its streets, it must take notice of such defects in the obstruction as ordinary care will discover. The structure in a street, to every part of which the entire public has the right of free access, must be erected in such manner and from such materials as to be reasonably safe; and it must be kept in this safe condition. Proper repairs, from time to time, are as much the duty of the city as a safe structure originally. Inseparably connected with this statement is another, viz., that a municipality is liable for injury resulting from its defective structures where, by reasonable diligence, it might have acquired knowledge of such defect. The common knowledge of mankind is chargeable to a municipality, also. The knowledge of the action of the elements on structures of wood, and of the liability of timber to decay under certain conditions, is to be attributed to municipalities, just as to natural persons. The duty of the municipality to exercise ordinary care to detect such natural decay, and to guard against injuries therefrom, follows necessarily. Recurring now to the facts put in evidence to show the appellee's negligence and consequent liability, we are of the opinion that the city's freedom from culpability was not so manifestly clear as to leave no room for differences of opinion among reasonable men, and therefore that the question of appellee's negligence should have been submitted to the jury.

Was the deceased free from contributory negligence? Was he guilty of such misuser of the street at the time he was injured as to absolve the municipality from liability in any event? The deceased was engaged in preparing, in this open street, the timbers necessary to the erection of a dump just beyond the levee into the river, under a contract with the city. He had been engaged in that work, with the laborers employed by him, for two weeks or more. We take it to be true that the city had the same right to occupy such part of the street in the prosecution of this public work as might be convenient and necessary, in the same manner and to the same extent that an abutting lot-owner may be permitted to employ a part of the street in the erection of a building upon his lot. Presumably, too, the deceased was using the street with the knowledge and under the permission of the municipality. While thus lawfully engaged in the street, the deceased, as an incident to his work, had occasion to sharpen a saw; and in order to do this piece of work, incident to the main enterprise, he placed himself for a few minutes under this tank, in a part of the public street,—there being no apparent danger from the structure,—and, while so situated, was fatally injured by the fall of the tank. Suppose he had stood outside the edge of the tank while engaged in his incidental work of saw-sharpening. Suppose he had been simply standing near it, supervising the work of his hands, and the injury had occurred. Would he have been so clearly guilty of contributory negligence, or such misuser of the street, as to leave no room for difference of opinion as to his culpability? On all the facts in the case before us, can it be affirmed that only one conclusion can be drawn by reasonable men? Would all reasonable men certainly draw the same inference of contributory negligence from all the evidence in this case? Was there nothing material, of fact or inference, as to which reasonable men might not honestly differ? We intimate no opinion as to the negligence of deceased, but we are of the opinion that the question should have been submitted to the jury.

Reversed and remanded.

WITKOWSKI v. MAXWELL et al.

MARRIED WOMAN—LIABILITIES—BILL OF EXCHANGE PAYABLE TO HUSBAND—PROTEST—PROOF OF DEMAND.

1. A bill of exchange drawn by a married woman, who is a separate trader, to the order of her husband, for the purpose of being indorsed to one of her creditors, is binding on her, and is not affected by the fact that it is, in form, a contract between the drawer and her husband.

2. In an action against the drawer of a bill of exchange, the certificate of a notary was in evidence, stating that he presented the bill, and that payment was refused. The deposition of the notary was taken three times. In the first he stated that on the day of maturity he took the bill to the place of business of the acceptor, which he thought was on L. street, and demanded payment, and, being answered that the acceptor was out of the city, he protested the bill, and gave notice to the parties. In his second deposition he stated that at the time of the protest the place of business of the acceptor was the Star Boot & Shoe Store, 1526 L. street, and that presentment was made to the son of the acceptor. Defendant read the depositions of a number of witnesses, who testified that at the time of protest the acceptor was in business on C. street, and that the son was not with the father, but was doing business for himself on Sixteenth street. The third deposition of the notary stated that his second deposition was hastily prepared by the officer from notes furnished by him, and that he only intended to state that his impression was that the place of business of the acceptor was on L. street, and that he thought presentment had been made to the son. He stated that it was impossible to speak with absolute certainty, but that undoubtedly he had presented the paper at the proper place and to the proper person. The acceptor testified that he was out of the city at the time of the protest. Held, that the evidence would support a finding of presentment and demand at the proper place of business.

Appeal from circuit court, Washington county.

Action on a bill of exchange by Maxwell & Peale against A. V. Witkowski. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Campbell & Starling, for appellant. Yerger & Percy and Frank Johnston, for appellees.

COOPER, J. On July 16, 1886, the appellant, a married woman, the wife of Simon Witkowski, and a separate trader, was indebted to the appellees, and the indebtedness was evidenced by her promissory note, which was indorsed by her said husband and by L. Witkowski. On that day, and in substitution of her said note, she drew a bill of exchange upon L. Witkowski, who resided in Denver, Colo., directing him to pay to the order of Simon Witkowski, her husband, the sum of $1,563.90, on the 1st day of December, 1886. Simon Witkowski indorsed said bill, and delivered it to appellees, and it was duly accepted by L. Witkowski. At maturity it was presented for payment, and, being dishonored, was protested, and notice given to the drawer and indorser, against whom the present suit is brought. The sufficiency of the presentment, protest, and notice is contested by the appellant upon grounds to be hereinafter stated. The declaration is in the usual form, nothing appearing therein to show the consideration of the bill, the coverture of the appellant, or her residence. She pleaded her coverture and residence in the state of Louisiana at the time of drawing the bill, and that Simon Witkowski was then her husband, and that by the laws of that state husband and wife could not contract together. The plaintiffs replied, setting up the prior indebtedness of the defendant as above stated, and that the bill sued on was executed in lieu and substitution of the note. To this replication the defendant demurred, and the same was by the court overruled. This action of the court is brought in review by the first assignment of error.

The demurrer was properly overruled. It is not denied by appellant that she was indebted to appellees in the debt which formed the consideration of the bill sued on. Her sole contention is that the form of the transaction is that of a promise on her part to pay the sum of money named in the bill to her husband on default of the acceptor, and that this contract she was disqualified by the laws of her domicile from making. The case of Doll v. Theurer, 6 Rob. (La.) 276, relied on by appellant, decides only that, where the wife makes a contract with her husband not authorized by law, the husband has no right of action, and cannot convey one to another person. In Martin v. Drake, 1 Rob. (La.) 218, and Petitpain v. Palmer, Id. 220, it is clearly intimated that where the real transaction is between the wife and a third person, and the real contract is between them, recovery may be had upon the note of the wife made to the husband as a mere conduit, and by him indorsed to the other party to the contract. In the first of these cases Mrs. Drake had executed her note payable to and indorsed by her husband. The defense was that the note was given for a slave sold to the defendants, which at the time of the sale was inflicted with an incurable disease known to the "seller." The court said: "The record does not show, nor is it pretended, that Mrs. Drake was separated in property from her husband; that the purchase was for her individual account and benefit; or that the husband indorsed the note only as her surety, to pay a debt of her own. Under the pleadings, we are bound to presume that the purchase was made, and the note given, on account of the community; if so, the wife cannot bind herself jointly with her husband for a debt contracted during the marriage, either as a drawer or indorser of a note. Petitpain v. Palmer, was upon a similar instrument, and the court held that the wife was not liable. To the contention of counsel in argument that the contract was one of suretyship entered into by the husband for the wife, under the form of an accommodation note with his indorsement thereon, the court replied: "If this be available, it ought to have been alleged and proved." "The wife's identity is so completely merged in the husband's that she can no more contract with him than with a stranger. Therefore the drawing or indorsement of a bill or note by a husband to his wife is void, and she cannot sue upon it either in his life-time, or against his executor after his death. But the husband may indorse it to her in order that she may be the mere conduit, and indorse it over to another party, the whole transaction being regarded as the husband's." 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 241; Slawson v. Loring, 5 Allen, 340. And, though prima facie such note is a nullity, she may be charged on it by evidence aliunde that it was given in her separate business. 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 248; Bank v. Miller, 63 N. Y. 639; Hardin v. Pelan, 41 Miss. 112.

The second assignment of error is upon the action of the court upon admitting in evidence so much of the notarial certificate of protest as stated that the notary had given notice of protest to the maker and indorser of the protested bill. Without determining whether the admission of this evidence was or was not erroneous, it is sufficient to say that no reversible error is shown. The deposition of the notary was taken, and the fact that notice was given is so abundantly proved that the mere admission of other incompetent evidence to establish the same fact would not cause a reversal. In truth, no serious controversy seems to have been made on the trial that some notice was given; the real contention, so far as notice was involved, was as to the sufficiency of that given. No effort was made by the plaintiffs to prove that notice, other than that stated in the notarial certificate, was given, which consisted of a copy of the dishonored bill of exchange, and a declaration by the notary that he had presented the original "at the store of L. Witkowski, and demanded payment thereof, which was refused; reason, out of the city." Whereupon, etc. It is contended that the notice should have contained all the facts constituting presentment and demand, and that that given was fatally defective in not showing to whom presentment was made. It was held in Routh v. Robertson, 11 Smedes & M. 382, that, where the notice of dishonor was such that its legal effect of what was stated to have been done would release the indorser, the notice was insufficient. In that case the notice stated presentment and protest on the 26th of March of a bill of exchange not due until the 29th. The legal effect of this would have been to discharge the indorser, and since the notice stated, in effect, that he had been discharged, it was held that it could not be proved that the presentment and protest were in fact on the 29th. In Chewning v. Gatewood, 5 How. (Miss.) 552, and Rowan v. Odenheimer, 5 Smedes & M. 44, it was held that notice sufficient to indicate clearly that the paper had been presented and dishonored, and that the holder looked to the indorser for its payment, was sufficient. In Chewning v. Gatewood the court said: "It has uniformly been held that no particular form of notice is necessary; and though it be irregular, or even vary in some particulars from the true state of the facts, yet if it be sufficient to put the party upon inquiry it is good." 2 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 410, note 1.

On the trial of the cause the notarial certificate of protest was introduced, and the deposition of the notary was also taken and read in evidence. In fact, the notary was three times examined. On his first examination he stated that on the day of the maturity of the bill he took it to the place of business of the acceptor, which he thought was on Lawrence street, and demanded payment, and, being answered that the acceptor was out of the city, he protested the bill, and gave notice to the parties. On his second examination he stated that at the time of the protest the place of business of the acceptor was the Star Boot & Shoe Store, 1526 Lawrence street, and that presentment was made to Mr. Jules Witkowski, the son of the acceptor. The depositions of several parties were taken by the defendant going to show that at the time of the protest another person was conducting business at 1526 Lawrence street, and that the acceptor was then in business on Champa street; also that Jules Witkowski was at that time not engaged by his father, but was doing business for himself on Sixteenth street. The deposition of the notary was then taken a third time, and he explained that his second deposition was hastily prepared by the officer, by whom it was taken, from notes furnished by him, and that he supposed his answers as written down only stated, as he intended to state, that his impression was that the place of business of Witkowski was on Lawrence street, and that he thought presentment had been made to Jules Witkowski. On this, his final testimony, he stated that very many pieces of paper were protested by him, and that it was impossible for him at so long a time to speak with absolute certainty as to when and to whom presentment had been made, but that undoubtedly he had at the time presented the paper at the proper place and to the proper person. It affirmatively appears from the evidence of the acceptor himself that at the time of the protest he was in fact out of the city, and to this extent his evidence corroborates the testimony of the notary. The court instructed the jury for the defendant that it devolved on the plaintiffs to prove presentment, and demand of payment at the proper place of business of the acceptor, and demand upon him or his representative, and by its verdict the jury has found that such was made. We cannot say that the verdict is not supported by the evidence. The notarial act was evidence of the fact that presentment had been made in the manner stated, i. e., at the place of business of the acceptor, and though the officer, as a matter of precaution, should have noted at the time to whom presentment was made, his failure so to do does not invalidate his act if, as matter of fact, it was presented to the representative of the acceptor. In Rowan v. Odenheimer the indorser lived in the same city with the maker, and personal notice of dishonor was necessary. The notary was examined as a witness, and stated that he had left the notice at the store of the indorser, but could not remember with whom. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, which the court refused to disturb, and which on appeal was affirmed. The decision in Duckert v. Van Lilienthal, 11 Wis. 56, cited in the notes to Dupre v. Richard, 43 Amer. Dec. 214, and relied on by counsel for appellant as authority for the proposition that "the protest should show to whom the bill was presented, and, if it does not, it will not bind the indorser," was disapproved in Wallace v. Crilley, 46 Wis. 577, 1 N. W. Rep. 301, and declared to be dictum to the extent that it announced the rule now contended for. As we have said, the notarial certificate was evidence of presentment at the usual place of business of the acceptor, and, he being not found, it was sufficient to demand payment of any one having apparent authority to act for him. We cannot say that the verdict of the jury, by which it is settled this was done, is not supported by competent evidence from which the inference flows. The judgment is affirmed.

JURY—TRIAL IN EQUITY COURT—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—FRAUDULENT ASSIGNMENT.

1. Code, § 1848, relating to chancery courts, provides that "the said courts shall have jurisdiction of bills exhibited by creditors, who have not obtained judgment at law, or, having judgments, have not had executions returned unsatisfied, to set aside fraudulent conveyances of property, or other devices resorted to for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or defrauding creditors, and may subject the property to the satisfaction of the demand of such creditors, as if complainant had a judgment and execution thereon returned, 'No property found.'" Held, that a decree setting aside an assignment on the complaint of creditors who had not obtained judgments at law would not be disturbed on the ground that it violated Const. art. 1, § 12, which declares that "the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate," since Const. 1890, § 147, expressly provides that "no judgment or decree in any chancery or circuit court rendered in a civil cause shall be reversed or annulled on the ground of want of jurisdiction to render said judgment or decree, from any error or mistake as to whether the cause in which it was rendered was of equity or common-law jurisdiction."

2. An assignor preferred his mother on account of an alleged indebtedness for borrowed money. The mother refused to testify about the money, and how the debt arose. The testimony of the assignor about the indebtedness was very general. There was a preference to an aunt for "borrowed money," which proved to have been for a debt due from the father of the assignor, for which the latter gave his own note in some settlement of the father's estate, which settlement was obscure, and not clearly explained. The preferences to relations were nearly enough to exhaust the estate. Just before the assignment the assignor gave a mortgage on certain real estate to secure a fee to his attorney, who agreed to draw up a deed and defend the assignor in any suit brought against him in regard to the assignment. Held, that the assignment was properly set aside.

Appeal from chancery court, Noxubee county; T. B. GRAHAM, Chancellor.

Action by the Francis Vandegrift Shoe Company and others against T. F. Scott and others to set aside an assignment on the ground of fraud. Decree for complainants. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. C. Bogle and W. H. Bogle, for appellants. Rives & Rives, for appellees.

COOPER, J. On the 4th day of April, 1890, T. F. Scott, a merchant at Cooksville in this state, made a deed of assignment, with preferences, for the benefit of his creditors. On the 7th day of April, Linkauff & Strauss, A. G. Levy & Co., Richardson Bros. & Co., Block & Newberger, Flash, Preston & Co., Malone, Chapman & Co., Vanvleet & Co., creditors of said Scott, sued out writs of attachment against him, which were levied upon the goods in the hands of Long, assignee; said writs of attachment being returnable, and were returned, to the circuit court of Noxubee county. On the 13th of September, 1890, the Francis Vandegrift Shoe Company, Davis, Marshall & Co., Burney, Cavanaugh & Long, Marx, Rothenbergh & Co., T. G. Bush & Co., D. A. Shalein & Co., and Mrs. Lillian C. Madison, administratrix of James E. Madison, creditors of said Scott, exhibited their bill in this cause in the chancery court of Noxubee county, in their own behalf and in behalf of all other creditors who should join therein, attacking as fraudulent and void the assignment made by Scott to Long, and seeking to subject the property thereby conveyed to the payment of their debts against Scott. After the bill in chancery had been filed, the creditors above named, who had attached at law, asked to be made parties complainant thereto, and that their actions at law should be stayed until the final determination of the equity cause, in which, as they averred, the rights of all parties could be finally disposed of without the expense incident to the actions at law. The court, over the objection of the defendants, permitted these creditors to join in the bill. The goods assigned by Scott were, under the direction of the court, sold by a receiver appointed in this cause, and from the sale a fund of $1,500 has been realized. The value of the other property assigned, lands and choses in action, added to the fund now in hand, will be less than the debts due by Scott; and it is not pretended that under any circumstances there can be a residuum to be paid to him. Scott, the assignor, and Long, the assignee, in the deed, are made defendants to the bill, as are also A. C. Bogle, whose connection with the controversy will be hereafter stated, and one J. P. Long, who had bought the goods assigned from the assignee before the bill was filed, but who, having confessedly paid no part of the purchase price, is not affected by the decree finally made.

The first errors assigned are to the jurisdiction of the court. It is said that the court had no jurisdiction of the controversy as presented by the bill of the original complainants, because none of them had secured a judgment at law against the debtor Scott; and, secondly, that it had no jurisdiction on the petition of those creditors who had attached at law for their demands, for the additional reason that, the circuit court having taken jurisdiction at the instance of these creditors, the defendant was entitled to have the controversy with these creditors there settled. The jurisdiction of the court of chancery to entertain bills of this character at the instance of creditors who have not recovered judgments at law rests upon the provisions of sections 1843, 1844, and 1845 of the Code, which are as follows: "Sec. 1843. The said courts shall have jurisdiction of bills exhibited by creditors who have not obtained judgments at law, or, having judgments, have not had executions returned unsatisfied, to set aside fraudulent conveyances of property, or other devices resorted to for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or defrauding creditors; and may subject the property to the satisfaction of the demand of such creditors, as if complainant had a judgment and execution returned thereon, 'No property found.' Sec. 1844. Upon such bill a writ of sequestration or injunction, or both, may be issued upon like terms and conditions as such writs may be issued in other cases, and subject to such proceedings and provisions thereafter as are applicable in other cases of such writs. Sec. 1845. The creditor in such cases shall have a lien upon the property described therein from the filing of his bill, except as against bona fide purchasers before the service of process upon the defendant in such bill." It is insisted by counsel for appellants that these sections of the Code are violative of section 12 of article 1 of the constitution of this state, which declares that "the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate." It is a sufficient reply to this objection to say that the decree was made after the adoption of the constitution of this state, which became operative on November 1, 1890, and that by section 147 thereof it is declared that "no judgment or decree in any chancery or circuit court rendered in a civil cause shall be reversed or annulled on the ground of want of jurisdiction to render said judgment or decree, from any error or mistake as to whether the cause in which it was rendered was of equity or common-law jurisdiction." The contention of appellants is that jurisdiction to determine whether or not Scott was debtor to the complainants was vested in the circuit and not the chancery court, and, because it was, that the court should not proceed to the determination of any other question presented in the cause. This is precisely the case covered by section 147 of the constitution, which is a complete provision, requiring no legislation to put it in operation, but which acts and is operative by reason of its own declaration.

The next question presented by the assignment of errors is whether the chancellor rightly decided the assignment to be fraudulent in its character. In considering this question it becomes necessary to state the connection of the appellant Bogle with the assignment. On the 3d day of April, Scott applied to Bogle to prepare the deed of assignment, which was afterwards executed, and a fee of $400 was agreed upon between the parties. To secure the payment of this fee, Scott and his mother executed their notes for the sum fixed, and executed a mortgage upon certain lands owned by them as tenants in common. The understanding of both Scott and the attorney, Mr. Bogle, was that Bogle should, for the fee fixed, prepare the deed of assignment, and should also represent Scott in maintaining the assignment and defending any suits that might be brought against him. On the next day the assignment was prepared and executed, and by it the interest of Scott in the lands mortgaged to Bogle was conveyed to the assignee as part of his estate. The preferences declared by Scott in the assignment were, first, about $7,000 to his mother, Mrs. Nancy Scott, evidenced by certain promissory notes, the debt being, as stated in the assignment, for borrowed money. The next preference was in favor of an aunt of the assignor, for $700, also stated to be for money borrowed from her. The next preference was for a debt, of an amount not stated, due from the assignor to his nephew, T. Scott. Other preferences for several small sums were then given to certain other creditors, and the estate remaining was to be distributed equally among creditors, generally. Mrs. Nancy Scott, the mother of the assignor, was examined as a witness, and produced the notes given her by her son for the several sums for which she was preferred; but being interrogated as to the circumstances under which the debts arose, the source from which the money was received by her, and generally for the purpose of discrediting the existence of the claims, she persistently and positively declined to reply. Mr. Scott was also examined as a witness in reference to the various transactions from which his alleged indebtedness to his mother sprang; and, while he stated that he owed the sums for which she was preferred, he was unable to do more than make the most general and indefinite explanations of the circumstances under which the obligations were incurred. The argument of appellants is that the court below did not believe the debt to Mrs. Scott, or any of the other preferred claims, to have been simulated, but, construing the mortgage to Bogle and the deed of assignment as one instrument, avoided the assignment as fraudulent in law, because it reserved a benefit to the grantor in the assigned property, by providing for the payment out of the assigned property of the fee to Bogle, which fee was to be paid him for services, in part, to be thereafter rendered for the assignor. It is said that the recitals in the deed, and the notes evidencing the debt to Mrs. Scott, are at least prima facie evidence that the debt was due; that Mr. Scott and his mother were the only persons examined as witnesses to disprove its validity, and that both testified that it was really due; that if they failed to respond to the interrogatories put to them, and failed to remember, or, if they remembered, to disclose their private affairs, out of which the indebtedness arose, such failure of memory or willful refusal to reply could not do more than impeach the credibility of the witnesses; that complainants took the deposition of Mrs. Scott as their witness, and if she refused to tell all she knew, the effect cannot be to do more than to discredit her testimony; that to overturn a prima facie case some positive and direct evidence is required, and so they say, if the chancellor did in fact find that the assignment was void, because the debts to Mrs. Scott were simulated, such finding rests upon no evidence sufficient for its support.

Turning to the consideration of the other phase of the cause,—the employment of counsel for future defense of the assignor in reference to assaults made upon his disposition of the property,—it is argued by counsel that the execution of the mortgage was a separate and distinct transaction, lawful in itself, or, if not to the full extent of the fee secured thereby, that it ought not to be held to vitiate the assignment, but that the debt secured should be abated so that only so much should be charged upon the property as the mortgagor might lawfully have bound it to pay, viz., a reasonable fee for preparing the deed. We are unable to say that the court below separated and distinguished the details of the transaction as it is now presented by counsel, or that it should have done so. In all its parts, and in its entirety, it was the subject of investigation. To say the least of the preferred debts to Mrs. Scott, their amount and consideration, and the circumstances under which they are incurred, are presented in a very suspicious light. When to this is added that the debt to the aunt of the assignor, which the deed recites to have been incurred for borrowed money, is shown to have been a debt due by the father of the assignor, for which the latter gave his own note in some settlement of the father's estate, which settlement is obscure and not clearly explained, and the fact that the other preferred debt is also due to his nephew, and when to this is added the further fact that the preferred debts to near relatives are probably sufficient to exhaust the whole estate assigned, and then consider that, in the act of making the assignment for the professed benefit of all creditors, there is fixed as a primary charge upon the land, which is a part of the assigned property, a fee to secure the services of counsel in defending the assignor against the assaults of dissatisfied creditors, it becomes apparent that the line between an assignment for the benefit of creditors and one for the benefit of the debtor is practically obliterated, if the one under consideration is sustained. We are therefore of opinion that the decree of the court is correct, and it is accordingly affirmed.

SELDEN et al. v. CITY OF JACKSONVILLE.

(Supreme Court of Florida. Dec. 22, 1891.)

EMINENT DOMAIN—COMPENSATION—RIGHT OF ACCESS TO PREMISES.

1. The guaranty of a constitution that private property shall not be "taken" or "appropriated" without compensation does not extend to mere consequential damages resulting to property abutting on a street from a change of grade of the street, or other improvement thereof not constituting a diversion of the street from street purposes, by municipal authorities acting within the scope of their charter powers, but only to a trespass upon or physical invasion of the abutting property.

2. The provisions of the constitution of 1885, that private property shall not be "taken" without just compensation, (section 12, Declaration of Rights;) that the legislature may provide for the drainage of the land of one person over or through that of another upon just compensation therefor to the owner of the land over which such drainage is had; and that no private property nor right of way shall be "appropriated" to the use of any corporation or individual until full compensation shall first be made to the owner, or first secured to him by deposit of money, such compensation to be irrespective of any benefit from any improvement proposed by such corporation or individual, (sections 28, 29, art. 16,)—do not of themselves render a municipality liable for mere consequential damages resulting to property abutting on a street from the lawful change of grade or other authorized improvement of the street by the municipality.

3. Upon the voluntary dedication of land to the purposes of a street, it becomes, to the extent that it is necessary to be used for a street, the property of the people of the state; and the dedication carries with it the continuing power to change its grade, or otherwise improve it, in so far as such improvements are for street purposes. This power may be delegated by the legislature to a municipality as one of its governmental agencies, and to the exercise of these powers the fee of the owners of abutting lots in the street to its center is at all times subject.

4. There are incident to the ownership of property abutting on a street certain property rights which the public generally do not possess, viz., the right of egress and ingress from and to the lot by the way of the street, and of light and air which the street affords. These incidental rights are, under a constitutional prohibition simply against the "taking" or "appropriation" of private property, subordinate to the right of the state, or of any duly-authorized governmental agency acting for it, to alter a grade or otherwise improve a street for street purposes. The original and all subsequent purchasers of abutting lots take with the implied understanding that the public shall have the right to improve or alter the street, so far as may be necessary for its use as a street, and that they can sustain no claim for damages resulting to their lots or property from the improvement or destruction of such incidental rights as a mere consequence from the lawful use or improvement of the street as a highway.

5. The erection by a municipal government within the limits of a street, and for street purposes, and under street conditions justifying it, of a viaduct for the purpose of changing the grade of the street, and in the exercise of its power to change such grades, is not a "taking" or "appropriation" of private property, within the constitutional guaranty against such taking or appropriation, even though the abutting owners' rights of ingress, egress, light, and air are destroyed thereby; nor is this result of law changed by the mere fact that other corporate bodies than the municipality have contributed to the expense of the erection of the viaduct. Whether, however, it would not be a diversion of the street from the street purposes, and a "taking" and "appropriation" for which compensation must be made, if the necessity for the viaduct was created by railroad tracks crossing the street, not presented.

Appeal from circuit court, Duval county; JAMES M. BAKER, Judge.

Suit by George Selden and others for an injunction to restrain the city of Jacksonville from erecting a viaduct for the purpose of changing the grade of a certain street. From an order denying the application plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

A. W. Cockrell & Son, for appellants. W. B. Young and J. M. Barrs, for appellee.

RANEY, C. J. The last clause in the twelfth section of the declaration of rights of our constitution is: "Nor shall private property be taken without just compensation." This is not, however, the only provision of that instrument relating to the exercise of the right of eminent domain. There are two sections in the "Miscellaneous Provisions," or sixteenth article, which read as follows:

"Sec. 28. The legislature may provide for the drainage of the land of one person over or through that of another, upon just compensation therefor to the owner of the land over which such drainage is had.

"Sec. 29. No private property nor right of way shall be appropriated to the use of any corporation or individual until full compensation shall be first made to the owner, or first secured to him by deposit of money; which compensation, irrespective of any benefit from any improvement proposed by such corporation or individual, shall be ascertained by a jury of twelve men, in a court of competent jurisdiction, as shall be provided by law."

It cannot be denied that the almost uniform course of decision has been that a municipal government was not liable for any consequential damages resulting to dwelling lots from an authorized or lawful change of grade of the street by the municipal authorities, where the constitutional provision obtaining has been like that of our declaration of rights: "Nor shall private property be taken without just compensation." Such seems to have been this court's understanding of the law 20 years ago, as is shown by Dorman v. City of Jacksonville, 13 Fla. 538.

The meaning given by the courts and commentators to the words "taken" or "appropriated," as used in such a provision, is that there must be a trespass upon or a physical invasion of the abutting property, to bring municipal authorities within the constitutional prohibition, so long as such authorities keep within the scope of their powers in using or improving the street. If they do no illegal act, as by creating a nuisance, or do not appropriate the street to other than street purposes, or do not invade, or do physical injury to, the abutting property, there is, in the absence of negligence, or of the want of due skill and care in making improvements, (which negligence or want of care or skill may, of itself, be a ground of corporate responsibility for damages,) no liability to the owners of such property for any damage resulting from a change of grade or other improvement in the street made by the municipal powers for the convenience or benefit of the public in using the highway as such. The voluntary dedication of the street as a highway creates certain rights in the public; the land so dedicated becomes, to the extent that it is necessary to be used for a street, the property of the people of the state; and the dedication of it to such purpose carries in this country, as well as in England, the continuing power to change its grade or otherwise improve it, in so far as such improvements are for street purposes. This power may be delegated by the legislature to a municipality as one of its governmental agencies, and to the exercise of these powers the fee of the abutting owner in the street to its center is at all times subject, in the manner or to the extent indicated above, under a constitutional provision like that in our bill of rights.

In some cases holding these views there has been an omission, at least, to notice any distinction between the rights of an abutting owner, as such, and the public generally, in or as to the streets; but there can be no doubt that there is a substantial and clearly-defined difference. There is incident to abutting property, or its ownership, even where the abutter's fee or title does not extend to the middle of the street, but only to its boundary, certain property rights which the public generally do not possess. They are the right of egress and ingress from and to the lot by the way of the street, and the right of light and air which the street affords. Viewing property to be not the mere corporal subject of ownership, but as being all the rights legally incidental to the ownership of such subject, which rights are generally said to be those of user, exclusion, and disposition, or the right to use, possess, and dispose of, (Lewis, Em. Dom. §§ 54, 55; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 587*b*; Cooley, Const. Lim. 675, 676,) we are satisfied that the rights just mentioned are within the meaning of the word "property," as it is used in this constitutional provision. These incidental rights of property are, under a constitutional guaranty, simply against the "taking" or "appropriation" of property, subordinate to the right of the state, or any duly-authorized governmental agency acting for it, to alter the grade or otherwise improve the streets for street purposes. An original purchaser of an abutting lot, and all subsequent purchasers, take with the implied understanding, or as tacitly agreeing, that the public shall have the right to thus improve or alter the street so far as may be necessary for its use as a street, and that they can sustain no claim for damages resulting to their lots or property from the impairment or destruction of such incidental rights, as a mere consequence from the use or improvement of the streets as highways. Ohio and Kentucky alone, of all the courts of this country, have denied such subordination of these incidental rights to the highway rights of the public. The doctrine of the courts of the other states and of the United States is that, so long as there is no application of the street to purposes other than those of a highway, or no diversion of it from street purposes, any changes of grade made lawfully, and in the exercise of good faith, or not maliciously, or for the purpose of doing injury to the abutter, is not within the constitutional inhibition against taking property without compensation, nor the basis for an action for damages. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 96, and authorities cited in note; Dorman v. City of Jacksonville, supra.

The Ohio doctrine, as summarized by Lewis in his work on Eminent Domain, (pages 121, 122, § 98,) gives a right of recovery, not only under the circumstances indicated above, but also where one builds to an established grade, and it is changed to his damage; or where one builds before a grade is established, but succeeds in anticipating the grade which is afterwards established, and the grade after being so established is changed; or where one builds before a grade is established, and afterwards an unreasonable grade is established. The right of recovery is based, in the later cases there, upon the guaranty that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, (Lewis, Em. Dom. p. 122,) and the property taken is spoken of in these cases as the right of access. In the earlier cases, however, the ground of the decision was that of natural right and justice. Judge Dillon, in a note to his work on Municipal Corporations, (page 1226, § 990,) says, of the doctrine obtaining in this state, that the common-law measure of the liability of municipal corporations has been designedly and deliberately carried beyond the limits established by the current of decision elsewhere.

In Kentucky, in the case of Louisville v. Mill Co., 3 Bush, 416, the grade of the street was to be raised 12 feet above the mill company's lot at the only point of ingress and egress, the improvement entirely closing the passway; and in Bridge Co. v. Foote, 9 Bush, 264, there was sufficient space left between the appellee's lot and the bridge for two wagons to pass abreast; and in the former the abutting owner was held entitled to relief, on the ground that there was a taking of his private property, an interference with his private right of air, light, and passway, while in the latter relief was denied, as there was no interference with the private rights of the appellee; the lessening in value of his lots from the lawful construction of the bridge, and the avenues leading to it, being regarded as mere consequential damages, not constituting a cause of action. See, also, Kemper v. Louisville, 14 Bush, 87; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 99; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp., note to page 1226, § 990. Both Judge Dillon and Mr. Lewis treat the Kentucky doctrine as virtually making the extent of the injury, and not the fact of injury, the basis of municipal liability.

The provision of the Kentucky constitution is: "Nor shall any man's property be taken or applied to public use without the consent of his representatives, and without just compensation being previously made to him." Art. 13, § 14.

In Ohio there are two sections on the subject in the constitution of 1851. They are the nineteenth section of the bill of rights, and the fifth section of the thirteenth, or "Corporations," article, and they read as follows:

"Private property shall ever be held inviolate, but subservient to the public welfare. When taken in time of war or other public exigency, imperatively requiring its immediate seizure, or for the purpose of making or repairing roads which shall be open to the public without charge, a compensation shall be made to the owner in money; and in all other cases where private property shall be taken for public use a compensation therefor shall be first made in money, or first secured by a deposit of money; and such compensation shall be assessed by a jury, without deduction, for benefits to any property of the owner." Section 19, art. 1, "Bill of Rights."

"No right of way shall be appropriated to the use of any corporation until full compensation shall be first made in money, or first secured by a deposit of money, to the owner, irrespective of any benefit from any improvement proposed by such corporation; which compensation shall be ascertained by a jury of twelve men, in a court of record, as shall be prescribed by law." Section 5, art. 13, "Corporations."

The courts of Ohio do not attempt to sustain their peculiar doctrine upon the theory that there is anything exceptional in the constitution of that state. They hold, as indicated above, that there is a "taking" of property. As much as the decisions of Ohio have been discussed by other courts and by commentators, there can be found neither in those discussions, nor in the decisions themselves, any suggestion that the Ohio doctrine is referable to anything peculiar in the constitution of that state. The same is true of the Kentucky decisions.

It is not to be denied that much hardship has resulted to individuals in their property rights from time to time from the established doctrine, nor have the courts failed to appreciate these hardships. In O'Connor v. Pittsburgh, 18 Pa. St. 187, a case in which the city authorities reduced the previously established grade, with reference to which the church of the plaintiff had been constructed, and cut down the street 17 feet in front of the church, Chief Justice GIBSON, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "We have had this cause reargued in order to discover, if possible, some way to relieve the plaintiff consistently with law; but I grieve to say we have discovered none." Still this doctrine has been so firmly established as law, based upon the principle of the rights of the state in highways, and the immunity of itself, and of governmental agencies acting for it, and for the benefit of the people, that, notwithstanding the departure of the Ohio courts, they have found themselves unable to ignore or change it, though suggestions have at times fallen from them as to the advisability of the law-making power doing so. These suggestions, and doubtless a growing sense of the harsh consequences of the doctrine, have led to not only legislative action, but also to changes in the organic law of many states, as shown by the constitutions of Pennsylvania of 1873, and that of Alabama of 1875, by which it is provided that municipal and other corporations, and individuals invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use, shall make just compensation for the property taken, injured, or destroyed; * * * and that of Arkansas of 1874, providing that private property shall not be "taken, appropriated, or damaged;" and those of Illinois of 1870, West Virginia of 1872, Missouri of 1875, Colorado and Texas of 1876, Georgia of 1877, and California of 1879, that it shall not be "taken or damaged." The purpose and the effect of this introduction of the words "injured," "destroyed," or "damaged" was to give compensation for damages often resulting to private property where there was not a "taking" of the property. There being no taking of private property, and consequently no infraction of the constitutional guaranty against taking without making just compensation, there were yet, as just intimated, many cases in which damages resulted to property owners, although the works or improvements were constitutionally authorized by the law making power of a state, and carefully and skillfully executed by governmental agencies. Such damage, not being occasioned by any illegal or wrong act, has found expression in the phrase, damnum absque injuria. It has also become the custom to speak of such damages as "consequential damages," meaning that they are simply the consequence of a legal act, and therefore are not a basis of recovery in the courts, nor of a lawful claim for compensation. It seems not to have been the purpose of these amendments to give a right of recovery for all damaging consequences, resulting from the improvement, to the owner of the property affected, but only for such as affect physically some right of property incident to the abutting property.

This is illustrated by the cases of Edmundson v. Railroad Co., 111 Pa. St. 316, 2 Atl. Rep. 404; Railroad Co. v. Lippincott, 116 Pa. St. 472, 9 Atl. Rep. 871; Chester Co. v. Brower, 117 Pa. St. 647, 12 Atl. Rep. 577; Railroad Co. v. Marchant, 119 Pa. St. 541, 13 Atl. Rep. 690; Railroad Co. v. Walsh, 124 Pa. St. 544, 17 Atl. Rep. 186,—cited by appellant's counsel, and which are decisions under the new provision of the constitution of Pennsylvania, referred to above. This provision, so far as it need be given now, is as follows: "Municipal and other corporations, and individuals invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use, shall make just compensation for property taken, injured, or destroyed by the construction or enlargement of their works, highways, or improvements, which compensation shall be paid or secured before such taking, injury, or destruction." The first case was an action for damages done to plaintiff's buildings and land by negligent blasting and the reckless and careless construction of the road by the contractors. The company had been given the right to enter and construct, and did not enter or construct under the right of eminent domain. It was held, upon the facts of the case, that the company was not liable for the negligence of its contractor, who was exercising an independent employment, and to whom the maxim, respondeat superior, applied; and that a railroad company to which one grants the right to enter upon his land, and construct a road, is not liable for damages resulting as a consequence of the company's entering and constructing; and that the above provision of the constitution did not apply to damages resulting from carelessness or negligence in constructing a railroad. "The words 'injured or destroyed,' as found in this section, as every one knows," says the opinion, "were not designed to change, alter, or limit the nature and effect of corporate contracts, but to impose on those having the right of eminent domain a liability for consequential damages from which they had been previously exempt. * * * To create a liability for injuries of this kind, and to make corporations responsible for such damages, was the object, and only object, of the section under discussion." In the second of the above cases (Railroad Co. v. Lippincott) a railroad company erected on its own land a viaduct, and operated a railroad thereon; and it was held that there could be no recovery for damages resulting to plaintiff's property, lying on the opposite side of the street, from noise, smoke, and dust, the necessary consequence of a due operation of the railroad, no portion of his property having been taken or used in the construction of the viaduct; and that, except on proof of negligence, the lawful use by a railroad company of a lawful erection, entirely upon its own property, was not the subject of damages under the above section of the constitution. It was said by the court that none of the plaintiff's property had been taken, nor any of his rights infringed, so that neither by the constitution, nor by the case quoted, was there warrant for his contention; that over and beyond the damage which arises from the taking of property, whether in the shape of land or a right, the constitution imposed on corporations a direct responsibility for every injury for which a natural person would be liable at common law; and that this was held in the preceding case, but that beyond this they could not go. The third of the above cases (Chester Co. v. Brower) is one in which the county erected a bridge, with stone abutments and piers, on a street over a creek in a borough. The approach or abutment of the bridge was of solid masonry, and extended in front of Brower's lot and house. It is stated that the street could no longer be used except for travel on foot, the travel now passing over the approach and upon the bridge. The conclusion reached was that the county was liable in an action on the case for the consequential damages to the property; and this, though the legislature had not provided a remedy to enforce the right by the provision of the constitution. "There was," observes the opinion, "no taking of the property of the plaintiff by the county for the purpose of constructing the bridge. * * * The claim was for consequential damages caused by the erection of the abutments of the bridge some fourteen feet above the grade of the street in front of the plaintiff's house. It follows that, under the law as it stood at and prior to the adoption of the constitution, he would have been without remedy. Struthers v. Railroad Co., 87 Pa. St. 282, and cases there cited. The constitution of 1874 made a radical change in the law as regards consequential damages." In the fourth case, (Railroad Co. v. Marchant,) in which the facts were quite similar to those in the second case, the decision was that the mischief which the constitutional convention had before it in adopting the above section was the want of a remedy under previous constitutions to obtain compensation when property was injured or destroyed in the construction or enlargement of corporate works, though no portion of it was actually taken by the corporation; and that the remedy provided thereby to secure just compensation by corporations for property "injured or destroyed" has relation to injuries which, though properly termed "consequential," are yet to be understood as confined to such injuries to one's property as are actual, positive, and visible, and are the natural and necessary results of the original construction or enlargement of its works by a corporation, and of such certain character that compensation therefor may be ascertained at the time the works are being constructed or enlarged, and paid or secured, as provided in the constitution in advance; that a railroad corporation which has constructed its railroad on its own property in a city, without taking any portion of another's property, is not liable for those indirect injuries which are the result merely of the operation of its road in a lawful manner, and without negligence, unskillfulness, or malice; that the provision was not intended to impose on corporations a liability in the operation of their works which has never been imposed on individuals. The remaining case (Railroad Co. v. Walsh) decides that where a railroad is laid down upon a public street, and, though at grade, is so constructed with reference to the property of an abutting owner that by its operation in a lawful manner access to the property, if not cut off, is rendered dangerous, the company is liable for consequential damages under the constitution. The distinction between this case and those of Lippincott and Marchant is that in the latter there was no injury by reason of the construction of the road, whereas here it was the direct result of the construction; the track being laid close to the curb-stone on the side of the street next to plaintiff's property, with the effect indicated. See, also, Railroad Co. v. Ziemer, 124 Pa. St. 560, 17 Atl. Rep. 187. The case cited from Alabama (City Council v. Maddox, 89 Ala. 181, 7 South. Rep. 433) holds, under a constitutional provision similar to that of Pennsylvania, omitting the words "or secured," that the liability of a municipal corporation extends to all cases of injury caused by grading or cutting down streets or sidewalks, without regard to the original dedication or condemnation, or to damages paid on former occasions; the measure of damages in every case being the difference in the market value of the property before and after grading.

There is in these Pennsylvania and Alabama decisions nothing, considering the provisions of our constitution, that aids appellants.

We are unable to find in either or all of the three sections of our constitution a justification for the theory of appellant's counsel that the use of the term "right of way," in the last of the three sections, was intended as an adoption of the rule allowing indirect or consequential damages. We do not doubt that the abutting owner's right of access, or of ingress and egress, from and to the street, and of light and air from the open space above or over the surface of the street, are easements and private property incidental to the ownership of the abutting lot, nor that these easements cannot be "taken" or "appropriated" without just compensation being made for them as such property. This is fully demonstrated by the

New York Elevated Railroad cases: Story v. Railroad Co., 90 N. Y. 122, (decided in 1882;) Lahr v. Railroad Co., 104 N. Y. 268, 10 N. E. Rep. 528; and Abendroth v. Railroad Co., 122 N. Y. 1, 25 N. E. Rep. 496, —hereafter to be noticed; and by other authorities, as indicated both above and hereafter.

Whatever meaning we give to the expression "right of way," we still find nothing in the constitution that places it within the protection or inhibition of that instrument, unless such right of way is "taken" or "appropriated." These words "taken" and "appropriated," it seems to us, were used in their well-defined sense, and in no other. There is nothing in the proceedings of the constitutional convention which justifies an inference that these words were used in any other sense, or that the framers of that instrument intended to give compensation for damages or injury other than such as should result from a taking or appropriation, as distinguished from consequential damages.

An examination of these proceedings proves that the clause of the bill of rights was adopted on the 3d day of July, and without anything to distinguish its consideration. Journal Const. Conv. 1885, pp. 229, 230.

The first time anything like the twenty-ninth section of article 16, "Miscellaneous Provisions," appears to have been brought to the attention of the convention, was the 11th day of the same month, and in the seventh section of an article reported by the minority of the committee on private corporations. The majority had recommended two sections to constitute an article to be entitled "Private Corporations," and substantially the same as those finally adopted July 21st, and now constituting sections 30 and 31 of article 16; they being intended to prevent unjust discrimination and unjust charges by common carriers and others performing services of a public nature, and prohibiting common carriers from granting free passes or discounting fares of members of the legislature and salaried officers of the state. The seventh section of the article reported by the minority of the committee as an article to be entitled "Private Corporations" uses the words "no property," instead of "no private property nor right of way," and does not use the word "individual." This minority report was indefinitely postponed on the 18th of July, notice of motion for a reconsideration of the note being given.

On the 21st of July, the sixteenth article being under consideration, the following were offered as additional sections, and were referred to the committee on miscellaneous provisions:

"The right of drainage, and the means to secure it, shall be promoted and protected, and the right of way through inferior lands for the drainage of superior by the direct, as well as by the natural, course shall be provided for and enforced: provided, that the cost and damage of such easement may be assessed in proportion to benefit upon the lands of the parties applying for the same: and provided, further, that the owners of lands bearing the servitude shall be entitled to just compensation from the parties so applying."

"The right to collect rates or compensation for the use of water supplies to any county, city, or town, or the inhabitants thereof, is a franchise, and cannot be exercised except by authority of and in the manner prescribed by law."

The committee, on the 24th of July, reported these sections back to the convention, recommending the former to the favorable consideration of the convention, but the latter "without recommendation," and on the next day they were referred to the judiciary committee. On the 29th of the month this committee reported, as a substitute for the same, what is now the twenty-eighth section of article 16, as it is given above, it having been adopted by the convention on the last day of July.

On the 24th of July, the sixteenth article being under consideration, there was offered a section to be entitled "Private property, how taken for public use," the first paragraph of it being: "No private property of persons or corporations shall be taken or damaged for public use, in the construction of railroads, canals, or if taken for other purposes, under chartered rights, without just compensation to be paid for the same." This proposed section was also referred to the committee on miscellaneous provisions, and on the 28th day of that month it reported as a substitute for the same what is now the twenty-ninth section of the sixteenth article, as given at the outset of this opinion, it having been adopted on the last day of July.

These proceedings, if they indicate anything, tend to the conviction that the purpose of the convention was, as shown by its final action, to exclude from the constitution any provision for compensation for damage other than where there was a taking or appropriation of property. If such was not the intention, the word "damaged," or its equivalent, would have been put in the twenty-ninth section; such word being in the proposed provision for which it was a substitute.

It is not to be assumed that the judges and lawyers who sat in the convention did not understand what the meaning of the words "taken" or "appropriated" was then what it is now, or did not know that the abutting owner's right of access and other easements indicated were private property. The expression "private property," in so far as we can see, certainly includes any right of way which is the subject of private property, and, unless the words "right of way" mean a public right of way, we can find in them nothing that adds to the effect which the expression "private property," or the entire section, would have without them. We, however, do not mean to intimate that the expression "right of way" includes or applies to a mere public right of way; and we may remark that it does not occur to us that the purpose of the section in which these words are to be found was so much to specify what should never be taken without just compensation as it was to declare the cases in which there shall be no taking without either previous payment, or a security by deposit of money, of the compensation for such taking, ascertained in the manner indicated. It is entirely clear that the state, acting for itself, is not, even if a municipal corporation is, within the terms or spirit of this section, in so far as it prescribes anything not implied by the more general provision of the twelfth section of the declaration of rights. We state these views not as committing ourselves finally to the meaning of the words "right of way," in connection with any future case distinguishable from this, nor as precluding the recognition of any now undiscovered legal effect they may have been intended to establish. Giesy v. Railroad Co., 4 Ohio St. 308, 328, et seq.

The New York Elevated Railroad cases, mentioned above, and decided under a constitutional provision similar to that in our declaration of rights, are relied upon as sustaining the appellants' cause. In the second of these cases, that of Lahr, 104 N. Y. 268, 10 N. E. Rep. 528, the conclusions of the Story Case are stated to be, in effect, as follows: (1) That an elevated railroad in the streets of a city operated by steam, and constructed as there described, (about 15 feet above the surface of the street, supported on columns placed along and partly inside of the outer edge of the sidewalk, and about 11 feet from Story's building, a warehouse, and extending across the whole traveled track of the street, the structure and passing trains to some extent, as found by the trial court, obscuring the light and impairing the usefulness of the premises, and the line of columns abridging the sidewalk and interfering with the street as a thoroughfare,) was a perversion of the use of the street from the purposes for which it was originally designed, and a use which neither the city authorities nor the legislature could legalize or sanction without providing compensation for the injury inflicted upon abutting owners. (2) That abutters upon a public street, claiming title to their premises by grant from the municipality, it covenanting that a street to be laid out in front of the premises should forever continue for the free and common passage and as the public streets and ways for all persons passing or returning through or by the same, in like manner as the existing streets in the city are or ought to be, acquire an easement in the bed of the street for ingress and egress to and from their premises, and also for the free and uninterrupted passage and circulation of light and air through and over such street, for the benefit of property situated thereon. (3) That the ownership of such easement is an interest in the real estate, constituting "property," within the meaning of that term as used in the constitution, and for which compensation must be made before it can be lawfully taken. (4) That the erection of an elevated railroad, the use of which was intended to be permanent, in a public street, and upon which cars are propelled by steam-engines generating gas, steam, and smoke, and distributing in the air cinders, dust, ashes, and other noxious and deleterious substances, and interrupting the free passage of light and air to and from adjoining premises, constitutes a taking of the easement, and its appropriation by the railroad corporation, rendering it liable to the abutters by the damage occasioned by such taking.

It was further held in Lahr's Case that no legal difference exists, with reference to the interest acquired by abutting owners in a public street, where the title is like that held by Story, and where it is one acquired through mesne conveyances from the original owner, whose property has been taken by proceedings in invitum, instituted by the municipality under a public statute for acquiring land for street purposes; such statute providing that the land thus taken shall be held "in trust, nevertheless, that the same be appropriated and kept open for or as a part of a public street * * * forever, in like manner as the other public streets * * * in said city are and of right ought to be." In Abendroth's Case, 122 N. Y. 1, 25 N. E. Rep. 496, the decision was that though the title of the owner of the abutting lot extends only to the side of the street, and the owner thereof has no interest in the street except as the owner of such abutting lot, he has incorporeal private rights in the street which are incident to his lot, and are private property, within the meaning of the constitutional provision forbidding their being taken for public use without just compensation; and that it is no justification to their impairment that the act complained of is done pursuant to legislative authority.

It is apparent from the above statement of these decisions, and no one giving a careful and fair consideration to the opinions can fail to be so impressed, that the appropriation of the streets to the use of such railroads is held to be a diversion of the streets from highway purposes to the new and inconsistent purpose of an elevated railroad, and that this diversion is what, in the judgment of the court, constitutes the legal invasion and unlawful taking or appropriation of the easements incident to the abutting lot; and it is equally apparent upon the face of the opinions that the doctrine they sustain does not and was not intended to conflict with the views announced in the previous portions of this opinion, as to the power of a municipality over streets, so long as it does not divert the street from the original purposes for which it was established, or seek to apply it to other than street uses. The importance of the principle and interests involved, justify proofs of this assertion by extracts from the opinions. Answering the argument of the railroad company made upon the basis of Transportion Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 635, where the claim against the city was for damages for an obstruction to the plaintiff's docks by the deposit of materials, the construction of a coffer-dam, and other work necessary to the building of a tunnel for the extension of a street, it is said in Story's Case: "The work was a necessary city improvement, and the interruption and obstruction was temporary, ceasing with the completion of the work. It was held that the plaintiff could not recover; and this, upon the principle applied and practiced upon in all our cities, that the municipality, whether owners of the fee of the street or vested with an easement only, may repair or improve it, 'to adopt it to easy and safe passage.' It permits the leveling of a street by filling up or digging away, and, if intersected by a stream, the erection of a bridge or tunnel. If, in doing either of these things, materials are necessarily collected, or an excavation made, to the present and temporary detriment of a lot-owner, he cannot complain. His ownership is subject to the exercise of this public right, and he must submit to the inconvenience in order that the street may be preserved. So, in placing a pavement or excavating for a sewer, the stone for the one, or the dirt from the other, may for a time inconvenience the lot-owner. To this in like manner he must submit, as to a burden provided for in his grant, or as one of the terms implied by his location upon a public avenue." Again, it is observed: "It is no doubt true that the grade of a street or highway may be altered by raising it or lowering it, without liability on the part of the municipality to the abutter; but this is on the ground that the public had already paid a full compensation for all damage to be done by them to the adjacent owners by any reasonable or convenient mode of grading the way. But the principle applicable to such a case does not aid the defendant. There is no change in the street surface intended, but the elevation of a structure useless for general street purposes, and as foreign thereto as the house in Vesey street, (Corning v. Lowerre, 6 Johns. Ch. 439,) or the freight depot, (Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 324.)" And speaking of the surface railway cases, (People v. Kerr, 27 N. Y. 188, and Kellinger v. Railway Co., 50 N. Y. 206,) it is said: "The use of the streets permitted was not inconsistent with the purposes of the trust." It is also remarked in the opinion delivered by Judge TRACY (90 N. Y. 170) that, while the legislature may regulate the uses of the street as a street, it has no power to authorize a structure thereon which is subversive of and repugnant to the uses of a street as an open public street; and that whether a particular structure authorized by the legislature is consistent or inconsistent with the uses of a street, as a street, must be largely a question of fact, depending upon the nature and character of the structure authorized. In Lahr's Case it is observed that an abutting owner necessarily enjoys certain advantages from the open street, which belong to him by reason of the location of his property, and are not enjoyed by the general public, such as the easements referred to above; and that they are not only valuable to him for sanitary purposes, but indispensable to the proper and beneficial enjoyment of his property, and are legitimate subjects of estimate by the public authorities in raising a fund necessary to defray the cost of constructing the street; and that he is compelled to pay for these advantages and rights at their full value; and if, in the next instant, they may by legislative authority be taken away and diverted to inconsistent uses, a system has been inaugurated which resembles more nearly legalized robbery than any other form of acquiring property. And it is also further said that the right which the municipality acquires is limited by the public necessity, and, in the case before the court, could not extend beyond its use for street purposes; and all other uses which might be enjoyed therein, consistent with its use as a street, must, from necessity, have remained in and resided with the person from whom it was taken, even after the transfer of the fee to the municipality. Afterwards it is declared that "the logical effect of the decision in the Story Case is to so construe the constitution as to operate as a restriction upon the legislative power over the public streets opened under the act of 1813, and confine its exercise to such legislation as shall authorize their use for street purposes alone. Whenever any other use is attempted to be authorized, it exceeds its constitutional authority. Statutes relating to public streets, which attempt to authorize their use for additional street uses, are obviously within the power of the legislature to enact; but questions arising under such legislation are inapplicable to the questions here involved. Such are the cases in respect to the changes of grade; the use of a street for a surface horse railroad; the laying of sewers, gas, and water-pipes beneath the soil; the erection of street-lamps and hitching-posts, and of poles for electric lights used for street lighting. All of these relate to street uses, sanctioned as such by their obvious purpose and long-continued usage, and authorized by the appropriation of land for a public street." 104 N. Y. 291–293, 10 N. E. Rep. 528.

These extracts clearly sustain the assertion in behalf of which they are invoked.

The practical deduction to be made from the preceding discussion is that, if what is sought to be enjoined is only an application of the street to additional street purposes, there is, in the absence of any physical invasion of the abutting lots, no taking or appropriation of any property or right of way of complainants, within the meaning of the prohibition of the constitution. Without intimating what effect allegations charging malice, negligence, or unskillfulness would have in an equitable suit of this character, it is clear that there are no such allegations in the record.

The theory of the bill is that the viaduct is being erected by the four railroad companies, and the county of Duval and city of Jacksonville, under and in accordance with the agreement there set out, and that the purpose of the agreement was to erect the viaduct over and above the numerous railroad tracks crossing said street, and to put the street railway on the viaduct, and make the surface of the viaduct, instead of the original surface of the street, the grade for the passage of the public as they should come and go. It would be idle to contend that the complainants are not damaged, at least consequentially, independent of any benefits which may accrue from the improvement. In so far as we can understand the facts, they are to be completely shut in and cut off from any communication with the other portions of Jacksonville and the rest of the world, except by the St. Johns river, unless they shall, at their own expense, construct some way to reach the surface of the viaduct from their lots or improvements on the same, and there will be also an abridgment of light and air. The appellant's case, however, presented by the record before us, is not that the necessity of constructing the viaduct was produced by the laying of railroad tracks across Commercial street, and that, as a result of such railroad construction, that portion of said street was converted by the municipal agency into other than street purposes, and the object of the viaduct was to accomplish this end. We express no opinion on such a case, as it is not presented. If it be that the construction of this viaduct under and pursuant to the agreement is a diversion of the street from its highway purposes, there can be no doubt or question that there has been a taking of complainants' easements without compensation, and in violation of the provision of the bill of rights, and of the twenty-ninth section of the sixteenth article of our organic law; but under the state of the pleadings, and the manner of the submission of the cause before us, we cannot consider this question, but are confined to a judgment of the case as one in which the municipal government of Jacksonville is erecting the viaduct, not as a joint party with the others to the agreement, and acting under it, to meet a result necessitated by the existence of the railway track, but in the exercise of its chartered powers to change the grade of the street, though under an agreement with the several parties named as co-defendants, by which they are to contribute to the expense of the construction of the viaduct, by which the grade will be so changed. It is not contended that if the conditions exist which will justify the city, in the exercise of its powers, as such, to change the grade of the street, the change cannot be made by means of a viaduct; nor that the street conditions are not such as authorize the city to erect a viaduct for the purpose of changing the grade, if it has power to do so without first compensating complainants for the alleged taking of or damage to their property. The city, appearing alone, has tendered issue upon the theory that it is doing the work of itself, and under and by virtue solely of its own organic powers to grade streets, with, it is true, pecuniary aid from the parties named as co-defendants; and complainants have accepted the issue, and contend that the city has not, under its charter and the constitution of the state, power to change a grade of a street without first making compensation for damages resulting from an interference with the complainants' easement of access, light, and air, although there is no encroachment upon or invasion of complainants' premises.

The charter act, (chapter 3775 of the Statutes,) approved May 31, 1887, provides, in section 4 of article 3, that the mayor and city council shall have power, by ordinance, to make appropriations to alter, widen, extend, grade, or otherwise improve, clean, and keep in repair, streets, alleys, and sidewalks; and also enacts that it shall have power, in like manner, to take and appropriate grounds for widening streets, or parts thereof, when the public convenience may require it, provided the owner or owners thereof shall receive compensation for the same. The act further provides (section 8, art. 5) that the board of public works shall have exclusive power and control over the construction, supervision, cleaning, repairing, grading, and improving of all streets, and to fix and establish the grades of all streets and alleys, avenues and thoroughfares. These provisions give full power to fix and change the grade of streets, and they do not provide that any compensation shall be made by the city to abutting owners for any taking of or damage to their property, in fixing or changing the grade, and hence none can be required of the city against its will, or in the absence of a binding stipulation, unless there is a diversion of the street from street purposes, or other appropriation of the abutter's property, within the meaning of the constitutional provision heretofore mentioned.

The fact that a street railway may be put on a viaduct which a city lawfully erects, as a means of duly grading a street, will not render the viaduct otherwise or alone a diversion of the street from highway purposes, or be a ground for enjoining the erection of the viaduct for street purposes, even if the erection of the viaduct for the purpose of such a railway would be a diversion of the street, and the subject for an injunction. The construction of a viaduct for street purposes should not be interfered with, although the subsequent erection thereon of a street railway should, when about to be begun, be the subject of an injunction.

If the viaduct is being erected under the agreement among other purposes for that of a street railroad, or if it is being erected under the agreement for the purposes of carrying the street over the railroad tracks, which railroad companies are authorized under certain circumstances to do,—but whether independent of or subject to the constitutional provision as to making compensation for taking the easements of abutting owners we do not say,—the railroad companies were entitled to be heard. No such case has, however, been made before us. We have discussed and decided the only case presented, and our judgment is that the order refusing the injunction was proper, and should be affirmed.

It will be ordered accordingly.

JACKSONVILLE, T. & K. W. RY. CO. v. ADAMS.

(Supreme Court of Florida. Dec. 21, 1891.)

EMINENT DOMAIN—DAMAGES—EJECTMENT.

1. A judgment in ejectment against a body having the power of eminent domain is not a bar to the exercise by such body of such power as to the land recovered in the action of ejectment.

2. Where a body possessing the power of eminent domain has entered upon land without leave of the owner, and without complying with the law regulating the exercise of such power, it may condemn the property entered upon, and thereby secure the right to the legal possession and enjoyment thereof; and this, whether it has or has not been ousted from its former or illegal possession.

3. Where a railroad company, having the power of eminent domain, has entered upon land without the consent of the land-owner, and without complying with the law regulating the exercise of such power, and has constructed a railroad track thereon, the value of the improvements thus put by the company on the land cannot be included in estimating the damags sustained by the land-owner, in proceedings subsequently instituted under such law by the company or its legal successor, having similar power, to condemn the land, or an easement therein, to the company's use; and this, whether the company has been ousted from the former possession or not.

4. Where a railroad company, having the power of eminent domain, has entered upon land without the consent of the owner, and without a certain material requirement of the law regulating the exercise of such power having been complied with, and there has been a judgment in ejectment in favor of the land-owner against such company or its legal successor, a lessee for 90 years, and the judgment is affirmed on appeal, the appellate court may,—no conduct in bad faith upon the part of the company appearing—withhold its mandate of possession to allow a reasonable time for the institution and consummation of new condemnation proceedings. If the new condemnation proceedings are resisted by the land-owner, and are dismissed by the trial court, on the ground that there is no constitutional law authorizing the same, and this order is appealed from by the company, the appellate court may withhold its mandate for possession until the decision of such appeal; but it should do so only upon the express condition that its action shall not interfere with the land-owner's right to sue for mesne profits for the use or retention of the land by the company.

Appeal from circuit court, Volusia county; JOHN D. BROOME, Judge.

Ejectment by Charles S. Adams, administrator of John S. Adams, deceased, against the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Motion for new trial denied, and defendant appeals. Affirmed. Motion by defendant to withhold the mandate of possession until condemnation proceedings could be prosecuted. Motion allowed. And, pending a consideration of the subject, plaintiff moved that the mandate for possession be sent down. Motion denied.

A. W. Cockrell & Son, for plaintiff. J. R. Parrott, T. M. Day, Jr., and Fletcher & Warts, for defendant.

RANEY, C. J. In the main opinion in this cause (27 Fla. —, 9 South. Rep. 2) a judgment in ejectment in favor of the appellee, who was plaintiff, was affirmed. Having discovered in our investigations that it was the practice in some appellate courts to withhold the mandate of possession until condemnation proceedings could be prosecuted, we suggested that any motion for such withholding must be made within 30 days. A motion of the character indicated was made by appellant and resisted by appellee, and the mandate for possession was withheld for full consideration of the point.

Pending our consideration of the subject the appellee moved that the mandate for possession should be sent down, the grounds of this motion being (1) that sufficient time had elapsed to enable the appellant to institute and consummate the proceedings contemplated in the order of the court withholding the mandate; (2) that proceedings had in fact been instituted and pursued to a final judgment of the circuit court of Volusia county, rendered August 10, 1891, refusing to confirm the condemnation of the lands now occupied by the appellant, and sought to be condemned,—such refusal being on the ground (urged by the appellee) that, since the adoption of the present constitution of this state, there has been no valid, constitutional legislation authorizing such condemnation.

As stated in the main opinion, the original condemnation proceedings were instituted in August, 1885, not by the appellant company, but by the Atlantic Coast, St. Johns & Indian River Railroad Company, of which the appellant company leased the road in December of the same year for the period of 99 years. It is now shown that on the 1st day of April of the present year, and within less than 30 days of the filing of the former opinion,—it having been filed March 4th,—the appellant company filed a petition in the circuit court of Volusia county, signed and sworn to by an attorney of the company, stating that the company exists under the laws of the state; that the railroad of the company is now constructed on and across the lands in question, (describing them,) and that such lands are essential for the use of the corporation, and that the corporation has made its survey and maps thereof, by which its road or line is designated, and that it has located its road according to such survey, and has filed certificate of such location, signed by the engineer of the corporation, in the office of the clerk of the circuit court of Volusia county; that the use of such lands is necessary for the purpose of operating the railroad, and that petitioner has not acquired the right to use the same; that petitioner is in possession of the portion of the land actually occupied by the railroad track; and that the appellee, administrator, etc., is in possession of the balance, and that he and Helen Maria Adams, in their own right, own or claim to own the land. The prayer of the petition is for an order for summoning a jury to appraise and value the land, and fix the amount of compensation to be paid to the owners, and for such proceedings as are requisite for the petitioner to acquire the right to hold and use the premises for its corporate purposes.

On the day last named the circuit judge made an order directing the sheriff to summon 12 disinterested freeholders, registered voters of Volusia county, as a jury to meet at the court-house on the 7th day of the same month, at an hour stated, to proceed under their oaths, duly administered so to do, to take steps to appraise and value the land described in said petition and order, and to fix the amount of the compensation to be made to the owners of the land by the petitioning corporation. On the 8th of April the jury, who appear to have been sworn, met on the premises,—Charles S. Adams appearing for himself in person, and Helen M. Adams appearing by him as her attorney; and the jury then proceeded to view the land, and "heard the allegations of the parties," and "appraised, ascertained, and determined" the value of the tract of land proposed to be taken, and the damage that would be sustained by the owner by reason of the taking thereof, at $50, and they fixed the amount of compensation to be made to Charles S. Adams, as administrator, at the same amount, and found that he, as such administrator, had the sole estate therein; and they state in their report that such "report and verdict are concurred in by ten of the jurors." It is, however, signed by the entire 12.

To this report Charles S. Adams, as administrator and individually, and Helen M. Adams, filed objections, of which the fifteenth and subsequent are as follows: That, since the constitution of 1885 became operative, there are no constitutional legislative proceedings authorizing the condemnation proceedings herein sought to be instituted; (16) that chapter 3595, Acts 1885, as amended by chapter 3712, Acts 1887, does not preserve to the land-owner whose land is sought to be condemned "the right of trial by jury" secured by section 29 of article 16 of the constitution, and is void; (17) that such legislation, so far as it involves jury trials, is offensive to section 20 of article 3 of the constitution, which constitutional provision forbids the legislature from passing special or local laws in regard to summoning and impaneling grand and petit juries; (18) such legislation is offensive to section 3 of the declaration of rights,—"the right of trial by jury shall be secured to all, and remain inviolate forever;" (19) the sum of $50 is wholly inadequate as damages; (20) such legislation is offensive to section 11 of article 5 of the constitution, which ordains a separation of the jurisdiction of the circuit court in cases at law and in equity; and for other and further grounds apparent upon the face of the proceedings.

On the 10th day of August the circuit judge made an order sustaining the exceptions and protests, and refusing a confirmation of the report, and also refusing "to order further proceedings in this matter, on the ground of the unconstitutionality of the law authorizing the same," and dismissing the "case;" to all of which the petitioner excepted.

Upon the entry of this order the railroad company entered its appeal to the ensuing term of this court, the judge fixing the penalty of the appeal-bond at $300, which bond has been approved; and the transcript of appeal has been filed in this court, and citation issued, and service thereof acknowledged.

It is urged as a reason why the mandate should be issued, or should not be withheld, that the appellee will be entitled to damages on the basis of the value of the land, including the cross-ties and rails and road-bed or works put and constructed on the land by the company. This, in our judgment, is not the law. It is true that if persons or corporations vested with the power of eminent domain enter upon and appropriate private property to their use, without the consent of the owner, before taking the steps required by law to condemn the same, the owner may resort to trespass for damages, ejectment for possession, or to equity for an injunction against the use of the land. Still, where such an illegal entry has been made by a body possessing the power of eminent domain, it may condemn the property entered upon, and thus secure a right to the possession and enjoyment thereof. If an entry has been made by the express or implied consent of the land-owner, it is clear that he should not have the value of what has been put upon the land; and the better authority is that the same rule also applies in the absence of any consent by the owner. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 507; Baker v. Railroad Co., 57 Mo. 265.

Though, as a general rule, things affixed to the freehold so as to be a part thereof become, as against a trespasser or person entering tortiously and affixing them, the property of the owner of the soil, this rule is not applicable as against a body having the power of eminent domain, and entering without leave and making improvements for the public purpose for which it was created and given such power. The principle controlling the land-owner's right to damages in such cases is that he shall have compensation for the damage actually sustained by him, and no more, and that the trespasser's liability shall be likewise limited. This principle is affirmed in Mississippi, Michigan, Iowa, Illinois, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Oregon, Pennsylvania, and Alabama. Railroad Co. v. Dickson, 63 Miss. 380; Morgan's Appeal, 39 Mich. 675; Railroad Co. v. Dunlap, 47 Mich. 456, 11 N. W. Rep. 271; Daniels v. Railroad Co., 41 Iowa, 52; Railroad Co. v. Goodwin, 111 Ill. 273; Greve v. Railway Co., 26 Minn. 66, 1 N. W. Rep. 816; Lyon v. Railroad Co., 42 Wis. 538; Navigation Co. v. Mosier, 14 Or. 519, 13 Pac. Rep. 300; Justice v. Railroad Co., 87 Pa. St. 28; Jones v. Railroad Co., 70 Ala. 227. See, also, Railroad Co. v. Booraem, 28 N. J. Eq. 450; Burgess v. Clark, 13 Ired. 109; Railroad Co. v. Deal, 90 N. C. 110; Railroad Co. v. Matthews, 60 Tex. 215; Dietrich v. Murdock, 42 Mo. 279; Railroad Co. v. Allen, 100 Ind. 409, 415, 416; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 507.

The railroad company, say the supreme court of Mississippi in the case from that state cited above, was a trespasser in constructing its road upon land over which it had not acquired the right of way, but it still had the right to acquire the right of way unaffected by the liability incurred for its trespass; and the trespass is not involved in the determination of the due compensation. The continuing right of the company to secure the right of way, in accordance with its charter, and the nature of its entry on the land and annexing chattels to the soil, distinguish the case from that of a trespasser who affixes chattels to the freehold; and the rule of the common law, established when railroads were unknown, is not applicable. In the latter of the cases cited from Michigan, it being an appeal in a condemnation proceeding, a previous proceeding had been taken by the company, which had thereupon entered and built; and afterwards the condemnation was set aside by the supreme court, on appeal, because there had been no notice to Dunlap, the land-owner. Afterwards the company instituted the new condemnation proceedings. "The railroad company, whether rightfully or wrongfully," says the opinion, "laid this track while in possession, and for purposes entirely distinct from any use of the land as an isolated parcel. It would be absurd to apply to land so used, and to a railroad track laid on it, the technical rules which apply in some other cases to structures inseparably attached to the freehold. Whatever rule might apply in case of abandonment, it is clear that this superstructure was never designed to be incorporated with the soil except for purposes attending the possession, and in proceeding to obtain a legal and permanent right to occupy the land for this very purpose. There would be no sense in compelling them to buy their own property. Whatever right of redress, if any, Dunlap may have, for the tortious occupancy previous to these proceedings, or whatever right of property he might have in case the company abandoned the road entirely, and left the track untouched, we think that so long as it is in possession, and legal measures are proceeding to secure a right to retain it there, this structure belongs to the company, whether intruders or not." In Daniels v. Railroad Co., supra, Daniels, without whose permission the company had entered and built, recovered judgment in an action for possession against the company, and the judgment was affirmed on appeal, (Daniels v. Railroad Co., 35 Iowa, 129;) and then the company instituted condemnation proceedings. "Plaintiff," says the opinion, "has suffered no greater damage than would have occurred to him had the defendants pursued the course pointed out by the statute which they are now, by this proceeding, pursuing. By these proceedings plaintiff is not deprived of the title to the land. The defendant acquires nothing more than the right to occupy it for railroad purposes. Had they been instituted prior to or upon defendants' taking possession of the land, no different right would have been acquired by them than they obtain in the present action. In each case the measure of the plaintiff's damages is the same, namely, the value of the land, without regard to benefits resulting from the improvement." In the same state it is held that a railroad company acquires no right to the land until payment of damages. Henry v. Railway Co., 10 Iowa, 540. The just compensation required to be given, observes the supreme court of Illinois in Railroad Co. v. Goodwin, is for that which is taken from the owner, and which is of value to him, and not for something he never owned. In Justice v. Railroad Co., supra,—the Pennsylvania Case,—there had also been a judgment in ejectment in favor of the land-owners. The court held that the entry was not the case of a mere trespass by one having no authority to enter, but of one representing the state herself, clothed with the power of eminent domain, having the right to enter and place the materials on the land taken for public use,—materials essential to the very purpose which the state has declared in the grant of the charter,—yet a trespass, by reason of the omission to do an act required for the security of the citizen, to-wit, to make compensation or give security for it; for which injury the citizen is entitled to redress, but not beyond his injury, nor extending to taking the personal chattels of the railroad company laid down for the benefit of the public. The salient features distinguishing the case from that of an ordinary trespass were held to be the right to enter on the land under the authority of law to build a railroad for public use; the acquisition thereby of a mere easement in the land; the entire absence of an intention to dedicate the chattels entering into its construction to the use of the land; the necessity for their use in the execution of the public purpose; and, lastly, the power to retain and possess the chattels, and the structures they compose, by a valid proceeding at law, notwithstanding the original illegality of the entry. The reasoning of the supreme court of Alabama in Jones v. Railroad Co., supra, is substantially the same as that of the Pennsylvania court.

The cases relied upon by the appellee to support his contention do not overcome the conclusions reached by us. In Railway Co. v. Stanley's Heirs, 35 N. J. Eq. 253, the same rule as to damages was enforced, and an injunction granted to restrain an action of ejectment. The original entry had, however, been made under an agreement between a predecessor railroad company and the land-owner, of which agreement such railroad company had not, nor had any of its successors, carried out the undertaking to erect a certain depot. It was remarked in this case, as pointed out by appellee's counsel, that on no other hypothesis than this agreement would the appellant have a standing in court to stay the land-owner's suit for possession; but of this language it is observed in Railroad Co. v. Kamlah, 42 N. J. Eq. 93, 98, 6 Atl. Rep. 444, that the court was not laying down the rule to be observed in all cases, but was speaking merely with reference to the particular circumstances of that case. Schroeder v. De Graff, 28 Minn. 299, 9 N. W. Rep. 857, was an action of trespass to recover damages against a railroad company for constructing a road across the plaintiff's land without his permission; and it was held that if the ties and rails had increased the value of the farm the fact of such increase should be considered in estimating the amount of damages, but, if the farm was in no way benefited or enhanced in value by the ties and rails being laid across it, no deduction from the damage actually done to the farm should be made on account of the value of the ties and rails. The question of whether the value of the ties and rails should be excluded or be included in valuing the land on a condemnation proceeding was not before the court, nor mentioned. It is true the lower court instructed the jury, in connection with the doctrine just stated, that the ties and rails had become a part of the realty; but the theory of the decision as to the rule of damages was that the land-owner could not be made the unwilling purchaser of the ties and rails, or required to pay for them, by crediting their value on damages done the land in constructing the road. In Cohen v. Railroad Co., 34 Kan. 158, 8 Pac. Rep. 138, the railroad company had entered with the assent of the plaintiff or his agent, and the plaintiff sued in trespass. There was on the land at the time of the entry an old grade which had been constructed by another company and abandoned. It was held that the increased value given to the land by the presence of the old grade should be considered in estimating the damages, but that such increased value was not necessarily what it had cost to build the grade; yet it was also held that no recovery could be had for the increased value given the land by the improvements put on it by the defendant company. In this opinion it is, moreover, said: "It has even been held that where a railroad company enters upon land as a technical trespasser, and afterwards procures the land for its right of way by condemnation proceedings, it is not compelled to pay for the improvements which it itself made upon the land while it was technically a trespasser, and before it legally procured its right of way." Citing 87 Pa. St. 28; 41 Iowa, 52; 42 Wis. 538; 26 Minn. 66, 1 N. W. Rep. 816, supra. "This," observes the opinion, "seems like justice." The decision in Hunt v. Railway Co., 76 Mo. 115, is that where a railroad company, having obtained a decree for the condemnation of a tract of land without the knowledge of the owner, erected upon it a building of a permanent character for a depot, and afterwards the decree was held void, the building becomes a part of the realty, and could not be removed by the company. The facts in Price v. Ferry Co., 31 N. J. Eq. 31, were that a railroad was built on land on which complainant held a mortgage of prior date, duly recorded, and the charter of the company did not permit the building of the road there, but expressly prohibited it. The road was not built under condemnation proceedings, but under a grant of right of way from the mortgagor. The question was whether one having a lien on the railroad for building the same could have the track or improvements reserved from a sale under the mortgage. The opinion holds that there was no paramount power of condemnation, like that in Railroad Co. v. Booraem, 28 N. J. Eq. 450, cited supra,—no power (the right of eminent domain) to take the property superior to the right of both mortgagor and mortgagee; that where such power exists it confers the power to take the property on making just compensation, which compensation, in so far as the value of the land is concerned, is to be estimated as of the time when possession is taken, and therefore cannot include the value of improvements subsequently put on the property by the party entering under such right; but when the entry is not under that right the right to take the property on making compensation does not exist, and the party entering and improving does both subject to the right of the prior mortgagee to sell both the land and such improvements. Meriam v. Brown, 128 Mass. 391, is to the effect that a railroad corporation which has constructed its track upon a person's land without filing a written location or presenting a plan thereof, or paying or tendering to the land-owner any damages for the land so taken, cannot enter upon the land for the purpose of removing the rails laid upon the road-bed, and structures placed upon the land,—such property becomes a part of the realty; and the fact that the original entry and construction were made without objection from the mortgagor in possession cannot avail against the title acquired by the mortgagee by the subsequent foreclosure of the mortgage. The mortgage was of a date prior to the construction of the road. Railroad Co. v. Kinsey, 87 Ind. 514, decides that where a railroad company has entered, as it legally might, under condemnation proceedings, it having deposited the amount assessed by the appraisers, and there is an appeal, and on the appeal the assessment has been increased, but the company has not paid the increased amount, the owner may recover in ejectment without paying for the improvements placed on the land. In Graham v. Railroad Co., 36 Ind. 463, the conclusion reached is that where a railroad company has, without the consent of the owner, and without color of title, entered upon land, and occupied the same, building a depot and hotel thereon, and afterwards seeks to appropriate the land under the authority of law, the value of the land at the time of the legal appropriation, with the improvements thereon, constitutes the amount for which the company is liable to the owner of the land.

In California, in Railroad Co. v. Armstrong, 46 Cal. 85, condemnation proceeding had been commenced against a large number of land-owners, but there was no service as to the owners of one tract; yet pending such proceedings it was built upon by the railroad company. There was judgment as to the other lands, but none as to this tract, which the owners sold to Armstrong. Afterwards the proceeding was dismissed as to the particular tract, and new proceedings of condemnation were begun against Armstrong. There had been an order of court in the former proceeding allowing the railroad company to enter upon and retain possession of the lands pending the proceedings, and bond had been given as required by the statute. Answering the contention that the value of the improvements should be included in estimating damages in the second proceeding, it is said by the court: "Neither the constitution nor the statute contemplates that a person whose land is taken in the exercise of the right of eminent domain shall be entitled to anything beyond a 'just compensation.' He is to be paid the damages he actually suffers, and nothing more. But to hold that in addition to the fair value of the land taken, and such other damages as he may suffer by severing it from the remainder of his tract, he shall also recover the value of a railroad track, in the construction of which he never expended a dollar, and which was built by the plaintiffs at their own expense, would be to defeat the obvious intent of the statute by an overtechnical construction of it." In U. S. v. Land in Monterey Co., 47 Cal. 515, a condemnation proceeding was begun by the government in 1870 against lands which it had in 1854 entered upon against the will of the owners, erecting thereon a store building which it had ever since occupied as a light-house; and it was held that the value of the improvements should be included in estimating damages. "The law," says the opinion, "did not authorise the United States to take the possession of these lands manu forti; and their agents, in entering upon them and ejecting the defendants, were mere tort-feasors. The case is, in this important respect, wholly unlike that of Railroad Co. v. Armstrong, 46 Cal. 85. In that case the road track was constructed by the railroad company while its possession of the land of the defendant was rightful, being held at the time in pursuance of pending proceedings for its condemnation, and these proceedings having been dismissed after the construction of the track." The latter of these cases is also cited by the appellee. It does not pretend to overrule the former case, but distinguishes the two by the character of the original entry.

Of the cases cited by the appellee, that of Graham v. Railroad Co., 36 Ind. 463, alone can be claimed to be authority for the contention that in an authorized proceeding for condemnation the improvements put upon the land by a railroad company having the right to exercise the power of eminent domain, yet not doing so in a valid manner, should be included in estimating the land-owner's compensation for damages. If it be that the rule of the former of the California cases is not more applicable than that of the latter to the facts of the case before us, of which we are not at all satisfied, our views are not shaken by the latter case.

The clear weight of authority, the better reasoning, and true right of the matter are against the position of appellee.

II. The authorities at our hands bearing directly or by analogy on the subject of the power and duty of this court to suspend the warrant are those mentioned in the succeeding paragraph.

In Railroad Co. v. Jones, 59 Pa. St. 433, the railroad company had entered upon the land under an agreement to purchase, and had built its track thereon. The company failed to pay the purchase money, and there was a decree in favor of the vendors for the sale of the property for the amount due; and the same was sold by the sheriff under the decree, and the purchasers brought ejectment against the company. There had never been any condemnation proceedings against either the former owners or the purchasers at the sheriff's sale. It was said that the sheriff's vendees took the whole title to the land, the legal title of the vendors, and the equitable title of the railroad company, and not subject to any easement or right of the company to use any part of it for the track of its road. But it was held by the court that the company, under the provisions of its charter, had the undoubted right to appropriate the land, and to acquire a right to its use, upon making compensation to the owners for the damage sustained thereby; and that as the land was indispensably necessary to the company, and the company had the right indicated, it was but just and equitable that, while affirming the judgment in ejectment, all proceedings thereon should be ordered stayed for such reasonable time as might be necessary to enable the company to take proceedings to condemn the land; and that there was no doubt of the court's authority to make the order, or of the propriety of the order, under the circumstances. O'Hara v. Railroad Co., 2 Grant, Cas. 241. See, also, 5 U. S. Dig. (1st Series) p. 300, § 150. In Railroad Co. v. Bruce, 102 Pa. St. 23, a canal company which had condemned and acquired the easement of a right of way over, and not a fee in, the lands appropriated by it for canal purposes, afterwards became insolvent, and all its properties and franchises were sold to a railroad company; and it was held that the latter company could not construct tracks on such canal right of way without making compensation to the owner of the land, and that the owner of the fee was entitled, where such tracks had been laid without making or tendering compensation, to recover in ejectment against the railroad company; that the canal having been abandoned, as such, its charter as a highway went with it, and the use and occupation of the land reverted to the owner in fee. "We may," says the opinion, "here add, in order to avoid all mistakes and misapprehensions, that the defendants might secure a right of way and secure the work and property which it has put upon the plaintiff's land by having an assessment of damages as provided by law, and if the plaintiff should refuse a stay of execution until that can be accomplished the court below on application may for that purpose interpose its injunction." Citing Justice v. Railroad Co., 87 Pa. St. 28, in which execution had been stayed in the lower court. The case of Conger v. Railroad Co., 41 Iowa, 419, is one in which the railroad was built with the knowledge, but without any express permission, of the land-owner. The land-owner took proceedings to have the damages assessed, and afterwards brought ejectment; the damages not having been paid. The doctrine that the fact that the land-owner knowingly permits a railroad company to enter upon his land and build its road does not estop him from maintaining an injunction restraining the company from using the right of way without making compensation therefor, is fully recognized, (Hibbs v. Railroad Co., 39 Iowa, 340;) and it is asserted that there is no difference in this respect between a proceeding for an injunction and an action of ejectment. The judgment in favor of the land-owner was affirmed, but the court said that the action was to be regarded as a mere means of coercing payment of the damages; that if the damages had not been assessed, the defendant might, notwithstanding the action, cause the damages to the land-owner to be assessed, and upon payment of them could have the execution, if issued, recalled, and would be entitled to the aid of a court of equity for that purpose; but that in this case, as the damages had been assessed, nothing but payment of them was wanting to entitle the defendant to the continued use of the plaintiff's land; and a suspension of the execution was ordered. In Railroad Co. v. Kamlah, 42 N. J. Eq. 93, 6 Atl. Rep. 444, Kamlah, claiming that he had never received compensation for land used by the railroad company, brought ejectment to recover the land, and thereupon the company obtained a preliminary injunction to stay the action, on the ground that it had the legal title to the land, but, being unable to establish it, prayed a discovery, and also insisted that, if it should be unable to establish its legal title, it had an equitable title, which equity ought to protect by decreeing that it retain possession of the premises, and consummate its right thereto by awarding just compensation to Kamlah. It was held, after answer, that the injunction should be retained on the ground that the possession of the premises was originally taken with the knowledge of Kamlah, and continued for about 20 years as part of the complainant's road, with defendant's acquiescence, during which time various negotiations had been had between the parties as to compensation, and that the company, the land being indispensable to it, might, by proceeding under its charter, condemn the land, or, if it had not such charter power to condemn, it might make compensation, to be ascertained and awarded in the court of equity. In this case it was said: "Where possession has been taken of land for a public work, and the work has been constructed upon it, but no compensation has been made for the land, if the company in taking possession has acted in good faith under acquiescence of the owner, or by mistake as to the property, or as to the validity of the authority given it so to occupy, and the property is in public use, equity will not permit the company to be disturbed in its possession, provided it make compensation, if equity shall so require." Bartleson v. City of Minneapolis, 33 Minn. 468, 23 N. W. Rep. 839, (decided June 15, 1885,) is a case in which there had been condemnation proceedings and an award of $400 in August, 1881. The law regulating the subject provided that after the award became final the city council should cause the amount thereof to be paid, and that in case such payment was not made within one year after the confirmation of the award or the determination of an appeal the proceedings should be deemed to be abandoned, and that before the payment of the award the owner should furnish an abstract of title showing himself to be entitled to the damages allowed, and that in case of neglect to furnish the abstract, or of doubt, the amount awarded should be set apart for whomsoever should be entitled to it, and should be paid to any person showing himself to be so entitled. It was admitted on the trial that the plaintiff was the owner, except for the condemnation proceedings shown by the defendant. No compensation for the land was ever paid or set apart until July 25, 1884, when the city council set apart in the city treasury the sum of $400. It was held that the condemnation proceedings were by the failure to pay or set apart the amount of the award within one year, ipso facto, abandoned, and that Bartleson was entitled to recover in ejectment. At the close of the opinion is the following observation: "To the suggestion that the court may grant to the city equitable relief in the premises, and, upon equitable considerations, sustain its possession, it is enough to say that, if the city could upon any case be relieved from the consequences of the council's failure to comply with the law, no such case is presented by the pleadings or made by the facts found." In the cases of Harrington v. Railroad Co., 17 Minn. 215, (Gil. 188,) and Lohman v. Railroad Co., 18 Minn. 174, (Gil. 157,) in the former of which cases no proceedings to condemn had been taken, and in the latter there was, as here, a failure of the commissioners to give notice to the land-owner, it was urged that the land-owner was entitled to an injunction against the further use of the premises by the railroad company; but a stay was allowed to permit the institution of condemnation proceedings. In the latter of these cases it is remarked: "But it appears that under this appeal, or by some arrangement of the parties, the defendant has constructed and is now operating the road over defendant's land, so that great public inconvenience would result if the injunction were to be enforced, and as it further appears from defendant's answer that the proceedings to condemn were taken in good faith, and with an honest purpose on the part of the plaintiff to comply with the law, we are of the opinion that the injunction should not be allowed to become operative until suitable opportunity is given to defendant to acquire the right to appropriate plaintiff's land, either by negotiation or by fresh proceedings to condemn." In Strong v. City of Brooklyn, 12 Hun, 453, the plaintiff recovered judgment for possession of a piece of land which the city was using for public purposes, and the city obtained an order staying the enforcement of the judgment on the ground that it was about to condemn the land. The order was reversed by two justices, they holding that generally stays of process are granted by reason of something which has taken place pending the litigation or after the rendition of the judgment, and that if no reason of that kind exists the judgment must have its full force, and that no distinction was to be made in the case of a body entitled to the right of eminent domain. In Story v. Railroad Co., 90 N. Y. 122, 179, where it was held that the elevated street railroad structure which the company was at the commencement of the suit about to erect, and had since then actually erected, constituted a taking and appropriation of plaintiff's property without compensation, of the seven conclusions reached by the court, as summarized in the opinion of TRACY, J., the seventh was: "The injunction prohibiting the continuance of the road in Front street should not be issued until the railroad company has had reasonable time after this decision to acquire the plaintiff's property by agreement, or by proceedings to condemn the same." In treating of injunctions to prevent the use of property until damages are paid, it is said by Lewis on Eminent Domain, § 634,—citing Young v. Harrison, 6 Ga. 130; Gammage v. Railroad Co., 65 Ga. 614; Lohman v. Railroad Co., 18 Minn. 174, (Gil. 157;) White v. Railroad Co., 7 Heisk. 518,—that where the right to relief exists at the time of filing the bill, but the defendant has the power to acquire the property, and an injunction will be prejudicial to the public or the defendant, and its postponement no detriment to the plaintiff, the court will withhold the injunction until a reasonable opportunity is afforded to ascertain and pay the compensation. The authorities sustain the text. See, also, Harrington v. Railroad Co., 17 Minn. 215, (Gil. 188.)

All of these cases, except that of Bartleson v. City of Minneapolis, 33 Minn. 468, 23 N. W. Rep. 839, and Strong v. City of Brooklyn, 12 Hun, 453, sustain either expressly or by analogy the power to withhold the mandate for the purpose desired in this cause; and the excepted cases are not, considering the facts of this case, authority against our power or duty to do so. The power of courts to temporarily stay the issuing of executions is exercised, says Mr. Freeman, in an almost infinite variety of circumstances, in order that the ends of justice may be accomplished. In many cases this power operates almost as a substitute for proceedings in equity, and enables the defendant to prevent an inequitable use of the judgment or writ. Freem. Ex'ns, § 32; Mitchell v. Duncan, 7 Fla. 13; Robinson v. Yon, 8 Fla. 350; Granger v. Craig, 85 N. Y. 619. The withholding of the writ of possession, in cases of this kind, rests upon the same principle that the withholding of an injunction is founded on.

There is no such difference between the constitution of our state and those of the states in which the above decisions were made as makes these decisions inapplicable here.

The power invoked is one liable to be abused, (Freem. Ex'ns, § 32,) and should, in our judgment, be exercised with extreme caution; but we are entirely satisfied that the case before us is a proper one for its exercise.

The facts of the case are, of course, such as necessitated the affirmance of the judgment in ejectment in favor of the appellee; yet it is true that the appellant is a lessee under the company by which the original condemnation proceedings were instituted, and that the appellee, whose action was not commenced till March, 1887, knew early in 1885 that the lands were occupied, which occupation must, as the lease was not made till December of that year, have been by the lessor company, although the appellee does not say which company it was. It is also true that there is in the record such evidence of notice having been given to the appellee by the condemnation commissioners, by advertisement, as renders the contest of the title by the appellant one of good faith, as it does its entry under the lease; and there is nothing in the record tending to show that the appellant has acted otherwise than in good faith and with honest purposes in any of these proceedings. Moreover, upon the rendition of our judgment affirming the recovery in ejectment, new condemnation proceedings were promptly instituted and duly prosecuted against the resistance of the appellee and the other owner of the land; and the circuit judge dismissed them on the ground that our legislation is invalid and unconstitutional. From this judgment an appeal has been taken to this court, and the appeal transcript has been filed. In view of this decision the railroad company has certainly done all it can do, unless and until the judgment appealed from shall be reversed. It is also entitled to a decision of the question on the appeal. If that judgment is erroneous, the company should not suffer from it. If it is right, any damage the appellee may sustain by reason of the possession of the land can be compensated in money, and is wholly inconsiderable, in comparison with the damage and inconvenience which the appellant and the public will incur should we refuse to withhold the mandate. To permit the mandate to go now would not only be contrary to the principle and practice announced and established by the above authorities, but, it seems, would, in view of our affirmance of the judgment in ejectment, put it beyond the power of the circuit court to grant any similar relief as to its own writ, unless we should direct the allowance of such relief. Freem. Ex'ns, § 32; Marysville v. Buchanan, 3 Cal. 212; Dibrell v. Eastland, 3 Yerg. 506. A judgment in ejectment is never a bar to condemnation proceedings, nor does it award any recovery of mesne profits for occupation of the land after its rendition; nor can the question of such subsequent mesne profits be considered in condemnation proceedings, they being the subject of an independent action. There has been no obstacle to the collection of the recovery for mesne profits and costs adjudged in the action of ejectment, even if, in view of what has passed at our bar, it could be thought that the same were not paid last spring. The withholding of the mandate should not interfere with appellee's right to sue for the mesne profits accruing subsequently to those recovered in the ejectment action; and, upon condition that it shall not, the mandate will be withheld till the further order of the court, and the motion of the appellee will be denied. It will be ordered accordingly.

ILLINOIS CENT. R. CO. v. CROSSETT.

(Supreme Court of Mississippi. Jan. 25, 1892.)

Appeal from circuit court, De Soto county; JAMES T. FANT, Judge.

Action by W. A. Crossett against the Illinois Central Railroad Company. Verdict for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Mayes & Harris, for appellant. Powel & Farley, for appellee.

CAMPBELL, C. J. The verdict should be for the defendant on the record before us. The testimony of the engineer and fireman, corroborated by other witnesses, fully exculpates the defendant as to the injury to the calves. There is nothing in the evidence to suggest any other idea than that the calves were obscured from view until they were in danger, when it was too late to save them. The evidence of the employes of the defendant is probable, and fully corroborated, and uncontradicted in any material particular. It must be that the case, as presented before the learned circuit judge, was different in some facts from that before us, or he would not have permitted the verdict to stand. Reversed, and remanded for a new trial.

STATE v. ALLEN et al.

(Supreme Court of Mississippi. Jan. 11, 1892.)

BONDS — RELEASE OF SURETY — ERASING NAME — NOTICE TO APPROVING OFFICER — RECEIVING VERDICT.

1. Sundry co-sureties signed a penal bond while in the hands of the principal obligor, on condition that such bond should not be a completed instrument until enough co-sureties had signed and justified, in the respective amounts signed by each, to make up the full penal sum, and the bond duly delivered to the proper officer for approval as required by law. After the requisite solvent co-sureties had signed, the name of one was erased by drawing a line through his signature, his name in the body of the bond and in the jurat, with the consent of the principal obligor, but without notice to the other sureties. The bond was subsequently delivered to the proper officer for approval, his attention called to the erasure, and the bond was then approved by him. Held, that the erasure, and discharge of the one co-surety, having released all those who signed after him, all the other co-sureties were discharged.

2. The officer who approved the bond was, in such case, chargeable with notice of all the circumstances.

3. Where the judge, who presided at the trial by interchange, had been called away after the jury retired, and they subsequently brought in a special verdict, not completely responsive, there having been no opportunity given for a more perfect response from the jury under fuller directions from the judge, the local resident judge properly received and entered the special verdict as returned.

4. Where counsel agree, in such case, in open court, that "on appeal the special verdict shall be considered with reference to the evidence as well as the pleadings," the appellate court will interpret such agreement to authorize the court to consider such facts as actually found by the jury which should have been found, and to dispose of the case accordingly.

Appeal from circuit court, Hinds county; C. H. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Action by the state of Mississippi against John M. Allen and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. M. Miller, Atty. Gen., for the State. John M. Allen, for appellees.

WOODS, J. For the last time this cause, which involves public and private interests alike, is before us for conclusive determination upon the decisive plea of non est factum, interposed by all the defendants yet remaining in court. This plea, which, under the rulings of the court below, must be understood to embrace all the matters sought to be set up in the further plea of defendants, marked "No. 10," avers in its essential parts that the bond sued on is not their act and deed, because they say, substantially, that under the proviso to section 1, c. 40, Acts 1880, the same being entitled "An act to require the employment of convicts on works of internal improvement and provide for the support of the penitentiary, without loss to the state," the board of public works, having first rejected all the bids received for the lease of the penitentiary, penitentiary property, and convicts for the term of six years, entered into a contract with J. S. Hamilton, J. A. Hoskins, and Robert H. Allen, constituting the firm of Hamilton, Allen & Co., in July, 1880, whereby, in consideration of the sum of $29,420, to be paid annually, the said penitentiary, property, and convicts were leased to said Hamilton, Allen & Co., for the term of six years, upon the terms and condition provided by law, and that said contract was properly executed by the respective parties thereto. That thereafter, as required by section 2 of said chapter 40, Acts 1880, the said lessees entered into a bond of the character of the one now sued on, the condition whereof was that the said lessees should faithfully perform their said contract of lease. That, the said section 2 of said chapter 40 requiring that said bond so executed should be approved by the board of public works, a form thereof was delivered to said Robert H. Allen, one of the lessees, to be circulated in the northern part of the state of Mississippi for signatures, with the understanding, and upon the condition, that, after the said Allen had procured thereto as many signatures as he reasonably could, the said form of bond was to be returned to the defendants Hamilton and Hoskins at Jackson, there to be circulated for other and further signatures; and when such signatures, additional to those who had signed prior to their signing the same, should make up the penalty prescribed in the bond, to-wit, $100,000, the said form of bond was to be signed by the principal obligors, the said lessees, and by them was to be delivered to the governor of the state, to be by him submitted to the board of public works for inspection and approval. That it was further understood and agreed that the form of the bond, or the bond, so circulated and signed as aforesaid, was not to be regarded by any of the securities signing the same as a completed instrument unless and until it should be signed by other securities, so as to make up the full penalty of the bond after it had been transmitted by the said Allen to the said Hamilton and Hoskins for that purpose; the securities, as among themselves, signing for the amounts set opposite their names. That said bond, or form of bond, was not to be a completed instrument until all such other securities had signed the bond, according to the understanding and agreement before set out, and until it had been signed by the principal obligors, and thereupon deposited with the governor of the state, as ex officio president of the board of public works, to be by him handed to the said board of public works for approval, as required by law. That among other securities signing the bond after its said transmission to Hamilton and Hoskins, for circulation for signatures of such other securities, was one Philip Hart, a solvent security thereon, and worth the penalty of the bond; and that, after said Hart signed said bond, it was signed by R. Burdett, J. L. Hebron, and J. F. Townsend, as securities also, and was thereafter signed by the principal obligors. That the said bond was signed by these defendants, as securities, on the condition that it would not take effect as a bond, nor be a completed instrument, nor be delivered to the board of public works for approval, until the others signing—their co-sureties—would justify in an amount aggregating, with all the sums justified to by all the securities, the full penalty of the bond, to-wit, the sum of $100,000. That said Hart justified in the sum of $5,000, Burdett and Hebron in the sum of $8,000 each, and Townsend in the sum of $10,000; the several amounts justified to by all the securities aggregating something more than $100,000,—the penalty of the bond. That while all the securities were yet on the bond, it having been finally completed according to the understanding and condition on which these defendants signed, and before the same had been approved by the board of public works, while it was in the hands of the governor, as president ex officio of the board of public works, or in the hands of the principal obligors, or one of them, and while wholly out of the possession and control of these defendants, the said governor, or the said principal obligors, or one of them, permitted the said Hart to withdraw from said bond by the erasure of his (Hart's) name in the body of the bond, in its signature, and in its "acknowledgment," (sic,) at the request of Hart, and without the knowledge or consent of these defendants, or of any of the other securities, including Hebron, Burdett, and Townsend, who signed after Hart; and that this erasure of Hart's name was made prior to its delivery to and approval by the board of public works; and that the board of public works thereupon, with full knowledge of the facts, and without the authority and consent of the defendants, approved the bond, whereby the said Hebron, Burdett, and Townsend, as well as Hart, were released as the co-sureties of defendants, and whereby the amount for which the remaining securities justified was reduced far below $100,000; and, therefore, that they are released from liability on said bond.

Besides this general plea, which we have stated with much fullness, one of the defendants joining therein, viz., John M. Allen, presented and asked leave to file his individual plea of non est factum, numbered in the record 11, in which, besides much that had already been presented by him and his co-defendants to the plea just largely recited by us, he averred that he was informed by Robert H. Allen, the principal obligor who circulated the bond for signatures in North Mississippi, as hereinbefore circumstantially detailed, that the said J. F. Townsend would be his co-surety, if he, John M. Allen, should sign the bond; that he knew Townsend, and knew him to be a man of large means, and that he signed upon the understanding (additional to the conditions stated in the general plea of all the defendants) that Townsend should become his co-surety, and become liable on the bond with said defendant John M. Allen; that, with this additional understanding, John M. Allen signed, and that, as agreed and understood, said Townsend did subsequently sign, and justified in the sum of $10,000, but that Townsend and others had been released from liability upon said bond by reason of the erasure of the name of Philip Hart, as hereinbefore specifically narrated; that, moreover, after the bond had been signed by this defendant and a number of other securities in North Mississippi it was delivered to Robert H. Allen, one of the principal obligors, to be taken to Jackson, and circulated for other signatures, until enough signers as sureties should be obtained to qualify before the examining officer, so as to make the several sums for which the sureties could and would justify aggregate the sum of $100,000, and that the bond, when so completed, and when signed by the principal obligors, was to be then, and not before, delivered to the board of public works for approval. The court declined to allow this individual plea to be filed, when it was offered, holding, as appears in its order thereon in the record, that "the defense sought to be set up could be made under the 7th plea on which issue was joined." It is sufficient, for the present, to say that, in the progress of the trial, the course indicated by the learned judge in the court below was pursued, and evidence was offered, without objection, which tended to support this entire plea of said John M. Allen. The issue joined thus was submitted to a jury by which a special verdict was returned embracing, among others, not necessary to be mentioned, the following findings of fact, viz.: "We, the jury, agree and find that the erasure of the name of P. Hart was made from the bond sued on after the same had been signed by all the parties whose names appear thereon, including the principals, and that the erasure was made without the knowledge or consent of any other surety except Green, at the request of Hart, by the aid or procurement of one of the principals, J. S. Hamilton, in whose hands the bond was before and after Hart signed and before the same was delivered to the governor, and that the board of public works, when they were acting upon the bond, had their attention called to the erasure. We further find, if the plaintiff is entitled to judgment on this finding, her damages are assessed at the sum of $44,082.11-100." On this finding the counsel for the state moved for judgment, but, the Hon. CHARLES H. CAMPBELL, judge of the fifth circuit court district, who had presided on the trial of the issue by interchange, having been called away before the jury returned the special verdict, and the presiding judge of the court, the Hon. J. B. CHRISMAN, feeling himself disqualified to make any order or render any judgment in the case, by consent, and to the end that an appeal might be had, and the controversy determined in this court, the motion of the state for judgment was denied, and judgment entered for these defendants, and the same was accordingly done, the Hon. CHARLES H. CAMPBELL finally signing the bill of exceptions at the request of counsel on both sides, in order that the case might reach this court on appeal.

The question first to be considered is this: Was the verdict responsive to the issue, and did it find all the material facts in favor of the defendants? In answer to the inquiry it is to be said that the findings of jury do not embrace any covering those parts of the plea which aver the understanding, agreement, or condition on which these defendants signed the bond when the same was being circulated for signatures; and, though the record shows abundant evidence offered by the defendants to have warranted a finding of these particular facts in favor of the defendants, and though the record demonstrates that the facts pleaded as to this understanding or condition of signing on the part of the defendants was not sought to be controverted, and is practically unassailed, and though, on the record before us, no other finding than one in favor of the defendants on these averments of the plea could be permitted to stand, and that a reversal on this ground would be a barren victory for the state if another trial should be awarded on the same facts, yet the proper determination of this contention would not be free from embarrassing difficulty if there were no other lights to guide us. But it is not to be forgotten that the judge who tried the case was not present when the jury returned this not completely responsive verdict, and that there was therefore no opportunity given for a more perfect response under fuller directions from an enlightened court. Of necessity, the special verdict was compelled to be received and entered just as the jury returned it. We are bound, too, to suppose that the learned and able lawyers who managed the cause on the respective sides saw and felt the full force of this view, and frankly met the exigency by an agreement embodied in the judgment of the court, which is in these words, viz.: "* * * It being agreed between counsel in open court that on appeal said special verdict shall be considered with reference to the evidence as well as the pleadings, and it is ordered that the clerk insert the same in the transcript when called for." Remembering the recognized ability and skill of the counsel who made this agreement and had the same embodied in the judgment appealed from, we are forbidden, for a moment even, to entertain the thought that it was only meant that we should examine and consider the evidence in the usual manner. The merest tyro in the profession perfectly knows that in every case where a bill of exceptions containing the evidence is taken and produced here it is our duty to consider the same without a request, much less on agreement of counsel, to that effect. To arrive at any correct interpretation of the language employed by counsel in this agreement, we are to bear in mind that the cause had been thrice tried in the court below, and twice heard before us on appeal, (7 South. Rep. 282; 8 South. Rep. 761;) that in this long and fiercely contested struggle every contention had been determined or had been eliminated except the issue presented by these defendants in their plea of non est factum; that final judgment had already been rendered against the principal obligors; that Hart, Hebron, Burdett, Townsend, and perhaps others, had been released by inexorable legal necessity; that the issue at last made by these defendants had been imperfectly responded to by the special verdict of a jury under most embarrassing circumstances; and that the whole case, on all the pleadings and multitudinous proofs, should be finally ended, if possible, by this court, on a last appeal. We take it to be true that by this agreement of counsel we are to examine this evidence in all its parts and in its entirety, and give it such effect as in law it is fairly entitled to, regardless of mere technical and formal requisites; and that, if the evidence satisfies us that on the point now being considered the jury could not have found against the defendants, and that a reversal for the third time in this court would be an idle and fruitless determination, then we shall consider that as found by the jury which should have been found, and proceed to examine the case on the real question presented in the record submitted to us. This is our understanding of the agreement, — an agreement eminently wise, and honorable to counsel, under the circumstances, we do not hesitate to affirm. Acting on this, our understanding, and looking at all the evidence in the record, we have no hesitation in declaring that the understanding and condition averred in the plea to have existed at the time defendants signed the bond are conclusively shown to have existed as averred in the pleadings.

We come now to consider the materiality and sufficiency of the defense presented by these defendants by their plea of non est factum. We have here a case freed from all difficulty growing out of the necessity of an assumption by the court that the complaining sureties signed the bond according to custom, while it was in the care of the principal obligors, with an understanding that the bond was to be circulated for additional signatures until sufficient solvent sureties, in number and amount, should sign and justify in the aggregate for the full penalty of the bond.

There is no occasion for resort to the reasonable presumption that these defendants signed with the understanding that others, sufficient in numbers and amount, would become their co-sureties, and that, when the bond in its full penalty had been properly signed by their co-sureties and by the principal obligors, it should then be regarded as completed, and should in that condition be delivered to the approving authority. The plea distinctly avers these conditions in express terms, and we have already said that the evidence supports the averments of the plea. This, then, is the case of a bond signed by the defendants on the understanding and condition that the instrument should be circulated for other and further signatures, and should not be regarded as completed, and should not be delivered to the approving authority, until other solvent securities should be obtained, who could and would justify, respectively, in such amounts as, added to the amounts set opposite the signatures to the bond of these defendants, would make in the aggregate the full penalty of the bond, to-wit, $100,000. We have this also: The bond was circulated further by the principal obligors, or some of them, for signatures of solvent sureties thereon, according to this express understanding and condition, on which these defendants consented to sign and become liable, and that additional sureties were found, and their signatures obtained to the bond, and that, still in pursuance of the distinct agreement made with these defendants, these additional co-sureties separately set opposite their respective signatures the amounts they were willing to justify to, and that the total amounts thus justified to by all the securities amounted to something more than the penalty of the bond, viz., $100,000. According to the condition of signing by these defendants, the bond was now completed, and was ready for delivery to the approving authority. The defendants were bound, with other sufficient solvent co-sureties, in the full penalty of the bond, the whole number of the securities, as among themselves, having set opposite their respective signatures the several amounts to which they could and would justify, and to which, in fact, they did respectively justify. While in this completed condition, and ready for delivery, according to the condition on which these defendants signed, the name of P. Hart, one of the additional co-sureties, was erased by drawing a pen-line through the signature, and where it appeared, with those of all the other sureties, in the body of the bond and in the jurat. All this was done at Hart's request, by one of the principal obligors, before the delivery of the bond to the approving authority, and without the knowledge or consent of any of the other sureties, either those signing before or those signing after Hart. In this altered condition the bond was delivered to the board of public works, the attention of the board called to its then condition, and the same then approved.

In this connection it is well to remark that the suit was originally against all the securities, Hart included. In the progress of the protracted litigation, however, Hart's non-liability being made manifest, the suit was dismissed as to him; and in the further progress of the cause, the non-liability of Hebron, Burdett, and Townsend being made manifest,—they having signed after Hart, and before the erasure of his name, and in reliance upon him as their co-surety,—they, too, were discharged and released from liability. It is not contended by counsel for appellees that the violation of a secret condition, on which sureties sign, by the principal to whom the instrument has been intrusted by the earlier signers, will avail to release the sureties whose principal has been thus trusted by them, and who has disregarded the trust reposed in him, without notice to the approving authority of the limitation upon the power of the principal and of his violation of the condition creating this limitation. And, on the other hand, it is not contended by the counsel for the state that those signing as securities upon the understanding and condition that a particular person shall become their co-surety will not be discharged from liability upon the bond so signed, if afterwards this particular person, with whom they were willing to be bound, shall actually sign, and subsequently his name shall be erased without their knowledge or consent. The reason is near at hand, and is stated by the state's attorney general, viz., the face of the altered bond would itself give notice of the facts and conditions. The statement of these admitted propositions demonstrates how much nearer together the learned counsel are in a correct and harmonious apprehension of the law than would be inferred from a glance at the great record before us. The two propositions, taken together, are a very fair epitome of the law applicable to the case at bar. Blended, they harmonize perfectly, and, thus blended, and properly amplified, they meet the necessities of the issue before us, and they are supported not alone by reason, the highest authority, but by an unbroken line of carefully considered precedents in every court of last resort, state and federal, in the United States, with one solitary exception, so far as protracted and repeated examination enables us to say. The secret condition by which a person signing as a security undertakes to protect himself cannot be successfully pleaded. By relying upon a secret condition with the principal obligor, the confiding surety has made it possible for his agent, the principal obligor, to mislead or defraud; and, if loss shall befall by reason of the trusted agent's disregard of the secret condition, that loss must be borne by the too confiding surety. The loss must be placed upon him whose trust in another made it possible for it to occur. In this class of cases, as in all others in life, he who trusts most must suffer most. The law is that a surety who undertakes, upon a secret understanding with his principal, to be bound for him and with him, must be held liable upon his principal's default, even though the principal disregard and violate this secret condition to the loss and damage of the too trusting surety. But it is equally the law, and the complement of the announcement just made, that, if this secret condition is brought to the notice of the beneficiary in the instrument, or to the notice of the authorized agent of the beneficiary, and notice is had by the beneficiary, or his agent, of the departure from the condition by the principal, to whom the instrument has been intrusted, then the beneficiary, having it in his power to protect the surety as well as himself, if he act with prudence, after notice, cannot hold such surety liable if he receive and rest upon the bond signed upon condition by the surety, with condition broken by the principal, and notice thereof to the obligee in due time. In other words, a secret, undisclosed understanding by a surety in signing a bond will not avail to avoid liability, in the absence of any notice to the obligee of the violation of the condition by the principal; but with notice to the obligee, certainly when the condition has been disregarded in such manner as to increase the sureties' liability, the surety is not liable. It is admitted that if these defendants had signed the bond on condition that Hart should become their co-surety, and Hart had subsequently in fact become their co-surety, the defendants would not be liable if afterwards Hart's name had been erased from the bond, and he discharged, without the knowledge or consent of the defendants. What substantial distinction can be drawn between this admitted case and the real case in hand? Enlarge the imaginary case of the state's counsel, and let us suppose that the defendants signed with the understanding that Hart, Hebron, Burdett, and Townsend should become their co-sureties, and that they did actually become so, and subsequently all their names had been erased, all the sureties would clearly be released from liability. In such case, the condition is found, the violation of the condition is found, the increase of the liability of the remaining sureties is found, and notice of all these things by reason of the erasures of the names is found. On principle, how can this supposed case be distinguished from the real case? In the real case, the defendants signed on the understanding and condition that enough other solvent persons should sign, for such amounts as they could justify to, which, added to the amounts justified to by these defendants, would aggregate the full penalty of the bond. These other solvent sureties, sufficient in numbers and amounts, do accordingly actually sign, but, after the bond had been completed, in accordance with the original agreement between the defendants and one of the principal obligors, to-wit, Robert H. Allen, one of these added co-sureties, a solvent person, who had justified, as appeared on the face of the bond, for $5,000, has his name erased in the body, in the signature, and in the jurat of the bond, and thereby this retiring surety is released from liability. But, as perfectly appears from the record, by the inexorable logic of law, all the other solvent sureties signing after Hart have been released by virtue of the release of the one whose name was erased, the liability of these defendants largely increased, and notice on the face of the bond given, which, if followed up, would have disclosed the facts and the consequences flowing from them, as they now are plainly to be seen. We ask again, in reason and on principle, what is there to distinguish the supposed case from the real case at bar? In the former case, four certain named persons are to sign with these defendants; in the latter case, enough solvent persons are to sign with the defendants, in sums sufficient to make up the full penalty of the bond. In the first case, all four named sureties are discharged from liability by reason of the erasure of the name of the one of that number first signing, and those signing in reliance upon the four thus released must likewise be conceded to be released. Why shall not the like result follow the discharge of all the additional solvent sureties by reason of the erasure of the name of the first solvent surety signing? It seems clear to us that after the bond had been completed as agreed and conditioned by these defendants, and before it had been approved by the board of public works,—indeed, before it had been delivered to the board for approval,—a material alteration in the same was made, whereby the liability agreed to be assumed and actually assumed by the defendants had been largely increased without their consent, and with notice of this alteration to the approving authority; and the defendants are released from liability, unless they can be held, as insisted by the state, on another ground, to-wit, the want of notice of the understanding and condition of defendants' signing.

This view of the principal contention in the case at bar is in perfect harmony with the spirit and reason of the overwhelming current of adjudicated cases in the state and federal courts in this country. In some the facts are strikingly similar to the case before us; in more—in nearly all—the spirit and reason of the decisions are the same. We content ourselves with citing a few out of the great number examined. See Smith v. U. S., 2 Wall. 219; Smith v. Weld, 2 Pa. St. 54; Dickerman v. Miner, 43 Iowa, 508; State v. Craig, 58 Iowa, 238, 12 N. W. Rep. 301; State v. McGonigle, 101 Mo. 358, 13 S. W. Rep. 758; State v. Churchill, 48 Ark. 426, 3 S. W. Rep. 352, 880; Bank v. Sears, 4 Gray, 95; Commissioners v. Daum, 80 Ky. 388; Graves v. Tucker, 10 Smedes & M. 9; Nash v. Fugate, 24 Grat. 202, 32 Grat. 595; McCormick v. Bay City, 23 Mich. 457. On this branch of the case, it is now to be added that the surety John M. Allen signed on the conditions named in the general plea of himself and all the others, appellees, and that, besides, he shows that he signed with the understanding that one of the additional signers to the bond, J. F. Townsend, was to be his co-surety. It will be remembered that Townsend actually signed, as agreed, and that, signing after Hart, and prior to the erasure of Hart's name, he has been unavoidably released from liability, and the suit dismissed as to him, by reason of Hart's release, on whose co-suretyship he, Townsend, relied, and on which he had the right to rely, the erasure of Hart's name being conceded to be notice to the approving authority of the condition on which Townsend signed. With Hart discharged by pitiless legal necessity, and with Townsend discharged by the same inexorable authority, because of his reliance on Hart as his co-surety, are we not driven irresistibly to the conclusion that John M. Allen is released by the same imperious necessity? If John M. Allen must be held released, as we say he must, how shall the other defendants, who signed after him, relying on his co-suretyship, be held? It is impossible to find any satisfactory answer to the inquiry.

We have already remarked that there appears to be one discordant note in the universal voice of adjudication. The laborious research of the attorney general of the state has produced many authorities bearing upon this particular subject, but a careful examination of them, with others unearthed in our own researches, produces the one solitary disagreeing view of the law. That is the case of Railroad v. Kitchin, 91 N. C. 39. The learned counsel concedes with caution that the court, in this opinion, goes too far in holding a surety liable who would seem to have been not liable, by the universal juridical judgment, outside of the state last referred to. The Kitchin Case is in violent conflict with the views herein advanced, and in irreconcilable antagonism to the long line of authorities hereinbefore noted. The doctrine of the Kitchin Case has been well declared by another court of last resort, in commenting on it, to be unsupported by precedent, and wanting in that strength of argument which gives power to the general rule.

There remains only to be considered the reach and value of the notice afforded to the board of public works by the erasure of Hart's name, to which, confessedly, their attention was directed by the governor of the state when the bond was submitted for approval. If we understand the state's position on this point, the contention is that the erasure of Hart's name, appearing thrice on the face of the bond, was notice which required inquiry by the board of public works into the circumstances of Hart's connection with the other sureties, or what undertaking they had with reference to him. We have already endeavored to demonstrate that, though the agreement of these defendants was not to sign with Hart by name, their agreement was to sign with other solvent sureties, and that Hart was accordingly secured as one of these contemplated solvent additional co-sureties, and afterwards released by the erasure of his name, whereby the other additional solvent sureties, Hebron, Burdett, and Townsend, were also released; and that the legal liability of the appellees is not other than it would be if Hart by name had been agreed upon as their co-surety. We conclude, therefore, whatever would have been notice to the board of public works if Hart had been agreed upon by name as a co-surety will be notice, also, under the averments of the plea, and the evidence in the case. It will not do to assume that, if inquiry had been made by the board of public works, the simple facts that the defendants signed the bond for circulation, and that they had no understanding with regard to Hart, and that he merely signed and then withdrew, would only have been discovered. That is the ground taken by the state, but its untenableness is demonstrable in a breath. The inquiry would have ascertained what the state admits, but, unless reason and law had been deaf and blind, it would have necessarily appeared also, in connection with the fact that the appellees signed the bond for circulation, that they coupled their signing with an express condition; and this condition was as readily ascertainable as the other fact of their signing for circulation, which, it is admitted, inquiry would have disclosed; and, while inquiry would have disclosed the fact that the appellees had no understanding with regard to Hart by name, the same inquiry would have disclosed the fact that they did have an understanding with reference to Hart and others as solvent co-sureties, and that the appellees were not consenting to Hart's release. Inquiry would, with equal certainty, have disclosed that Hebron, Burdett, and Townsend, the other co-sureties signing after Hart, signed relying on him as their co-surety, and that they were not consenting to his release. As is said, with a touch of grim humor, by counsel for appellees, "there is no telling what inquiry would not have ascertained." It might as forcibly be contended for the state that the erasure of Hart's name was only notice of that fact. That is not the position of the state's counsel, of course, but we think such ground might be as well defended as the position taken, which would cut off inquiry as soon as begun. If the doctrine of notice is not to be emasculated, we must continue to hold that whatever is sufficient to give notice to a party is notice of everything which inquiry, if made, would disclose. On the question of notice specifically our own court has long acted on this definition of notice, nor are we aware of any restrictive qualification put upon it elsewhere. This idea of the reach and value of notice underlies all the cases in which sureties have been released by erasures of names or other alterations appearing upon the face of an instrument on which recovery is sought. It seems superfluous to say more. See 16 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 792, and note, with the countless cases therein cited; Parker v. Foy, 43 Miss. 260; Plant v. Shryock, 62 Miss. 824; Buck v. Raines, 50 Miss. 648.

HARRIS v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Mississippi. April Term, 1891.)

HOMICIDE—VERDICT—CONSTRUCTION.

Where, on a murder trial, the court instructs the jury that a verdict of "guilty as charged in the indictment" will be followed by capital punishment, such a verdict, signed by each juror, fixes defendant's punishment at death, though the last juror's name is coupled with the words, 'opposed to capital punishment."

Appeal from circuit court, first district of Hinds county; J. B. CHRISMAN, Judge.

Anderson Harris was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

S. S. Calhoon, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Miller, for the State.

WOODS, C. J. The sole remaining hope of life for the prisoner, outside of executive clemency, must now perish. It is submitted to us by the able counsel who represented the accused on his trial below, and who has generously appeared in this court also, that the verdict, "We, the jury, find the prisoner guilty as charged in the indictment," may be held by us to be a finding without capital punishment, because the name of the last juror is coupled with the words, "opposed to capital punishment," the verdict having been signed by each juror's own hand. The jury, and each member of it, must be presumed conclusively to have known what this verdict meant. The court had fully instructed the jury as to the form of verdict necessary, if the punishment was to be imprisonment for life; and with equal distinctness the jury had been instructed that the verdict of "guilty as charged in the indictment" would be followed by capital punishment. That one juror, who was opposed to capital punishment, joined eleven others, entertaining no such sentiment, in saying the prisoner was worthy of death, cannot be held other than a general verdict of guilty. We are painfully aware of our responsibility, but we can discharge it, under a sense of inexorable duty, in no other manner than by an affirmance of the judgment of the lower court. Affirmed.

HAIRSTON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Mississippi. May 18, 1891.)

HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF DEFENDANT'S MISTRESS.

On a prosecution for murder, where it has been shown that at the time of the homicide defendant was living with a certain woman, the admission of evidence that, on the night of the homicide, the husband of deceased received a message from such woman, warning him not to go out of his house, is reversible error.

Appeal from circuit court, Lowndes county; HOUSTON, Judge.

Prosecution of Willis Hairston for murder. Defendant was convicted, and appeals. Reversed.

S. M. & W. C. Meek, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Miller, for the State.

COOPER, J. The verdict in this case rests upon circumstantial testimony so slight and inconclusive in its character as to scarcely tend towards the guilt of the appellant, and upon the positive testimony of one eye-witness. This witness testified that she was a guest at the house of deceased at the time she was killed; that late at night the accused and two others came to the house and called deceased, who was then asleep; that deceased got up, and went out, and immediately witness heard a blow and a groan, and, looking out, saw the body of deceased on the ground; that the accused and two other persons then took up the body, and carried it away; that the husband of the deceased and two other persons were at that time in the house; that witness, having seen the murder committed, made no alarm, and did not speak to any one of what she saw, for more than a week, nor until after the accused was arrested and charged with the crime; and for this almost incredible conduct gives no other explanation than that she was afraid of the accused. We are astonished that this story found credence with the jury. Whether a verdict resting upon such evidence should be permitted to stand, even in a case free from any error of law, it is unnecessary now to consider, since the judgment must be reversed on another ground. The evidence shows that at the time of the homicide the accused was living with one Milly Satterfield. On the trial the husband of deceased was permitted, over the objection of the accused, to testify that on the night of the homicide he "received a message from Milly Satterfield not to go out of my house." The only conceivable purpose of this evidence is that it suggested that Milly Satterfield had some reason to believe that the accused contemplated committing the crime, and that, living in the house with him, she received her information from some act or declaration of his. The evidence was too clearly incompetent to require comment, and for the error in admitting it the judgment is reversed, and a new trial awarded.

KELLOGG et al. v. HAMILTON.

CONVERSION—VALUE OF GOODS.

Where no direct evidence of value is offered in an action for the conversion of goods, but enough appears from the evidence to show that they were of some value, it is error for the trial court, the conversion being proven, to instruct the jury to find for defendant.

Appeal from circuit court, Copiah county; J. B. CHRISMAN, Judge.

Action by Charles P. Kellogg & Co. against J. G. Hamilton for the conversion of goods. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

R. B. Mayes, for appellant. Ramsey & Willing and J. S. Seaton, for appellee.

CAMPBELL, J. The testimony makes it certain that the defendant received and converted to his own use the goods of the plaintiffs, and while it is true that they did not, on the trial of the action, (in form trover,) offer evidence of the value of the goods, enough appeared from the evidence to show that they were of some value, and they should have had, at least, a verdict for a nominal sum, and it was erroneous to instruct the jury to find for the defendant. Reversed, and remanded for a new trial.

VICKSBURG, S. & P. R. CO. v. STOCKING.

CONTINUANCE—SURPRISE—AMENDMENT OF DECLARATION.

Where plaintiff, in an action against a carrier for the death of two horses, and for injuries sustained by other horses, testifies to the death of ten horses within two weeks after their delivery to him, and thereupon moves for leave to amend his declaration to make it conform to his evidence, which motion is allowed, it is error for the court to refuse defendant a continuance on the ground that it is unprepared to meet the new case thus presented.

Appeal from circuit court, Warren county; GEORGE ANDERSON, Special Judge.

Action by E. L. Stocking against the Vicksburg, Shreveport & Pacific Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Nugent & McWillie and Birchett & Shelton, for appellant. Henry & Thompson, for appellee.

WOODS, J. In both counts of the declaration, originally, a recovery was sought because of the death of two horses, in addition to injuries sustained by the surviving animals. When the plaintiff was examined as a witness, on the trial, on his own behalf, he testified to the death of ten horses within two weeks after the delivery of the stock to him by the carrier, and thereupon he moved the court for leave to amend his declaration to make it conform to his evidence; and leave was accordingly, and properly, given him to strike out the word "two," and insert the word "twelve," in the declaration, where used to designate the number of animals whose death resulted from the misconduct of the carrier in transporting the stock. To the proposed amendment, at the proper time, the defendant objected; and upon the overruling of this objection by the court, and after the amendment had been made, the defendant prayed a continuance, supporting this prayer by the affidavit of the agent and representative of defendant, because of surprise, as to the additional claim for the loss of ten horses other than those mentioned in the original declaration, and showing and stating that the loss of only two horses was averred in the pleadings, and that defendant had only prepared itself to meet the claim for the loss of the two horses, and was wholly unprepared to meet the new case presented by the amended declaration. The motion for continuance being denied, trial was then had, with the result of a verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

All proper amendments in pleading, necessary to present the whole case fairly, should be allowed, and such amendments should not operate to continue the case, as matter of right, to the party complaining of such amendment. After amendment, the application for continuance is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, and is to be entertained only in those exceptional cases in which it is made to appear that a refusal to continue will result in preventing the party against whom the amendment is made having a fair opportunity to meet the same, in a matter material in the controversy. In the case before us, the plaintiff in his original declaration had demanded damages against defendant in a large sum, and one element of these damages was averred to be the death of two horses. This averment was made long after the injuries complained of had occurred, and only on the trial was notice given of the death of ten other horses, which said deaths were shown to have taken place, by plaintiff's evidence, after the stock had been delivered to plaintiff by the carrier, and after the stock had been driven away from Vicksburg, and into the country. While it may be true that the plaintiff was not required in his declaration to aver the death of the two animals, yet having done so, and having stood upon that averment until he took the witness-stand upon the trial, his then springing upon the defendant the loss of ten other animals, dying under the circumstances already mentioned, and with no notice ever before given defendant of such additional loss, must be held to have been such surprise as operated to prevent the defendant's fairly meeting the plaintiff. It may be fairly said that the averment of the loss of two horses only, in the original complaint, warranted the defendant in concluding that it was called to respond to such loss, by death, only; and that, being so misled by plaintiff, the defendant was prejudicially surprised when plaintiff shifted his ground, and claimed the loss of ten other animals,—animals dying, not in course of transportation, and while in the carrier's charge, but after their delivery to the consignee; and this, without any notice to or knowledge of the defendant. Under the peculiar circumstances of this case, we are of opinion that the defendant should have had the continuance prayed. Reversed and remanded.

INDIAN RIVER STEAM-BOAT CO. v. EAST COAST TRANSP. CO.

(Supreme Court of Florida. Dec. 21, 1891.)

INJUNCTION—MOTION TO DISSOLVE—DISCRETION OF COURT—RAILROAD COMPANY—RIGHT TO OWN AND LEASE DOCK.

1. Pending a motion to dissolve an injunction on bill and answer, exceptions are filed to portions of the answer not in response to the bill. The filing of such exceptions is of itself no objection to the dissolution of the injunction, where the portion of the answer not excepted to contains a sufficient denial of the equities of the bill.

2. A motion to dissolve an injunction on bill and answer involves the sufficiency of the equities of the bill to justify the writ in the first instance.

3. A court of chancery will not grant an injunction to restrain a trespass merely because it is a trespass; yet it will interfere by injunction where the injury is irreparable, or where full and adequate relief cannot be granted at law, or where it is necessary to prevent a multiplicity of suits, and especially where the trespasser is alleged to be insolvent, and nothing can be realized on judgments that may be obtained against him at law. In such cases it will not do to simply allege that the complainant has no adequate remedy at law, and that his damages will be irreparable. The court will not act upon his opinion or his fears in such matters, but he must state facts in his bill to enable the court to determine whether or not his alleged injury will be irreparable.

4. On motion to dissolve an injunction on bill and answer, where sufficient equities are stated in the bill, the court will look to such facts of the answer only as are responsive to the bill; and a respondent will not be permitted to rely upon new matter in avoidance, in his answer, not in response to the allegations upon which the equities of the bill are founded.

5. Under the practice of the court of chancery, since the adoption of the act of the legislature, (chapter 1098, Laws of Florida,) where the answer denies all the circumstances, upon which the equities of the bill are founded, or where the bill and accompanying evidence are fully met by the answer and its accompanying evidence, the chancellor will ordinarily dissolve an injunction; but this is not an inflexible rule, and the granting or dissolving of injunctions is lodged in the sound discretion of the court, to be governed by the nature and circumstances of each case.

6. A railroad corporation, under the laws of Florida, has the right to erect and maintain docks, wharves, and piers, as incident to its business, and to hold or dispose of them as may be deemed proper; but such corporation, engaged in the business of common carrier, has no right to lease the terminal point of its railroad track and terminal facility on a navigable stream to a steam-boat company, and thereby defeat the ingress and egress to and from said railroad track on the part of other competing lines of steam-boat companies.

7. The Indian River Steam-Boat Company leased from the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company 390 feet of the east end of its dock on the Indian river, at Titusville, on which dock was located the railroad track and terminal facility of said railroad company; and said railroad company covenanted and agreed in said lease to maintain the railroad track on said dock and bulk-head, and the trestle supporting said track, and to furnish proper and adequate facilities for transfer of local freight to and from said bulk-head. Held, on this state of facts, the said steam-boat company was not entitled to an injunction to restrain another steam boat company from landing at said railroad dock for the purpose of delivering and receiving freight to and from said railroad company.

8. The bill asked for an injunction to restrain respondents from using the dock at Titusville, and the premises appurtenant thereto, as their head-quarters and offices, and from using and occupying numerous other docks of complainant at other points on Indian river, and also that complainant be decreed the undisturbed possession of the same. A preliminary injunction was granted as to the dock at Titusville only. Respondents, upon the filing of the bill, answered, tendering an issue as to the docks other than at Titusville, and denied that they landed at the Titusville dock otherwise than for the purpose of delivering and receiving freight to and from said railroad company. Held that, while the decree of the court dissolving the temporary injunction on bill and answer was proper, it was error to dismiss the bill, as it cannot be said that no other relief was sought, except to restrain respondents from landing their boats at the Titusville dock.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Brevard county; D. BROOME, Judge.

Bill by the Indian River Steam-Boat Company against the East Coast Transportation Company to restrain it from using certain docks. From a decree dissolving the injunction and dismissing the bill the steam-boat company appeals. Modified.

The other facts fully appear in the following statement by MABRY, J.:

The Indian River Steam-Boat Company, appellant here, by attorneys, presented to the judge of the fifth judicial circuit, at chambers, on the 24th day of November, A. D. 1890, a bill for an injunction against R. P. Paddison, George M. Robbins, and Walter S. Graham, associated and doing business as the East Coast Transportation Company, at Titusville, Brevard county, Fla. The case made in this bill is this: That the Indian River Steam-Boat Company is a corporation organized under the laws of Florida, with its usual place of business at Titusville, Brevard county, Fla., and its business is, and has been since the 7th day of April, A. D. 1886, the transportation of freight, passengers, and mail matter upon Indian river; that in conducting said business it owns and uses seven steam-boats, and during the winter season runs a daily line of steamers between Titusville and all points south and between Titusville and Melbourne on said river, and during the other portions of the year a daily line between Titusville and Melbourne, and a tri-weekly line between Titusville and all points south on said river; that the nature and extent of its business render the erection and maintenance of docks and piers at Titusville and elsewhere on said river necessary, and the right to do so is one of its charter privileges; that on the 9th day of February, A. D. 1889, it leased from the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company so much of a certain dock and pier at Titusville as then and now lies on the easterly side of a line drawn 20 feet west of the most westerly building now and then constructed on said pier, to the easterly line of the bulk-head, with all the rights and privileges thereunto appertaining, the same being about 396 feet of the east end of the said dock, and that said dock and pier extend only to such depth of water in said river as affords a safe landing to such boats as said company possesses, and one suitable to its business, and that said dock and pier do not interfere with the use or construction of other docks which are or may be constructed and maintained on adjacent property along the extensive water-front at Titusville; that said leased dock and buildings thereon have been constantly occupied and used by said Indian River Steam-Boat Company for the purpose aforesaid, and for its offices, head-quarters, and place of transacting most of its general business, since the 1st day of March, A. D. 1889, and that said company has agreed to pay an annual rental for said dock and pier of $500, payable quarterly, for the term of 3 years, and longer, unless a contrary agreement should be reached in the manner provided by the terms of said lease, and to keep said leased property in good repair, and perform certain other conditions enumerated therein, at great expense; that said rental has been paid, and all the other conditions fully performed, and said lease is in full force; that large and expensive additions have been made to said dock and pier by said Indian River Steam-Boat Company, at a cost of $3,000, and still said dock and pier, and the accommodations thereon, are inadequate fully to accommodate the increasing business of said company.

A copy of the lease, bearing date February 9, 1889, is attached to the bill as an exhibit.

It is further alleged in said bill that the sole object of said appellant company in entering into said lease was that it might control premises adequate to the transaction of its business, and since the 1st day of March, A. D. 1889, it has so occupied and controlled said leased property, and no other person or company has occupied the same, except by the consent of the said Indian River Steam-Boat Company, and that said company has never held itself out as a general wharfinger, or permitted the public use of said leased property.

Further, that during the summer or fall of 1890 said Paddison, Robbins, and Graham purchased or procured a steam-boat, and are advertising to make regular trips upon said Indian river with one or more steam-boats for the carriage of passengers and freight, and are seeking to make their head-quarters and landing point at said leased dock or pier, and that they have been repeatedly informed by appellant company that said dock and pier were its private property, and that it could not and would not conduct the business of a wharfinger, or permit their boat to land thereat, but notwithstanding such notification they have persisted and still persist in landing, and do land, their said boat at said dock, through force of threats made by them that if they were deterred from landing, or hindered in any way in the transaction of their business at said dock, they would cause to be arrested the agents or employes of said steam-boat company, and that for each package or shipment of freight or other matter refused to be received upon said dock they would sue said steam-boat company for damages, and they threaten to continue daily to land at said dock, and use the same freely for all purposes connected with their business, without paying wharfage or other charges, and claim that said dock is public property, and they, in common with all other persons, are entitled to all the rights and privileges of said steam-boat company in and about said leased property; that if the said Paddison, Robbins, and Graham are permitted to succeed in freely using and occupying said leased property the entire public will also insist on doing so, and said premises will become worthless as a franchise right and a place for transacting its said business.

It is further alleged that said steam-boat company possesses the exclusive right to use and occupy said dock and pier for the purposes of its business, and that said respondents, Paddison, Robbins, and Graham, have no shadow of title or right to the use or occupation of said property, except through the courtesy of said steam-boat company, and that this cannot be extended to them, because said dock and pier are inadequate to accommodate the business of said company, and that there is neither dock frontage or storage room sufficient to accommodate even the seven boats of said company, and one or more of them must needs be moved to permit the landing of respondents' boats.

It is further alleged that there is another dock at Titusville, not owned or possessed by said steam-boat company, at which said respondents' boats can and frequently do land and transact business; that the winter business of said steam-boat company is larger than its summer and fall business, and such winter business has begun and is rapidly increasing, and said company is soon to add other steam-boats to its present service, and thus rendering imperative the use of all its dock room; that it is under contract to carry the United States mails upon said Indian river according to stated schedules and fixed time, and any violation thereof would subject said company to heavy penalties, and it is frequently necessary for said company to load and unload freight with the greatest dispatch, and to employ thereon a great number of men, in order to prevent delays in the carriage of perishable articles, and at the same time to comply with its said mail contract; that the use of said dock and pier by said respondents for any considerable time would cause inconvenience, delays, possible loss of connections, and prevent said company from properly conducting its business, and would cause it irreparable damage; that said complainant company believes that said respondents cannot be deterred from using said dock and pier except by the daily use of superior force, and that if such force be used, or if packages of freight carried by or consigned to said respondents be refused to be allowed a landing on said dock, said steam-boat company would be subjected to a multitude of vexatious suits; and that said company has no adequate remedy at law to prevent such immediate and irreparable injury.

It is further alleged in said bill that said steam-boat company is the exclusive owner or lessee, and is in exclusive possession, of a large number of other docks, at various points on said Indian river, which were erected and are maintained at great expense by said company for its exclusive use and benefit; that these docks are not public, nor do they interfere with the free navigation of the river, and said company does not hold itself out as doing the business of wharfinger at any of them, as said respondents well know; that said docks differ from the docks and pier at Titusville in this: that they are smaller, and not well provided with storage room for the care and protection of freight, and are not intended to be used as the head-quarters or places for conducting the general business of said company, and do not afford facilities more than adequate to the needs of its business; that said respondents, without any right or title whatever, are making free use of such docks for all the purposes of their said business, and threaten to continue the same, against the protests and express orders of said complainant company, and that they threaten to use said docks daily, or as often as their business may require, by superior force, and to harass and annoy said company by a multitude of suits, should they in any manner be interfered with in the use of the same, or should wharfage be required of them.

It is further alleged that such interference with said docks, as above stated, would cause such litigation, expense, trouble, and delays as seriously to affect its business, prejudice its interests, and cause such irreparable damage that courts of law could not compensate it for the same, and that said complainant company believes that said respondents are not pecuniarily responsible for any and all damages which said company may suffer by reason of their repeated and threatened interferences with said docks, and that a judgment that might be recovered at law would be uncollectible against said respondents, and that said steam-boat company is under contract to transfer and deliver immediately large shipments of freight and materials which peculiarly tax all its facilities to the utmost, and render any interference with them especially harmful, and its rights would be unduly prejudiced if an injunction be not issued immediately, and without notice to defendants.

The prayer of the bill is that said respondents, their officers and agents, be restrained by injunction from further using or occupying said dock and pier at Titusville, or the premises or appurtenances thereto belonging, for the purpose of transacting thereat their business, except such business as they in common with all other citizens may properly transact with said company upon its private property, and from making said dock and pier the usual place for landing their boat, and for receiving and discharging freight and passengers thereat, and that said steam-boat company be decreed the undisturbed and undivided right of possession of said leased premises, and that said respondents, their officers and agents, be enjoined from further using said other docks as their place of landing boats, and from receiving and discharging freight and passengers thereat; and for such other or further relief as the nature of the case may require.

The president of the steam-boat company makes oath that he is acquainted with the facts stated in the bill, and they are true, except those alleged on information and belief; and, as to those matters, he believes they are true.

On this bill the judge at chambers granted a temporary injunction as to the dock and pier at Titusville upon the filing of a bond, in the sum of $500, to be approved by the clerk of the circuit court of Brevard county. The bond was filed in the office of said clerk on the 25th day of November, A. D. 1890, and writ of injunction issued, restraining and enjoining said Paddison, Robbins, and Graham, associated as the East Coast Transportation Company, from further using or occupying said dock and pier at Titusville for the purpose of receiving and discharging freight and passengers, and from making the same their usual place for landing their boats for said purpose, until the further order of the court.

On the 26th day of November, A. D. 1890, the respondents filed in said clerk's office their answer to the bill, and also mailed to the counsel for said steam-boat company a notice that application would be made to the judge of said circuit on the 2d day of December, A. D. 1890, for a dissolution of said temporary injunction.

The material averments in the answer are as follows: That the East Coast Transportation Company was G. F. Paddison, George M. Robbins, and Walter S. Graham, and not R P. Paddison, as stated in the bill, and, at the time of filing the answer, is a corporation existing under the laws of Florida, articles of association having been duly filed with the clerk of the circuit court of Brevard county on November 22, 1890, and on same day forwarded to the secretary of state at Tallahassee, Fla.; but respondents waive any benefit or advantage of the failure to denominate them as a corporation in complainant's bill, and appear in their corporate capacity, as the East Coast Transportation Company.

Respondents admit that the Indian River Steam-Boat Company is a corporation under the laws of Florida, and that it is engaged in the business and employs the steam-boats on the Indian river as alleged in its bill, and that the nature of its business renders the erection of docks and piers at Titusville and elsewhere on said river desirable; but respondents do not know, and, pray proof to, the extent of the charter-rights of said steam-boat company in the premises. Respondents admit the lease by the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company to said steam-boat company, the use of the dock and payment of rent as alleged, but deny that said lease is now in full force and effect, or ever was valid or effectual in law.

Respondents admit that said steam-boat company has made certain additions to the said wharf, on the south side, but does not know whether or not said company is fully accommodated thereby, and asks proof of said allegation.

Respondents deny that the sole object of said steam-boat company in entering into said lease with the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company was to control premises adequate to the transaction of its business, but aver that its said object therein was also to control the terminal facilities of the said Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company on the Indian river at Titusville, and thus to prevent the use of said railroad terminal facilities by any competing line of steam-boats that might be put on said river, in order to preserve a monopoly of the transportation business of said river, and that said company has persistently denied the use of said railroad terminal facilities to respondents or to the general public since the lease aforesaid.

Respondents deny that said complainant corporation has never held itself out as a general wharfinger, or permitted the public the use of said leased property.

Respondents admit that they have purchased a steam-boat, and are advertising to make regular trips upon Indian river for the carriage of passengers and freight, but deny that they are seeking to make their head-quarters at the said dock, and say that they are landing at said dock for the purpose of receiving and delivering freight to and from the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company, under authority of a decree of the railroad commission of the state of Florida securing respondents in that right, a certified copy of which is attached to the answer.

Respondents admit that they were informed at one time by complainant corporation that it did not want to conduct the business of a wharfinger, but they aver that, after the said decree of the railroad commission, said corporation informed them that it would receive and receipt for all their freight at said dock on payment of a regular wharfage charge, and that respondents have continued to do business with said complainant corporation, as a general wharfinger, for the past three weeks, under said arrangement.

Respondents admit that they have intimated to the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company and its employes that if it violated the decree of the railroad commission, by refusing to accord to respondents, at the end of its dock and railroad at Titusville, the same privileges and advantages as it accords to said steam-boat company, notwithstanding its lease, that said neglect and refusal would be a violation of law, of which respondents would complain to the proper authorities of the state; but respondents have never threatened or otherwise intimidated the agents of said steam-boat company, except they have threatened to complain of said railroad company if the use of its terminal was not accorded to them; and they do not care how the said railroad company and said steam-boat company settle their differences in regard to the said dock, and have no concern except that said railroad company shall obey the said mandate of the railroad commission.

Respondents admit that they propose to land daily at said dock, or as often as it has business to transact there with the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company, and that said dock constitutes the charter terminal of said railroad company.

Respondents say they have paid wharfage to said steam-boat company, under protest, for the use of said dock; but they only paid the same to prevent a breach of the peace, and until they could obtain relief from the courts from such illegal exactions.

Respondents admit that they claim that said dock is public property, and that the public is entitled to a free landing at it, without wharfage or other toll, because said wharf occupies and is a part of a public street of the town of Titusville, as will appear by the further allegations of the answer.

Respondents deny that said complainant corporation possesses the exclusive right to use and occupy said dock, or that respondents have no right to the use thereof, and they deny that any of said complainant's boats have ever been moved to allow the landing of their boat, or that there will be any occasion therefor in the future.

Respondents admit that there is another dock at Titusville at which their boat frequently lands to transact other than railroad business, but respondents say that the water is frequently too low to admit of their boat approaching said wharf, and there is always great danger in so doing, and said dock is totally inadequate to the needs of respondents' business.

Respondents admit that said complainant's present wharf privileges may be inadequate, as alleged, and they suggest that said complainant get quarters of its own, instead of appropriating a public street and a railroad terminal.

Respondents admit that they cannot be deterred from using said property except by the daily use of superior force, and that the use of such force, or the neglect by the railroad company to properly conduct respondents' business at said wharf, would subject said railroad company and said steam-boat company to a multitude of vexatious suits.

Respondents deny that said complainant company is the exclusive owner or lessee of a large number of docks at various points on Indian river, or has not held itself out as a wharfinger at some of the docks it pretends to control, or that respondents have ever landed at any dock of which said company was entitled to the exclusive use.

Respondents say that the allegations of said bill as to wharf privileges, other than those at Titusville, are vague and uncertain, and they claim the same benefit in their answer as if they had demurred thereto for uncertainty.

Respondents further deny that they contemplate any such trespass upon said docks as the ordinary courts of law could not adequately compensate in damages for, or that they intend to trespass upon the rights, privileges, or property, in any way whatever, of said company.

Respondents deny that they are not pecuniarily responsible for any and all damages they may occasion said complainant company unlawfully, and they say they do not believe that said complainant company is solvent.

Respondents deny that there was any occasion for the application to enjoin them without notice, as alleged in said bill.

Respondents, further answering, say that in July, 1890, they complained to the railroad commission of the state of Florida that the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company, a railroad corporation operating a railroad in the state of Florida, discriminated against respondents by attempting to lease the exclusive use of its dock and river terminal to complainant company, by which said lease respondents, operating a competing line of steamboats, had been discriminated against in the receipt and delivery of freight to said railway; that the said commission, by decision rendered on the 14th day of August, A. D. 1890, adjudged that the charter terminus of said railroad was the channel of Indian river, to which point said road had been constructed, and that the pier and dock at Titusville are a part and parcel of the main line of said railroad, and a necessary and indispensable facility which the law enjoins it to provide for the transportation of its business, and that said railroad company had attempted by said lease to the Indian River Steam-Boat Company to vest in it the exclusive use of said pier, and refused to grant the use of the same to the East Coast Transportation Company. Further, it was considered and held by the said railroad commission that the said Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company was guilty of a violation of section 4, c. 3862, Laws Fla., and that said company do desist at once from such discrimination, and that it extend to the East Coast Transportation Company the same uses, services, facilities, and privileges at the end of said pier or wharf, in delivering and receiving freights from such company, as are extended by it to the said Indian River Steam-Boat Company. A certified copy of said proceedings and decision of said railroad commission is attached to the answer.

Respondents further aver that no proceedings have been had to set aside the said decision and order of said commission, and it is operative as a law of the state, and gives respondents the right to land at said dock and wharf for the purpose of receiving and delivering freight to and from said railroad; that said decision cannot be attacked in a collateral way, nor will an injunction lie to restrain the execution of the mandate of said commission, but the same can only be set aside or restrained by a court in a direct proceeding against said commission, as prescribed by section 21, c. 3862, Laws Fla.

Respondents allege the decision of said railroad commission as a complete bar to the relief prayed in complainant's bill, so far as it relates to the railroad wharf at Titusville, and they pray the same advantage thereof as if the same had been urged by way of plea to the bill of complaint.

Respondents further allege that the said lease by the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company to the said complainant company is not merely voidable, but the same is utterly void and worthless, upon its face, as repugnant to the common and statute laws of Florida, and a violation of the charter duties of said railroad, in attempting to exclude the general public from the use of a portion of its road, which is a public highway of the state, and a further violation of law, in that it attempts to give to said complainant corporation the exclusive use of said railroad terminal, to the exclusion of all other competing lines of steam-boats, including that of respondents.

Respondents further allege that the threats charged to have been made by respondents in said bill of complaint consisted solely in a notification sent by them to the president of said steam-boat company that he should comply with the above decision of the railroad commission and the laws of the state of Florida, or stand a trial for their violation; that said president is the active and responsible manager of the said Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company, and it was in this latter capacity that it became his duty to obey the orders of said commission, and for the omission to do which respondents threatened to prosecute.

Respondents further say that they have a legal right to land at said wharf to receive and deliver freight to and from said railroad company, and that any interference with said right by complainant company, either by wharf charge or other restrictions, is a trespass upon their right, and that said lease from said railroad company is void in so far as it conflicts with their right to use said wharf.

Further answering, and in reply to that portion of the bill alleging that respondents claim said dock and wharf to be public property, and the public are entitled to the free use of same, they say that said wharf occupies and is a part of a public street of the town of Titusville, called "Broad Street;" that a map of the town-site of Titusville was placed on record by the proprietors thereof on the 9th day of February, A. D. 1878, when said town-site was a part of Volusia county, and that upon this map Broad street was shown as at present located, except that it was 106 feet instead of 100 feet wide; that a lot was purchased on the south side of said Broad street, (by said map,) and devoted to business purposes, and after that part of Volusia county, including Titusville, was joined to Brevard county, and in the year 1881, the original proprietors of said town-site had a map of said town placed on record in Brevard county, showing the streets substantially as on the first map, certified copies of portions of said maps being attached to the answer of respondents.

Respondents further aver that, upon the faith of the dedication of the streets shown on said maps, lots were bought, money invested, and the town built up by the public, and that said dedication and use of Broad street vested the right thereto in the community beyond the subsequent control of said original proprietors.

That the object in locating the town of Titusville upon the river was to enjoy its facilities as a highway, and, Broad street being one of the only two avenues leading to the river by which it could be reached from the interior of the town without going over private property, the right to pass over said street to the river was dedicated by said maps, and the terminus of said street at the river was used by the public in accordance with the dedication by the original proprietors from 1876 until its use was interrupted by said complainant in this suit.

Further, that in 1885 the Atlantic Coast, St. Johns & Indian River Railway Company procured from Mrs. Titus, the original proprietor of the town-site of Titusville, a deed to all of Broad street, notwithstanding said street had been dedicated to and accepted by the public in 1876, and that the lots fronting thereon had been nearly all disposed of by said original proprietor prior to her sale of said street; that no dedication of Broad street for general railway purposes was ever made, the only dedication of it being to the public to use as a street, as shown by said maps.

Respondents further allege that the Atlantic Coast, St. Johns & Indian River Railway Company commenced business in January, A. D. 1886, and soon thereafter leased its road to the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company, and that during the years 1886, 1887, and 1888 the use of Broad street, and the right to pass over the end of it to Indian river, was enjoyed equally by the railroad company and the public at large, although the street had been extended to the channel of the river by the railroad for the accommodation of its business, and the right of the public to a free landing at the end of said street, according to its original dedication, was not interrupted until the year 1889, when the said Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company attempted to lease that part of the street where it had been extended to the channel of the river to the complainant, the said Indian River Steam-Boat Company.

Respondents also allege that no proceedings have ever been taken to condemn any portion of Broad street for railroad purposes; that the deed from Mrs. Titus to said railroad company in 1885 is void as far as it attempts to interrupt the easement of the public in said street; and that said railway company and its attempted lessee, the said complainant in this suit, are trespassers upon said street, which is public property, under the control of the town council of Titusville, and not in the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company or in said complainant.

In conclusion, respondents pray the same advantage of their answer as if they had pleaded or demurred to the bill of complaint.

Affidavits of W. B. Watson and S. M. Lorimer were filed on behalf of complainant company before the judge, at chambers, on January 2, A. D. 1891. These affidavits will be referred to in disposing of the questions to which they relate in the discussion of the case.

On the 3d day of January, A. D. 1891, the said complainant company filed with the judge, at chambers, a motion to strike from the files the answer of respondents, because it purports to be the answer of a corporation, and is not under its corporate seal; that, if said answer be considered the answer of individual stockholders, it is improper, as, to some or all of them, it was filed without leave first obtained; and because the motion to dissolve is based upon the answer, and must fail if there is no proper answer. Subsequent to the filing of this motion to strike, and without any action being had thereon by the court, complainant filed with the judge, at chambers, certain exceptions to the answer of respondents, on the grounds of scandal and impertinence. The portions of the answer alleged to be scandalous and impertinent are pointed out. No disposition seems to have been made of the exceptions, but on the 7th of January, A. D. 1891, the judge made the following decision on the motion to dissolve the injunction, viz.: "This cause coming on to be further heard on motion to dissolve the injunction, after hearing counsel for both parties it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the temporary injunction heretofore granted herein be dissolved, and, further, that the bill be dismissed without prejudice."

The Indian River Steam-Boat Company, complainant below, appeals from the decree dissolving the injunction and dismissing the bill.

Hamlin & Stewart, for appellant. Robbins & Graham, for appellees.

MABRY, J., (after stating the facts.) The question sought to be presented by the motion to strike the answer of respondents from the files does not properly arise. The bill was filed against R. P. Paddison, George M. Robbins, and Walter S. Graham, doing business as the East Coast Transportation Company. The answer alleges that G. F. Paddison, George M. Robbins, and Walter S. Graham composed the East Coast Transportation Company, and that R. P. Paddison was only an employe of said company. It is further stated in the answer that said company was then incorporated under the laws of Florida, but respondents waive the misnomer as to R. P. Paddison, and the failure to denominate them as a corporation in the bill. While they say they appear in their corporate capacity as the East Coast Transportation Company, in fact it is the answer of respondents individually, as they are sued.

Without a hearing on the motion to strike, complainant filed numerous exceptions to the answer, and said motion may be considered as abandoned.

The exceptions to the answer were filed after the motion to dissolve was made, and pending the consideration of said motion. It seems that an order nisi to dissolve an injunction, under the English chancery practice, obtained after exceptions to the answer have been filed, is irregular. Williams v. Davis, 1 Sim. & S. 262; Howes v. Howes, 1 Beav. 197. In Gibson v. Tilton, 1 Bland, Ch. 352, it is said by the chancellor: "On the hearing of a motion to dissolve an injunction, objections of every kind to the answer may be made, and are then in order, because the motion itself, in its very nature, is founded upon the correctness and sufficiency of the answer in every particular. Hence the plaintiff may, on the very day of hearing the motion, file exceptions to the answer, and have them then heard and decided upon. The defendant can have no cause to complain of surprise, because, by his motion, he calls upon the plaintiff to show cause why, after having well and sufficiently answered the bill, the injunction should not be dissolved; and having thus planted himself upon the sufficiency of his answer at that time, and for that purpose, he stands pledged to sustain it in all respects, or he must fail in his motion." In Stilt v. Hilton, 31 N. J. Eq. 285, it was held that, where the answer sufficiently denied the grounds of equity upon which the injunction was granted, it will be dissolved, although exceptions to other parts of the answer have been filed. The court said: "The filing of exceptions to an answer is, of itself, no objection to the dissolution of an injunction. The court will consider the exceptions only for the purpose of ascertaining whether they relate to those parts of the bill on which the injunction was awarded." The exceptions to the answer in the case now under consideration are pointed specially at the portions setting up the decision of the railroad commission, and the location of the dock in question in a public street of the town of Titusville. The conclusion we have reached in reference to the effect of such portions of the answer on the issue before us, as will fully appear in a subsequent portion of this opinion, makes it unnecessary for us to consider the question of exceptions at all, as they relate to matters which have no bearing on questions settled here. We proceed to inquire, then, into the other matters presented for our consideration upon the appeal. In so far as the correctness of granting or dissolving the injunction is involved, it is clear that we have to deal only with the matters presented by the record in relation to the Titusville dock, as no injunction was granted as to any other.

The appellees, in contending here for an affirmance of the decree of the lower court in dissolving the injunction, do not question, it seems, the sufficiency of the bill in point of equities to justify the issuance of the injunction on an ex parte showing. Upon information of the existence of the bill, and the issuance of the writ, they filed an answer, and upon that moved to dissolve. This they had a right to do, but their motion to dissolve involves the sufficient equities of the bill to justify the writ in the first instance. We will therefore inquire if the bill justified the issuance of the injunction. The last case decided by Chancellor KENT (Jerome v. Ross, 7 Johns. Ch. 315) has been recognized as occupying a foremost place on the subject of equitable jurisdiction in matters of trespass. In this case the remedy of injunction was invoked to restrain a defendant from digging and carrying away rock from plaintiff's premises, and was denied on appeal by the learned chancellor. Nothing special was alleged as to the value of the rock, or the uses to which it could be applied. The principle announced here is that an injunction will not lie to enjoin a mere trespass, where the injury is not irremediable and destructive of the estate, and when the ordinary legal remedy in a court of law will afford adequate satisfaction. In Shipley v. Ritter, 7 Md. 408, it is said that, although an injunction will not be granted to restrain a trespasser merely because he is a trespasser, yet equity will interfere where the injury is irreparable, or where full and adequate relief cannot be granted at law, or where the trespass goes to the destruction of the property as it had been held and enjoyed, or where it is necessary to prevent a multiplicity of suits. Here an injunction was decided to be proper to restrain the destruction of timber so situated with reference to a dwelling-house that it sheltered it from storms, and shaded it from the sun, and was ornamental to the grounds. A very clear view of the chancery court's powers in such cases is expressed in the case of Gause v. Perkins, 3 Jones, Eq. 177. It is here said, much difficulty occurs in defining what injury is irreparable. "The word means that which cannot be repaired, retrieved, put back again, atoned for." An example is given in this case of the destruction of the noble oaks in the state-house grove. "But the meaning of the word 'irreparable,' pointed at by this example, is not that which has been adopted by the courts either in England or in this state. Grass that is cut down cannot be made to grow again, but the injury can be adequately atoned for in money. The result of the cases fixes this to be the rule: The injury must be of a peculiar nature, so that compensation in money cannot atone for it. Where, from its nature, it may be thus atoned for, if in the particular case the party be insolvent, and on that account unable to atone for it, it will be considered irreparable." There is nothing in the nature of a dock itself to make the landing of boats thereat a cause for equitable interposition. An injunction for this purpose was granted in the case of Dying Establishment v. Fitch, 1 Paige, 97. On appeal Chancellor WALWORTH dissolved it. He says, in dissolving this injunction, that "it is sufficient for the decision of the question immediately before the court that it does not appear that any serious damage or irreparable injury will take place if the defendants continue to run their boat and land their passengers, as they have heretofore done, until the complainants' rights are admitted by the answer or settled on the hearing. On the other hand, I can readily see that retaining the preliminary injunction may produce great injury to the defendants, and for which they would be entirely without remedy, if it should finally appear that they were only in the exercise of their legal rights." The view is expressed in this case that, while an injunction may issue to restrain a trespass, there must be something peculiar in the case to sustain the jurisdiction and bring it under the head of quieting possession, or to make a case of irreparable mischief, or the value of the inheritance must be put in jeopardy by a continuance of the trespass. It has been declared by our own court that "the object and purpose of an injunction is to preserve and keep things in the same state or condition, and to restrain an act which, if done, would be contrary to equity and good conscience; and it is the appropriate relief when the remedy at law is subsequent to the injury, and the effects cannot be adequately compensated." Railroad Co. v. Spratt, 12 Fla. 26. While it is said in this case that insolvency, alone, of the person against whom the injunction is asked, is not sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to grant the writ, yet this fact may be taken in connection with other equitable grounds to aid the jurisdiction. Yonge v. McCormick, 6 Fla. 368. In Burns v. Sanderson, 13 Fla. 381, it was held that averments in a bill that defendant had interfered and intermeddled with the real estate described in the bill, and continues to do so, and has and still continues to forbid the tenants and lessees to pay the rent to the plaintiff, and has forcibly entered one of the buildings on the premises, does not lay a foundation for an injunction. It is said: "The bill does not allege that irreparable damage or mischief will ensue, nor does it state the facts complained of, so that the court may form its own conclusion in reference thereto." For all the alleged trespasses and grievances in this case there was an adequate remedy at law, and nothing was alleged to show that irreparable injury would result, and the remedy at law is inadequate to fully compensate for it.

It is to be observed, in considering the sufficiency of a bill to justify an injunction in cases of trespass, it will not do to simply allege that complainant has no adequate remedy at law, and that his damage will be irreparable. The courts will not act upon complainant's opinion, or even his fears, in such matters; but he must state facts in his bill to enable the court to determine whether or not his alleged injury will be irreparable.

Tested by the rules applicable to such cases, we think the equities of the bill in the case before us, in reference to the Titusville dock, are sufficient to justify the issuance, on proper application, of the writ of injunction. The bill alleges that the complainant company is engaged in operating boats on the Indian river, in the business of carrying freight and passengers, and is under a contract to carry the mails; that it has leased from the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company the portion of the dock and pier at Titusville particularly described in the bill, and has the exclusive right to use the same for the landing of its boats. Not only has it this right, but that it has been since March, A. D. 1889, in the exclusive use of said dock and pier, and its offices and head-quarters are there; that said dock and pier are inadequate to accommodate fully complainant's business; and that it has never held itself out as a wharfinger. The bill also alleges that the character of its traffic business—carrying perishable products—and its mail contract require complainant to act with great promptness in making connections, and a failure to do so would subject it to forfeiture and heavy penalties; that its winter business is much heavier than in the summer, and that the winter business had set in, was rapidly increasing, and that all the room on said dock was imperatively demanded to enable complainant to carry on its business, and meet its obligations under its mail contract; that the use of said dock by respondents for any considerable time would cause delays in loading and unloading, and possible loss of connections, and thereby cause irreparable damage; and, further, that complainant was under contract to transfer and deliver immediately large shipments of freight and materials, which particularly tax all its facilities to the utmost, and that any interference with said dock would at the time be especially injurious. It is then alleged that respondents have procured one or more boats, propose, and are engaged in, carrying freight and passengers on said river, and that they persist in landing their steam-boats at complainant's said dock through force and threats made by them that if they are deterred from landing, or hindered in any way in transacting their business, at said dock, they would cause to be arrested the agents and employes of complainant, and that, for each package of freight or other matter refused to be received upon said dock, they would sue complainant for damages, and that respondents threaten to continue daily to land at said dock, and to use the same freely for all purposes connected with their business, without the payment of wharfage or other charges; that notwithstanding the lease of said dock to complainant, and its exclusive occupation of the same, of all which respondents have been fully informed, they claim that said dock is public property, and they have the right, in common with all persons, to all the rights and privileges of complainant in and about the same; and that if respondents are permitted to succeed in freely using and occupying said leased premises the entire public will also insist on doing so, and the same will become worthless as a franchise and place of business for complainant.

It is further alleged that complainant apprehends that respondents cannot be deterred from using said property except by the daily use of superior force, and that if such force be used, or packages of freight consigned to them be refused, complainant would be subjected to a multitude of vexatious suits, and the use of said dock by respondents would necessitate the removal of complainant's boats at times therefrom, and would prevent it from properly conducting its business, storing its freight, mooring its boats, and would thereby cause it irreparable injury. Not only would said interference with said dock by respondents cause litigation, expense, delays such as seriously to affect its business, prejudice its rights, and cause irreparable damage, but that respondents are believed to be insolvent, and the judgments that might be recovered against them would be uncollectible. These averments are sufficient to justify the writ. See authorities above cited, and also Dudley v. Hurst, 67 Md. 44, 8 Atl. Rep. 901, 1 Amer. St. Rep. 368, and note; Burnley v. Cook, 13 Tex. 586; Rogers Locomotive & Machine Works v. Erie Ry. Co., 20 N. J. Eq. 379.

The motion to dissolve being based upon the answer of respondents, the justification of the decree of the court in dissolving the injunction must be found in the allegations of said answer, as respondents filed no additional evidence. In the beginning of an examination of the answer, we must keep in mind that, on motion to dissolve, respondents will not be permitted to rely upon new matter in avoidance, in their answer, not in response to the allegations upon which the equities of the bill are founded. It is stated in 2 High, Inj. (3d Ed.) § 1481, that "no principle of the law of injunction is better established than that where the equity of the bill is admitted by the answer, or is not denied, and the answer sets up new matter in avoidance, or contains matter which amounts to a defense, such answer is not equivalent to a denial of complainant's equities, and the injunction will not be dissolved, but will be continued until a hearing of the cause." The numerous authorities cited in the notes sustain this proposition. In Yonge v. McCormick, 6 Fla. 368, it was decided that the court, on motion to dissolve an injunction, will look into such facts of the answer, only, as are responsive to the bill, and, where a new equity is set up in the answer to avoid that disclosed in the bill, it will not be considered. Vide, also, McKinne v. Dickenson, 24 Fla. 366, 5 South. Rep. 34. In their answer, respondents admit that they have purchased a steam-boat for the carriage of freight and passengers, and are landing the same at the said Titusville dock, and that they cannot be deterred from doing so except by the daily use of superior force. They say that they are landing at said dock for the purpose of receiving and delivering freight to and from the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company, under authority of a decree of the railroad commission of the state of Florida, securing respondents in that right. Respondents then allege in their answer, that in July, 1890, they complained to the railroad commission of the state of Florida that the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company, a railroad corporation operating a railroad in Florida, discriminated against respondents by attempting to lease the exclusive use of said dock and pier at Titusville, which was the river terminal of said railroad company, and that upon their complaint, and after due hearing, said commissioners decided on the 14th day of August, A. D. 1890, that the charter terminus of said railroad company was the channel of Indian river, to which point said road had been constructed, and that said dock and pier at Titusville are a part and parcel of the main line of said railroad, and a necessary and indispensable facility which the law enjoins it to provide for the transportation of its business; further that said railroad company, by said lease to said steam-boat company, had attempted to vest in it an exclusive use of said dock; and it was thereupon adjudged that said railroad company was guilty of an unjust discrimination, under section 4, c. 3862, Laws Fla., and that it at once desist, and extend to the East Coast Transportation Company the same uses, services, facilities, and privileges at the end of said dock as are extended to the complainant company. The decision of the railroad commission, a certified copy of which is filed as a part of the answer, is set up therein as a complete bar to the relief prayed in the bill. This decision was based upon proceedings instituted by the East Coast Transportation Company against the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company, and the complainant steam-boat company was not a party to it. While it is determined in said decision that during the years 1886, 1887, and 1888 the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company transacted all its business at the end of the said dock, and all its river freight was delivered at its freight-shed at the end of said dock, and that the said dock was a part and parcel of the main line of the railroad company, to which the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company succeeded by lease, and a necessary and indispensable facility for the transaction of its business, which the law enjoins it to provide, at the same time it was decided by the said commission that it had no jurisdiction of the Indian River Steam-Boat Company, and no order was made so far as this company was concerned.

It also appears by the said decision that the commission was proceeding under the last clause of section 4, c. 3862, Laws Fla., which provides that no common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall "make any unjust discrimination in the receiving of freight from, or in the delivery of freight to, any competing lines of steam-boats in this state," and that they had not prescribed any rules and regulations defining or specifying what would be considered as acts of unjust discrimination under this clause, but deemed it advisable to let each case of alleged unjust discrimination rest upon its attending circumstances.

In the decision set up in the answer, the commission, on the complaint made, heard the facts, and decided against the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company as above stated. Appellees say that the decision has the force and effect of law, so far as their right to land at the said dock goes, and that the failure of the complainant company to allege and show this decision before the injunction was obtained was an imposition upon the court, and a just ground for dissolving the temporary injunction. On the other hand, the appellant company says that its lease was obtained from the said railroad company before the said decision was rendered, that it was not a party to the proceedings upon which said decision was based, and that the said railroad commission had no jurisdiction to adjudicate its rights in any manner whatever.

It will be observed that in this portion of the answer the decision of the commission is set up as a complete bar to the relief sought. The facts which the commission found and adjudicated to exist are not averred, but simply the decision of the commission is alleged as a sufficient defense to the equities of the bill. Under the rule above announced, we do not think the consideration of this portion of the answer comes properly before us. We are considering the correctness of the decision of the court in dissolving the temporary injunction, and the portion of the answer now under consideration is not in response to any allegation in the bill, and sets up new matter in defense of the case made in the bill. It is not such a negation of the equities of the bill as to be a responsive denial of the circumstances upon which they are based, and hence we are not called upon to pass upon this portion of the answer. Counsel for appellees do not contend that the portion of the answer alleging the dock to be a part of a public street, called "Broad Street," in the town of Titusville, is in response to the equities of the bill, and entitled to consideration on the motion to dissolve. In view of the conclusion which we have reached on the other allegations of the bill, it becomes unnecessary for us to consider this portion of the answer. What are the other allegations, then, of the answer, responsive to the equities of the bill? It is evident that complainant's equity for the injunction depends upon the validity of its title or right to the dock in question. Confining ourselves to the allegations in reference to the Titusville dock,—the one in question,—we see that the complainant company claims an exclusive right to use, occupy, and land its boats at said dock. Its right to the exclusive use of this dock is derived, it is claimed, by lease from the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company. A copy of the lease is filed with the bill. The lease covers about 390 feet of the east end of the dock, and by the terms of the lease the railway company "covenants and agrees to maintain the railroad track on said pier and bulk-head, and trestle supporting said track, and to furnish proper and adequate facilities for transfer of local freights to and from said bulk-head." It is further alleged that said leased dock and buildings thereon have been constantly occupied and used by the complainant company for its offices, head-quarters, and place of transacting most of its general business, since the 1st day of March, A. D. 1889. Respondents deny that they are seeking to make their head-quarters at said dock, but say they are landing there for the purpose of receiving and delivering freight to and from the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company. There is nothing in the affidavits to show that respondents are making any attempt to occupy any houses or to establish head-quarters on said dock. It appears in one of the affidavits that at least two of the complainant company's boats were moved on one occasion to make room for respondents' boat to land at said dock. The landing at the dock by respondents' boat is admitted, but it is alleged to be for the purpose of receiving and delivering freight to and from the railroad company. Respondents admit the alleged lease from the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company, but they deny that said lease is now in full force and effect, or ever was valid or effectual in law. They aver that said dock, so leased, constitutes the charter terminal of said railroad company; and they deny that the sole object of said complainant company in entering into said lease with said railroad company was to control premises adequate to the transaction of its business, but they aver that its object therein was also to control the said terminal facilities of the said railroad company on the Indian river at Titusville, and thus to prevent the use of said railroad terminal facilities by any competing line of steam-boats that might be put on said river, in order to preserve a monopoly of the transportation business of said river, and that the use of said railroad terminal facilities has been denied to respondents and the public since said lease.

Respondents also allege that said lease by the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company to said complainant company is not merely voidable, but the same is utterly void and worthless, upon its face, as repugnant to the common and statute laws of Florida, and a violation of the charter duties of said railroad company, in attempting to exclude the general public from the use of a portion of its road, which is a public highway of the state, and a further violation of law, in that it attempts to give to said complainant company the exclusive use of said railroad terminal to the exclusion of all other competing lines of steam-boats, including that of respondents; and they deny the allegation that they are not pecuniarily responsible for any and all damages that they may occasion said complainant company.

The mere conclusions of law stated by respondents in their answer in reference to complainant's ownership or right to the said dock can have no weight in determining the questions before us. But independent of such statements, and of the allegations in reference to the railroad commission decision, and the location of the dock in the public street, the answer denies complainant's title or right to the exclusive use of the dock; and such denial is based upon the fact that said dock constitutes a portion of the track and the terminal facility of the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company, and the exercise of the right claimed by the complainant company would have the effect to exclude other competing lines of steam-boats from landing at said railroad terminal facility. The bill discloses the fact that complainant's right to the dock was derived from the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company, which is a common carrier of freight and passengers, and the lease shows that said railroad company covenanted with the complainant company to keep the railroad track on said dock in repair, and to furnish adequate facilities for landing local freights from said dock. The answer, in effect, says that complainant has no right, notwithstanding its lease, to exclude other competing lines of steam-boats from landing at said dock, because it is a part of a railroad track, and the terminal facility of a common carrier. William B. Watson, general superintendent of the complainant company, in his affidavit, states that he is personally familiar with the objects that prompted the lease of said dock from the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company; that the main object is truthfully stated in the bill of complaint, and it was not the object of said steamboat company, in leasing said dock, to control the terminal facilities of said railroad company, or to prevent the use of said dock by any competing line that might be put on the river, in order to preserve a monopoly; that at the time of said lease there was no opposition line upon said river, nor was there any rumor or prospect that any such competing line would exist; that said dock was not then adequate to the needs of said complainant company, and said railway company did not deem it a good investment for it to expend money in enlarging said dock, and keeping the same in good repair, for the revenue that could be derived from it; that the terms of said lease were agreed upon between the railway company and complainant company as a fair and reasonable disposition of said property; and that the complainant company has expended more than $3,000 in adding to said dock since it went into possession of the same. It is also stated in the affidavit that all the dock room was needed for the complainant company in carrying on its business, and that it had never done a wharfinger business. The other portion of the affidavit has no reference to the lease. The other affidavit has no bearing on the subject of the lease.

The general rule on the subject of dissolutions of injunctions on bill and answer, prior to chapter 1098, Laws Fla., was that when the answer fully denied all the circumstances upon which the equity of the bill was based the injunction would be dissolved; but this was not an inflexible rule, and the granting and dissolving of injunctions was lodged in the sound discretion of the court, to be governed by the nature and circumstances of each case. Allen v. Hawley, 6 Fla. 143; Carter v. Bennett, Id. 214; Yonge v. McCormick, Id. 368; Hayden v. Thrasher, 20 Fla. 715. Under chapter 1098, Laws Fla., when "the defendant, in his answer, shall have denied the statements of the bill or of the accompanying affidavit, either party thereto shall have the right to introduce evidence in support or denial of the bill and accompanying affidavit or answer before the injunction or other summary order shall be dissolved, and the chancellor shall dissolve or continue the order, or may require security, according to the weight of the evidence." The old rule is modified by this statute to the extent of allowing either party to introduce evidence in corroboration or denial of the bill or answer, and affidavits before the hearing on the motion to dissolve, and that the chancellor shall then determine the matter according to the weight of the evidence. Sullivan v. Moreno, 19 Fla. 200; Fuller v. Cason, 26 Fla. 476, 7 South. Rep. 870. While the chancellor will ordinarily dissolve an injunction upon an answer denying all the equities of the bill, or where the bill and accompanying evidence are fully met by the answer and its accompanying evidence, it does not follow, as a matter of course, to do so in all cases. Where fraud is charged an illustration is found in the case of Hayden v. Thrasher, supra, that mere denials of fraud or of fraudulent intent, without a full explanation of the facts charged in the bill, will not be sufficient to justify a dissolution of the injunction rightly granted in the first instance. And so, in case an injunction is granted to prevent irreparable injury, the dissolution or continuance thereof rests in the sound discretion of the court, to be governed by the nature of the case. Fuller v. Cason, supra.

Are the averments of the answer, given above, sufficient to constitute a responsive denial of the equities of the bill upon which rests complainant's right to relief? In the case of Sullivan v. Moreno, supra, the complainant alleged that he and his grantor had for more than 30 years owned and possessed certain described parcels of land lying on the Bay of Pensacola, and during all of said time had been in the quiet possession and enjoyment of all the rights of a riparian owner, until the defendant wrongfully entered into possession of certain portions of the front of said property out in the waters of said bay, and commenced the erection of certain docks, which, if permitted, would exclude plaintiff from his rights, and do him irreparable injury. It is also averred that said docks will prevent navigation and perpetuate a nuisance. Defendant, in his answer, admitted that complainant had been in possession, and claimed to own the land mentioned in the bill, in respect to which riparian rights were asserted; but he denied that said lots ever did extend to the ordinary high-tide mark of Pensacola bay, and affirmed that said lots were always bounded on the part towards the bay by a public way, street, or common, and exhibited a certified copy of a deed showing that the lots claimed by complainant were bounded by said public street, way, or common. It was held that on this bill and answer, in the absence of other evidence, no injunction should have been granted, as the equities of the bill were completely negatived by the answer. So it was said in the cases of Allen v. Hawley and Carter v. Bennett, supra, that a denial in the answer of the circumstances upon which the equities of the bill are founded will be sufficient, ordinarily, to dissolve the injunction. In this connection it may be proper to state that in the affidavits of the general superintendent and agent of the complainant company, interposed after the answer was filed, it is not denied that the said dock is a part of the track, and constitutes the terminal facility, of the common carrier, the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company. It is true that one affidavit states that the motive in obtaining the lease was not to secure a monopoly, and exclude competing lines of steam-boats from landing at the terminal facility of said railroad company; but the facts set up in the answer in reference to the character of the dock are not denied in the affidavit, and the failure to do so is a circumstance weighing against the complainant company on this point. If what respondents have averred in connection with their denial of complainant's title or exclusive right to the dock be sufficient to destroy the equities of complainant's bill, we think it is so responsive as to be considered on the motion to dissolve.

The remaining question, then, is, has sufficient been shown to defeat complainant's equity to have the injunction continued? It is not to be denied that said railroad company, or said complainant steam-boat company, has the right to erect and maintain docks, wharves, and piers as incidental to their business, and hold them or dispose of them as deemed proper. The bill alleges, and it is admitted, that the complainant steam-boat company is a corporation, and that the nature and extent of its business render the erection and maintenance of docks and piers at Titusville, and elsewhere on the Indian river, necessary, and the right to do so is one of its charter privileges, and under the laws of this state the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company is authorized to build and maintain docks and wharves as incidental to its business. If either company should erect a dock or wharf for its private use, we know of no law to prohibit it. At least, as the matter is now presented, without any allegation or proof that the exercise of such a right would transcend the powers of such corporations, or that it is the only facility of the kind in the particular place, we cannot hold that they have no such rights. Undoubtedly, if either company should erect a dock or wharf, and open it to the public for a general wharfage business, the public would have a right to use the same, under such reasonable regulations, and upon the payment of such charges, as the owner might fix, or as might be regulated by law. Packet Co. v. Aiken, 16 Fed. Rep. 890; Cannon v. New Orleans, 20 Wall. 577; Packet Co. v. Keokuk, 95 U. S. 80; Transportation Co. v. City of Parkersburg, 107 U. S. 691, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 732. But we are not dealing with the sole question of ownership or rights in reference to a dock or wharf. It is true that the bill characterizes the property in question as a dock or pier, and it appears that there are houses thereon, occupied by the complainant company as its offices and head-quarters, and that said dock has been enlarged by said company, by expending over $3,000 on it, since its said lease. No doubt there are portions of this said dock to which said company is entitled to the exclusive use. But it also appears that upon this dock is the track and terminus of a common carrier. The landing at said dock by respondents' boat for other purposes than delivering and receiving freight to and from said carrier is denied, and complainant company, in the affidavits filed, do not deny that the railroad track and terminal facility of the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company are located on said dock. In fact, the contract of lease shows that said railroad company covenanted with the complainant company to keep in repair and maintain said track, and afford facilities for delivering freight to the latter company. We do not overlook the fact that it is alleged in the bill that there is another dock at Titusville, not owned by complainant company, at which respondents can, and sometimes do, land their boat, and that said leased dock does not interfere with the use of said other dock, or those that may be constructed on the adjacent property along the extensive water-front at Titusville. It is not alleged, nor is it contended here, that the other dock mentioned, or those that may be constructed along the water-front, would offer respondents ingress and egress to the said railroad track and terminal facility. If it was designed by this allegation to show that respondents have another way of reaching said railroad on said dock for the purpose of delivering and receiving freight to and from said railroad, it is too indefinite to accomplish this object. No such effect is claimed for it here. The real question presented here is, can complainant corporation, engaged in carrying freight and passengers on the Indian river by means of steam-boats, rent from a railroad common carrier its dock on said river, on which its track and terminal facilities are located, and exclude others from landing at said terminal point for the purpose of receiving and delivering freight and passengers to and from said common carrier? This question, we think, must be answered in the negative. If it be competent to sustain such a contract, the common carrier can select one connecting line of boats, and exclude all others from doing business with it. Such a doctrine would lead to the legalizing of a monopoly, and the sanction of an unfair and unjust preference between connecting and competing lines of transportation. We do not understand that a common carrier ever had such power as this. In the case of New England Exp. Co. v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 57 Me 188, the railroad company contracted with the Eastern Express Company to give them a certain specified space in the car attached to the passenger train, and to transport their agents and property on certain conditions, and agreeing specially that said railroad company would not grant or let any similar space in any car or cars attached to the passenger trains on its road to any other express company or persons during the continuance of said contract. This contract was declared to be void at common law, as being one obviously conferring a monopoly upon the express company. The chief justice, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "Common carriers are bound to carry indifferently, within the usual range of their business, for a reasonable compensation, all freight offered, and all passengers who may apply. All applying have an equal right to be transported, or have their freight transported, in the order of their application. They cannot legally give undue and unjust preferences, or make unequal and extravagant charges. Having the means of transportation, they are liable to an action if they refuse to carry freight or passengers without just ground for refusal." In this case it was said, in effect, that the common carrier could not escape its common-law liability, or avoid the performance of its duties to the public, by fencing off a part of a car for the Eastern Express Company. Quoting further the language of this opinion, it is said: "The very definition of a common carrier excludes the idea of the right to grant monopolies, or give special and unequal preferences. It implies indifference as to whom they may serve, and an equal readiness to serve all who may apply, and in the order of their application. The corporations derive their chartered rights from the state. They owe an equal duty to each citizen. They are allowed to impose a toll, but it is not to be so imposed as specially to benefit one and injure another. They cannot, having the means of transporting all, select from those who may apply some whom they will, and reject others whom they can but will not, carry. They cannot rightfully confer a monopoly upon individuals or corporations." In this case the contract with the express company was entered into before a statute was passed in the state of Maine giving all expressmen reasonable and equal terms, facilities, and accommodations, and the use of depots, buildings, and grounds, for the transaction of their business upon railroads in the state; but the court held that the railroad company had no right, before the passage of the act, to make such a contract. A contract similar in its nature was held void in International Exp. Co. v. Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, 81 Me. 92, 16 Atl. Rep. 370. The same doctrine was announced in the case of Sandford v. Railroad Co., 24 Pa. St. 378. Judge Lewis says in this case: "If it [the common carrier] possessed this power, it might build up one set of men, and destroy others; advance one kind of business, and break down another, and might make even religion and politics the tests in the distribution of its favors. Such a power in a railroad corporation might produce evils of the most alarming character. The rights of the people are not subject to any such corporate control. Like the customers of a grist-mill, they have a right to be served, all other things being equal, in the order of their application. A regulation, to be valid, must operate on all alike. If it deprives any persons of the benefits of the road, or grants exclusive privileges to others, it is against law, and void." In Bennett v. Dutton, 10 N. H. 481, the facts were that the defendant was the proprietor of a stage-coach running daily between Amherst and Nashua, which connected at the latter place with another coach, running between Nashua and Lowell, and thus formed a continuous mail and passenger line from Lowell to Amherst, and onward to Francistown. A third person ran a coach to and from Nashua to Lowell. The defendant agreed with the proprietor of the coach connecting with his line that he would not receive passengers who came from Lowell to Nashua in the coach of such third person on the same day that they applied for passage to places above Nashua. It was here held that defendant was bound to receive the plaintiff; there being sufficient room, and no evidence that he was an unfit person, or that he had any design to injure defendant. In Marriott v. Railway Co., 1 C. B. (N. S.) 499, it was held that an arrangement made by a railway company with the proprietor of an omnibus running between a station on its railroad and another point, to provide omnibus accommodations for all passengers by any trains on said road, by which the proprietor of said omnibus was allowed the exclusive privilege of driving his vehicle into the station-yard of said railroad for the purpose of taking up and setting down passengers at the door of said railroad office, was a breach of the prohibition against granting unfair preferences. This decision was made under St. 17 & 18 Vict. prohibiting "undue and unreasonable" preference. Such a statute, however, has been regarded in America as declaratory of the common law, and the same result would be reached independent of the statute. Sandford v. Railroad Co., supra; 1 Wood, Ry. Law, p. 563, § 195. See, also, the following authorities bearing on this branch of the case: Railroad Co. v. Burrows, 33 Mich. 6; Rogers Locomotive & Machine Works v. Erie Ry. Co., 20 N. J. Eq. 379; Messenger v. Railroad Co., 36 N. J. Law, 407; Messenger v. Railroad Co., 37 N. J. Law, 531, McDuffee v. Railroad, 52 N. H. 430.

The respondents denied that they were insolvent, and there is nothing in the affidavits on this subject. In determining the propriety of dissolving or continuing an injunction, the chancellor may not only anticipate the character of the injury that may result to the complainant in the event he should finally succeed, but he can also consider the extent and character of the damage which defendant may sustain by means of the injunction. Dyeing Establishment v. Fitch, supra. The proceedings here do not call for a cancellation of the lease from the railroad company to the complainant steam-boat company, yet, from what has been said, it is evident that the latter company cannot avail itself of said lease to prevent the respondents from reaching the railroad track and terminal facility of the former company. State v. Railroad Co., 29 Conn. 538. The temporary injunction was dissolved by the chancellor on bill, answer, and affidavits. His action should not be disturbed unless we can see that a sound discretion has been abused.

The chancellor not only dissolved the injunction, but dismissed the bill. In dismissing the bill, we think, there was error. The bill alleged that respondents were using and occupying said dock and pier at Titusville, and the premises and appurtenances thereto, and also using and occupying numerous other docks at other points on said river. The injunction prayed was to restrain respondents from such use of said docks, and from making them the usual place for landing their boat, and that complainant be decreed the undisturbed and undivided possession of said docks. No injunction was granted as to any of the docks except the one at Titusville, but respondents answered, tendering an issue upon the averments as to the other docks. They deny that they are making their head-quarters on the Titusville dock, or using the same otherwise than as a landing at the railroad terminus for the purpose of receiving and delivering freight from and to the said railroad. It was proper, we think, to dissolve the injunction restraining respondents from landing their boat at the Titusville dock, under the circumstances. Still, the bill states a case which would, if proven, entitle the complainant to the relief asked upon the final hearing, and it was not proper to dismiss its bill without an opportunity to sustain it in the usual way of making proof in such cases. It cannot be said that no other relief was sought in the bill, except to restrain respondents from landing their boat at the Titusville dock. Under the allegations here, and the circumstances of this case, the bill should not have been dismissed. 2 High, Inj. § 1477; Gray v. Baldwin, 8 Blackf. 164.

The decree of the chancellor, in so far as it dissolved the injunction, is affirmed, and, in so far as it dismissed the bill, is reversed; the costs of the appeal to be divided between the parties.

FISHER et al. v. BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF CITY SCHOOLS OF NEW ORLEANS et al. (No. 10,888.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Jan. 4, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)[1]

PUBLIC SCHOOLS—BOARD OF DIRECTORS—TAXES—CERTIFICATES OF INDEBTEDNESS.

1. The board of directors of the public schools for New Orleans have the control of the school funds placed in their charge for the maintenance of the schools.

2. It devolves upon the board to compel corporations to comply with their ordinances levying taxes for the schools, if they fail to comply with their obligation in this respect.

3. The board of directors of schools has authority to stand in judgment; to institute or to defend suits.

4. A creditor of the school board has no right of action against the city of New Orleans to compel the city to recognize the validity of his claim.

5. School certificates of indebtedness by the board of directors of the public schools for the years 1874, 1875, and 1876 are not debts of the city of New Orleans, and actions for the purpose of having them recognized as valid claims can be maintained against the school board, as it is authorized to pass upon the validity of the evidence of indebtedness of every one who alleges that he is a creditor.

6. The city of New Orleans turns over amounts collected for schools to the treasurer of the school board. This officer notes the taxes of the different years, and applies the amount to the payment of certificates from the taxes of those years from which the creditors are entitled to payment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; NICHOLAS H. RIGHTOR, Judge.

Suit by Mrs. M. M. Fisher and husband against the board of directors of the city schools of New Orleans to recover on certain certificates. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Modified. Rehearing refused.

BREAUX, J. Plaintiff sues, as owner of school certificates, to recover the sum of $8,097.17, with legal interest from judicial demand. These certificates were issued to teachers in 1874, 1875, and 1876 by the board of directors of the public schools, for salaries earned during those years. The petitioner prays for a judgment against the board of directors of the city schools, payable from the school-tax levied, prior to 1879, by the city of New Orleans. The defendants deny any indebtedness. Judgment was rendered recognizing plaintiff as a creditor of the school fund of the city of New Orleans for the amount claimed, with legal interest from judicial demand, to be paid, in due course, out of the school-tax levied prior to 1879. From this judgment the school board and the mayor of the city of New Orleans appeal. Plaintiff does not contend that her certificates are due by the city of New Orleans, but sues, she states in her brief, "to have whatever claims she has against the school fund recognized and paid whenever the city is enabled to collect those funds." Under the school law as it was when those certificates were issued, the city cannot be held as a debtor of the said plaintiff. The school board was an independent authority, organized under a separate act of incorporation, vesting them with distinct functions, free from all other local government. The schools were not city schools, but schools established by the state to instruct the children in the several parishes. They were styled the "common schools of the state," and were placed under the management of a "state board of directors." The state was divided into six school divisions, and superintendents were appointed in each, with salaries payable by the state treasurer out of the public school fund. The members of the school board for the city were appointed by the state board of education. Those boards employed teachers, fixed salaries, and incurred expenses for which they were responsible. They also issued certificates to teachers representing their salaries. The statute required an estimate of debts and expenditures by this board in October, each year, which was submitted to the city council. The latter complied with the requirements, and during the years 1874, 1875, and 1876 the sum of $844,677.16 was collected for the schools, and there was deposited in the hands of the school treasurer an amount of cash and certificates which more than balanced the said amount collected. The records disclose that, in compliance with an ordinance to carry into effect provisions of Act 49 of the general assembly of 1880, the authorized officers of the city of New Orleans received, in payment of municipal taxes due anterior to 1879, a part of the school certificates prior to that year. There are uncollected balances for the schools, due by tax debtors, which will form part of the fund for the payment of teachers' salaries of 1874, 1875, and 1876.

The question is one of recognition of the claim vel non. Judgment against the school board, recognising the claim, serves every purpose of a recognition. This body has authority to pass on the validity of any evidence of indebtedness against the school fund; to stand in judgment; to institute and defend suits. One of its creditors has no right of action against the city of New Orleans to compel her to recognize the validity of a claim. If she fails to comply with the law relating to school funds, the board has authority to enforce compliance. It is not suggested by the pleadings there has been any failure in this respect. This court has decided that there is "no privity between the city of New Orleans and the holders of school certificates, who are exclusively creditors of the school board." Labatt v. New Orleans, 38 La. Ann. 289. The holders of these certificates had, under Act 36 of 1873, the right to recover payment out of the funds in the hands of the school treasurer levied for the years during which the salary was earned. Under that act the board, in contracting debts, was limited to the revenue of the year during which the salary was earned. Similar restriction is contained in Act No. 123 of 1874. According to the terms of the last-mentioned act, the remainder, after payment of the year for which collected, was to be applied to the expenses of the succeeding year. Under Act 49 of 1880, school certificates issued for 1874, 1875, and 1876 were made receivable for any taxes due prior to 1879. This had the effect of creating one fund for school indebtedness prior to said year. Under the present law, Act 81 of 1888, the board of directors have no authority to bind the city to the payment of any amount. They administer school affairs without any possible control on the part of the city authorities. The treasurer of New Orleans is ex officio treasurer of the board, and receives all funds collected for the support of the public schools. Upon him devolves the payment of payrolls and evidence of indebtedness to teachers and other employes of the board. He pays upon the order of the school board. Judgment against the school board for recognition of the claims serves every needful purpose for which suit has been brought. The judgment appealed from is amended by dismissing the claim against the city, and affirming the judgment against the board of school directors. As amended judgment is affirmed, at appellee's cost.

[1] Rehearing refused, February 8, 1892.

PURVES v. GERMANIA INS. CO. (No. 10,852.)

SAME v. FIREMEN'S INS. CO. (No. 10,852.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Jan. 4, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)[1]

INSURANCE—CONDITIONS—WAIVER—ACTION ON POLICY.

1. The insured may either expressly or by implication waive the preliminary proof and the certificate of loss.

2. There was an implied, if not an express, waiver of the defects of the certificate.

3. The contract of insurance is one of indemnity.

4. The insurer obligates himself to make good such loss or damage as may be sustained, not exceeding the amount of the policy.

5. The evidence of the value of another plant than that destroyed by fire, and for which indemnity under a policy is claimed, tends to establish the value of the destroyed plant.

6. It is not conclusive, and will not be maintained, when a number of witnesses testified as to the capacity and value of the destroyed plant.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Judge.

Actions by John T. Purves against the Germania Insurance Company and the Firemen's Insurance Company to recover on policies of insurance. The actions were consolidated, and a verdict and judgment entered for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Modified. Rehearing refused.

Buck, Dinkelspiel & Hart, for appellants. Joseph N. Wolfson, (B. R. Forman, of counsel,) for appellee.

BREAUX, J. Plaintiff was the owner of generators, ferment tanks, mash-tubs, vinegar tanks, and such implements as are needful in carrying on the business of manufacturer of vinegar. He also had vinegar in tanks and in store at his plant, one-half of which was insured in the Germania Insurance Company in the sum of $5,000, and the other half, in a similar amount, in the Firemen's Insurance Company, as follows: On generators, ferment tanks, mash-tubs, and vinegar tanks, and such other implements usual to their trades as vinegar manufacturers, $5,500; on stock of vinegar in store and in tanks, $2,300; on boiler, pump, and machinery, $1,000; on stock of sugar and molasses in barrels, $950; on empty barrels, $200; on office furniture, $50; total, $10,000. The policy issued by the Firemen's Insurance Company is dated the 13th day of December, 1888, and that issued by the Germania Insurance Company is dated the 16th day of November, 1889. At the end of the year they were renewed and continued another year. At the time the policies were issued the property belonged to the Southern Vinegar Company. In March, 1889, it was sold to plaintiff for $4,000. The policies were transferred in due form. On the 3d day of July, 1890, the plant was nearly all destroyed by fire.

The following is a detailed list furnished by plaintiff: Sixty-two generators, each containing 30 bushels of beech shavings. Each generator contained 8,370 gallons of vinegar. Also 6 gallons of 90 grains vinegar, and 10 gallons of a lower grade. Thirty large generators, which contained, each, 120 bushels of beech shavings; and 8 barrels of 80 grains vinegar; besides 18 gallons, also, of a higher grade, and 25 of lower grades. Two tanks. Appurtenances on tanks. Six "knocked down" cisterns. Vinegar on hand, 6,550 gallons. Two tanks with 3,000 gallons low wines, $150; and three tanks with 9,000 gallons of mash.

The property is valued in the "proof of loss" at.....	$7,084.32
The property saved is valued	1,514.11
	$5,570.21

The generator is a vessel made of second-hand (oak) wine-casks. They are placed uprightly. They have a top and heading. The tops are perforated, and placed in the vessel, resting on the shavings; the others cover them. Beech shavings are placed in the vessel and pressed. Afterwards the generator is charged with vinegar, which saturates the shavings. Thus saturated, they will last as many as 15 years for vinegar manufacturing purposes. A preparation called "mash" is the first process. It consists of molasses water and yeast fermented. It is poured into stills and distilled into low wines. It passes to a receiving tank, and from it to the generator, where the vinegar is formed. The vinegar is daily drawn from the generators. The case was tried by jury; verdict was for plaintiff.

[1] Rehearing refused February 8, 1892.

EXCEPTION.

The defendants' exception to the prematurity of the action presents the first question which arises for our decision. It was referred to the merits by consent of all parties. A few days subsequent to the fire the plaintiff sent his preliminary proofs to adjust the loss to the defendants. They were returned as incomplete. Others were written on the 16th of July, and a few days afterwards placed in defendants' hands, and they acknowledged the receipt in writing, mentioned no defects, and did not present any objection. One of these was mislaid. On the adjuster's request, another copy was furnished. In the certificate appended to the proof the notary did not certify that he was the nearest notary to the place of the fire, and that he had no interest in the loss. The plaintiff testifies that this omission was waived by the adjuster. The adjuster testifies that he only waived the clause of the policy relating to the notary's residence. On defendants' notice, plaintiff produced his books as required. He was also examined at length as to his loss, at which examination defendants' adjuster was present, and propounded such questions as he saw proper. The adjuster wrote out his estimate of loss, which was not accepted. On the 21st of August a certificate was made by another notary, setting forth that he was without interest or concern in the loss. Plaintiff testifies, substantially, that it was intended as cumulative, and not as a waiver of the final proof in possession of the defendants. In September the defects of the original certificates were called to plaintiff's attention, and he was notified that the 2d of that month was the date of proof. Considering that the first proof was returned for correction; that the second was retained by defendants; that the assured submitted his books, and that he was examined as to his loss by defendants; that a second copy was furnished of mislaid copy, and a second certificate was prepared as additional formality; that no notice of any defect was given prior to September, after further attempt at settlement had been abandoned,—the case will not be dismissed. If the adjuster's conduct would induce an honest belief that the proofs then being made were all the company required, and the assessed did so believe, the jury might find that formal proofs were waived. Wheeler v. Association, (Minn.) 47 N. W. Rep. 149. The facts in the case of Daul v. Insurance Co., 35 La. Ann. 99, are similar in many respects. The court held that the assured may waive preliminary proof, either expressly or by implication.

ON THE MERITS.

The contract of insurance is one of indemnity. The insurer obligates himself to make good such loss or damage as may be sustained, not exceeding the amount of the policy. The defendants contend that the amount claimed exceeds the value of the property, and that part of the property destroyed was not covered by the policy. In interpreting the contract we will commence by charging up the value of the property in regard to which there is less difference. The 30 large generators are not overvalued at $22 each,—$660. The witnesses do not materially differ about these, and the defendants substantially admit the correctness of the estimate. The records do not disclose that 62 generators at $8.50 is an overcharge; total, $527. The defendants admit that they are worth about $7 each. One of the witnesses for plaintiff, who is one of the directors of the defendant company the Germania, and who was president of the Southern Vinegar Company, from whom plaintiff bought the plant, testified that they cost a larger amount. With reference to the vinegar shavings, this witness said that it takes a bushel of shavings to every 10 gallons' capacity; that he bought the shavings, and in buying them followed that proportion; that while he was connected with the management they took out about half of the shavings, and charged the generators with fresh shavings. The witnesses differ materially respecting the number of bushels of shavings. We have determined to adopt that proportion in establishing the quantity in the small generators, viz., 10,354 @ 28 cents, $289.90. This proportion will not be followed in so far as relates to the large generators, for the reason that the companies have admitted a larger number; and one of their witnesses on the subject testified that 100 bushels were placed in several of these generators, charged under his direction. These large generators produced more, proportionally, than the small ones. The number of 100 is taken as correct; making, total, 3,000 bushels, @ 28 cents, $840. The quantity of vinegar in the tank has given rise to a number of estimates. The vinegar could not be measured in the generators at any time after they were charged, for the least handling would have destroyed them. After weighing the conflicting testimony, and endeavoring, as far as possible, to make it conform to a proportionate number of shavings used, we concluded that the 62 generators contained each 65 gallons of vinegar,—4,030 gallons, at 16 cents, $644.80. We make a proportionate deduction from the quantity of the vinegar fluid in the large generators to the number of bushels of shavings found by us, viz., five-sixths,—$1,440. The witnesses have all testified that the vinegar is all used in saturating the shavings, except possibly comparatively few gallons at the bottom of the generators. In throwing away part of the saturated shavings, as was proven, some of the vinegar must also have been lost. Of this we have kept account by making deductions as above. There are amounts charged for vinegar in process of manufacture and vinegar manufactured, in the generators at the time of the fire. The total is $241.-82. Part of this is for the manufactured article, not yet drawn; amount, $95.90. It was merchantable vinegar, which would have been drawn that day, had not the fire occurred. The remainder is for vinegar that settles at the bottom of the vessel. This remainder, viz., $145.92, is not sustained by the evidence. The plaintiff claims the value of two tanks and appurtenances destroyed, $76. This also is covered by the policy. The claim for "knocked down" cisterns is not within the terms of the insurance. On statement 2 of the "proof of loss," it is claimed under the following reference to the property in the policy, viz.: "One stock of vinegar in store and in tank, mash, and 'low wines.' The mixture in process of manufacture is not vinegar, and is not included within the terms of the policy insuring vinegar; nor is it included within the clause insuring implements of the plant. It was not an instrument of the plant, nor a tool, utensil, or vessel, and therefore it is not an implement. The president of the company, who insured the plant originally, so understood. The insured, testifying, says: "I claim nothing out of the company, nothing but the loss of the vinegar and the generators." It is proven that plaintiff lost, in addition, 6,550 of vinegar; that is, 5 barrels of vinegar, worth $458.50; and 17½ barrels of vinegar saved. Plaintiff admits in his testimony that there should be deducted an amount on statement 3 of $48.51, and from said $458.50. An amount, it is claimed, should be deducted for depreciation in the value of the property. The testimony to prove depreciation is conflicting. We have appraised the implements of the plant and the vinegar separately at their value. We did not consider the value of the plant as a whole. Its life is at least 10 years. It was established not long since. It had been repaired and improved. It was in good order. Our conclusion will not admit of deduction for deterioration. The value of the property destroyed amounts to $5,032.10; from which we deduct the amount for which the property damaged sold, $148.-26; vinegar sold, $48.51; balance, $4,835.-33.

The fermentation and distillation of mixtures in the manufacture of vinegar was a new subject to us. We have given it our best attention, and concluded that the verdict should be reduced to said amount. There being two judgments in the case as consolidated, each judgment is amended and the amount reduced.

John T. Purves v. Germania Insurance Company, Consolidated.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the verdict and the judgment appealed from in said case be amended by reducing the same from $2,732.95 to $2,-417.65, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on the last-mentioned amount from judicial demand. As amended, judgment is affirmed; plaintiff and appellee to pay costs of appeal.

John T. Purves v. Firemen's Insurance Co., Consolidated

It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the verdict and the judgment appealed from be amended by reducing it from $2,732.95 to $2,417.65, with interest thereon at 5 per cent. from judicial demand. As amended, judgment affirmed; plaintiff and appellee to pay costs of appeal.

BILLGERY et al. v. ARNAULT, State Tax Collector. (No. 10,865.)

TAX-SALES—ACQUIESCENCE—INJUNCTION.

1. The plaintiff must prove his alleged ownership of the property advertised for the payment of taxes to enable him to maintain an injunction, and have the taxes canceled bearing on the property.

2. The title to part of the property was annulled by judgment.

3. To escape payment of the taxes on the part to which they have no title, they cannot maintain the position that their purchase of the judgment has had the effect of reviving the title it annuls.

4. By buying the judgment to which they were parties, and which had the effect of settling their indebtedness, they acquiesced in its correctness.

5. With reference to property not affected by the judgment and owned by plaintiffs.

6. The article 123 of the constitution of 1868 required the timely recordation of all mortgages or privileges to make them effectual against third persons.

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Judge.

Injunction by J. M. Billgery and others against L. Arnault, state tax collector, to restrain him from selling certain land for taxes. From a judgment dissolving their injunction plaintiffs appeal. Modified. Rehearing refused.

Frank Michinard, for appellants. Wynne Rogers, for appellee.

BREAUX, J. Petitioners as tutor and individually have obtained an injunction restraining the defendant state tax collector from selling their property for the state taxes for the years 1869, 1871, 1872, 1873, 1874, 1875, 1876, and 1878, under the provisions of Act 82 of 1884. They allege that these properties were purchased by the late Joseph Billgery, from whom they inherit, at a sheriff's sale on the 29th and 30th of September, 1874, under execution issued on a judgment for city taxes of 1873; that at the date of the purchase none of the privileges or mortgages securing the claims of the state were recorded in the mortgage office, to affect third persons, and that the assessments in the name of Francois Lacroix, subsequently to the adjudication, are illegal, null, and void; that the amount for which the property was adjudicated was ample to pay the claim of the state at the time, had legal notice been given of their existence; that it was duly paid by the sheriff to the adjudicatee. Plaintiffs plead prescription of 3, 5, and 10 years. From a judgment rejecting their demand and dissolving their injunction plaintiffs appeal.

The plaintiffs are in error in alleging that the late Joseph Billgery bought at sheriff's sale, in 1874, all the property advertised for taxes, and the sale of which they enjoin. There are 21 different descriptions in the deed of 30th of September of that year, numbered, respectively, from 1 to 21, inclusive. Of these, 6 are advertised to be sold for taxes, viz., 10, 11, 12, 13, 18, and 19 of the advertisement annexed to plaintiffs' petition. No. 19 was not one of the lots in the transfer of 30th of September, 1874, and the records do not disclose that it was, at any time, transferred to plaintiffs' author, although it is described in the judgment in favor of Parker, administrator, as property adjudicated September, 1874. On the 1st day of July, 1875, Francois Lacroix, the tax debtor, mortgaged part of the property to Billgery, adjudicated to him (Billgery) at sheriff's sale on 30th September, 1874. Two of these properties, 4 and 13 of the act of mortgage, (Nos. 2 and 5 of the sheriff's deed, and 11 and 12 of the advertisement or tax-sale,) were thus mortgaged to secure $5,500. There were other lots included in the deed of mortgage, not at all involved in the tax issues of this case. In July, 1875, Joseph Billgery being dead, on the petition of E T. Parker, as administrator of the succession of Francois Lacroix, a judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, decreeing the said succession to be the owner of the lots of ground and improvements described in nine different descriptions of the petition. Of these lots, the seventh is advertised to be sold, and is No. 10 of the advertisement; the second also, and is No. 11 of the advertisement; the fifth also, and is Nos. 12 and 13 of the advertisement; the eighth also, and is No. 19 of the advertisement; the first also, and is No. 18 of the advertisement, as described in the judgment. Lots 3, 4, 6, and 9 (the title to which is annulled by said judgment) are not advertised, and no taxes are claimed on them. In the petition in the case of Parker v. Billgery et al. the administrator prayed for a judgment setting aside and annulling the adjudication made September, 1874. This was avoided, the adjudication was not entirely annulled, but the court decreed that plaintiff should recover the before-described properties. The judgment does not refer to the remaining property adjudicated, nor to the adjudication sought to be annulled. In the judgment credit was given to the plaintiff Parker, administrator, for the rents of the property from the day of the said adjudication. Credit was given to the defendants for the sum paid by the adjudicatees to the sheriff as the price of adjudication; also for the taxes paid. After allowing the proper credits, the balance was against the heirs of Billgery in the sum of $999.75, which they were condemned to pay. In August, 1879, the defendants in said case, who are the plaintiffs in the present case, bought the judgment which had been rendered against them, and which recognized the title to the nine properties before mentioned to be in the succession of Francois Lacroix. They became the owners of the right of the plaintiff in that case, as established by the judgment they bought. The purchase price, when Billgery became the owner at the sheriff's sale, in 1874, for the payment of the city taxes, was $2,474. In allowing the credits before mentioned, the price of the said adjudication and the taxes were included. The plaintiffs are the owners of a judgment decreeing that they are not the owners of certain described property, and that they are indebted in a certain sum, which they have settled by buying the judgment. Being parties in thus buying, they have acquiesced in the terms of the judgment in such a manner as to preclude them from defeating the taxes previously assessed. They cannot be creditors and debtors of the same amount in one judgment. Eastin v. Dugat, 4 La. 399. Two of the properties having been mortgaged by Lacroix to Billgery in 1875 make it evident that these parties did not attach great importance to the title that the latter had acquired by the adjudication made to him.

Plaintiffs urge that an appeal was taken by them from the judgment they bought, and that it is pending at this time. There is such an appeal in this court, which remains undisposed of, for the reason that the defendants and appellants have become the owners of the judgment, and further proceedings are no longer possible. The titles to 10, 11, 12, 13, 18, and 19 of the advertisement have been annulled by the judgment before mentioned. Nineteen never was plaintiffs' property. The records do not disclose that Nos. 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 15, 16, 17 ever were the property of plaintiffs or their author; and they are therefore without interest. As to these, lot 4 of the adjudication and 14 of the advertisement is in the name of plaintiff's author, and all taxes of 1869, 1871, to and including 1877 are claimed. The same is true of lot 6 of the adjudication, and of the advertisement, with the exception that the delinquent list shows taxes due for 1874, 1875, 1876, and 1877. With reference to these two properties, no delinquent list was recorded at the time of the adjudication, in 1874. Article 123 of the constitution of 1868 required the recordation of all mortgages or privileges to make them effectual as against third persons. Jacob v. Preston, 31 La. Ann. 517; Succession of McCloskey, 32 La. Ann. 148.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be amended by annulling and canceling the state taxes for the years claimed on lot 4 of the adjudication and 14 of the advertisement, and on lot 6 of the adjudication and the same number of the advertisement; and that as to these two lots (6 and 4) the injunction be made perpetual, and the taxes claimed on them annulled and canceled. With reference to lots 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 15, 16, and 17 of the advertisement, the judgment is affirmed. With reference to lots 10, 11, 12, 13, 18, and 19, they are to be sold for the payment of

BUTLER v. CLARKE. (No. 10,847.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Jan. 18, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)[1]

INSOLVENCY—PREFERENCES—ESTOPPEL.

1. Where an insolvent, before his cession, is the owner of certain promissory notes of a third person, which promissory notes are all separate and distinct obligations, and secured by separate, distinct, and successive mortgages, resting on the same piece of real property, and where the insolvent pledges these promissory notes to different creditors, the pledgee of the second mortgage note is an ordinary creditor as to the proceeds of the first mortgage note.

2. That is, these notes being different res, the fact that a creditor is the pledgee of the second mortgage note gives this creditor no preference to be paid over the general creditors, out of the proceeds of the first mortgage note.

3. The principle recognized in our jurisprudence, that the assignor of one of several concurrent mortgage notes, secured by the same mortgage, is estopped from contesting his assignee's right to be paid by preference over the concurrent notes retained by him, is fully discussed, and shown to be inapplicable to this case.

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; ALBERT VOORHIES, Judge.

Proceedings by Thomas Butler against Mrs. M. O. Clarke to recover on a promissory note given by James Clarke. The syndic of the creditors of James Clarke, the Mutual National Bank of New Orleans, and Westfeldt Bros., interveners. From the judgment, the syndic, the Mutual National Bank, and Westfeldt Bros. appeal. Reversed. Rehearing refused.

Gilmore & Baldwin, (Ernest T. Florance, of counsel,) for J. Watts Kearney, syndic, appellant. Singleton, Browne & Choate, for appellee Mutual Nat. Bank. Joseph C. Gilmore, for appellees Westfeldt Bros.

FENNER, J. The parties have agreed upon a statement of facts in this case; and, although the statement is lengthy, we will not endanger its completeness by abbreviation. It is as follows: "The parties to the present proceedings are: (1) Thomas Butler, plaintiff; (2) Mrs. M. O. Clarke, defendant; (3) the syndic of the creditors of James Clarke, appearing in the place of the provisional syndic, intervener; (4) the Mutual National Bank of New Orleans, intervener; (5) Westfeldt Bros., a commercial firm of this city, interveners. Mrs. M. O. Clarke, a widow, is the mother of James Clarke. James Clarke, until his cession, in July, 1890, was engaged in business as wholesale dealer in coffee, in New Orleans, under the firm name of James Clarke & Co. In June, 1880, Mrs. M. O. Clarke was indebted to her son, James Clarke, in the sum of $4,832.22, as shown by an account rendered her at the time, and which account she acknowledged to be correct before a notary public. Mrs. M. O. Clarke liquidated this indebtedness by her own promissory note for $4,832.22, dated June 1, 1880, maturing one year after date, bearing interest at 8% per annum, from date, and secured this promissory note by a mortgage dated June 14, 1880, and duly inscribed. On July 31, 1883, Mrs. Clarke was similarly indebted to her son, James Clarke, in a second sum of $8,614.79, which sum she also liquidated by a promissory note, and secured this by a second mortgage, dated August 8, 1883, duly recorded. On December 31, 1885, she was indebted to James Clarke in the sum of $6,340.75; and she gave a promissory note for that amount, and secured it by a third mortgage, dated June 28, 1886, duly recorded. On the 1st of June, 1889, she was indebted to James Clarke in a fourth sum, of $9,115.71; and for the fourth time she gave to him her promissory note for a corresponding amount, and secured it by a fourth mortgage, dated September 7, 1889, duly recorded. On the 14th of June, 1890, she was indebted to James Clarke again in the full sum of $9,115.71; and she gave to the said James Clarke her promissory note for that amount, and secured it by a fifth mortgage, dated the 24th day of June, 1890, duly recorded. The mortgages all rest on the same piece of real estate, viz., a house situated at the corner of St. Charles avenue and Fourth street; but they are all separate and distinct from one another, and secure separate and distinct obligations, arising at different times. After these promissory notes of Mrs. M. O. Clarke—each secured by separate mortgage from its fellows—had been given by her, for value received, to James Clarke, they became the property of James Clarke. On September 8, 1888, James Clarke borrowed $5,000 from Thomas Butler, plaintiff in the present suit, and gave his promissory note therefor, payable one year after date, and secured his promissory note by pledging as collateral the first mortgage note of Mrs. M. O. Clarke, dated June 14, 1880, with a face value of $4,832.22, and with accrued interest at 8% per annum from date. On February 10, 1890, Clarke borowed from the Mutual National Bank $6,300, and gave his promissory note therefor, securing this promissory note by pledging as collateral a note of Philip Thompson for a like amount, which note was a valuable security, and worth its face value at maturity. This note of Philip Thompson, which had been pledged by James Clarke to the Mutual National Bank, was withdrawn by Clarke on May 7, 1890, the day of its maturity, when it would have been paid if not withdrawn. Instead of this note, there was pledged to the bank as collateral the mortgage note of Mrs. M. O. Clarke for $8,614.79, with accrued interest at 8% per annum; the note being dated July 31, 1883, and being the second one of the notes referred to above, and secured by the second mortgage in rank. The note of James Clarke, given to the Mutual National Bank, which this second mortgage note of Mrs. M. O. Clarke was given to secure, was originally for $6,300. This note of James Clarke, however, before his insolvency, was, by a payment of $4,000 thereupon, reduced to $2,300, so that the second mortgage note made by Mrs. M. O.

[1] Rehearing refused, February 8, 1892.

Clarke, amounting to $8,614.79, is now pledged to the Mutual National Bank to secure an amount due by James Clarke of $2,300. This note of Philip Thompson was withdrawn by Clarke in order to return it to Thompson, who had paid a note for the same amount, which he had received from Clarke and discounted. On the 6th of April, 1889, James Clarke obtained a loan from the Mutual National Bank of $5,000, and gave in pledge, to secure that loan, the third and fourth mortgage notes given by Mrs. M. O. Clarke, amounting, respectively, to $6,340.75 and $9,115.71, both with accrued interest. In June, 1890, James Clarke borrowed from Westfeldt Bros., of this city, $5,000, and gave his note therefor, and pledged as collateral security the fifth mortgage note given by Mrs. M. O. Clarke, amounting to $9,115.71. In July, 1890, James Clarke made a voluntary cession of all his property to his creditors. The petition and schedule were duly filed in this honorable court, in division A, under number 30,763, and John R. Picton was duly appointed provisional syndic. In September, 1890, the promissory note for $5,000, given by James Clarke to Thomas Butler, which was secured by a pledge of Mrs. M. O. Clarke's first mortgage note for $4,832.22, with accrued interest, fell due, and, being unpaid, Butler, the holder of the collateral security, provoked executory process against Mrs. M. O. Clarke in the present proceedings. A writ of seizure and sale was duly issued, and under that writ the real estate so mortgaged was sold, realizing in cash $15,200. Before the day of sale, interventions and oppositions filed brought the following parties before the court: (1) The Mutual National Bank, holding pledged to it as collateral (a) the second mortgage note of Mrs. M. O. Clarke, for $8,614.79, with accrued interest at 8% per annum, to secure a note of James Clarke for $2,300; and (b) the third and fourth mortgage notes of Mrs. M. O. Clarke, to secure a note of James Clarke for $5,000,—the bank claiming that under these pledges it should be paid out of what remains of the proceeds of the real estate after the claim of Thomas Butler is satisfied. (2) Westfeldt Bros., a commercial firm of this city, holding the fifth mortgage note of Mrs. M. O. Clarke, pledged to secure a note of James Clarke for $5,000. Westfeldt Bros. claim the right to be paid out of the proceeds of the real estate after the bank and Butler are satisfied. (3) The provisional syndic of the creditors of James Clarke. In place of the provisional syndic the definitive syndic now stands. The claim of the syndic is that the general creditors of James Clarke are entitled to have distributed among them the surplus that may remain on each mortgage note of Mrs. M. O. Clarke after the note of James Clarke that it has pledged to secure has been paid, and he and his claim are eliminated from the case. The Mutual National Bank filed proceedings in the civil district court, and applied for a writ of seizure and sale on the mortgage notes held by it, shortly after the proceedings instituted by Butler, and prior to the sale of the property."

The questions presented for our solution in this case arise out of conflicting rights in the distribution of the proceeds of sale of the mortgaged property. The syndic of James Clarke claims that all the mortgage notes of Mrs. M. O. Clarke belonged to James Clarke at the date of his cession, and passed by his cession to his creditors, who succeeded to all his rights therein; that the first mortgage note passed to the creditors unaffected by any privilege except that resulting from the pledge in favor of Thomas Butler, and that after the discharge of the debt due to Butler the surplus of the proceeds applicable to the payment of said first mortgage note must be paid over to the syndic for the benefit of the creditors; and that the same rule must be applied in the distribution of the proceeds applicable to the payment of each successive mortgage note. The Mutual National Bank and Westfeldt Bros. contend, on the other hand, that Clarke, being the pledgor and quasi assignor to them of the 2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th mortgage notes, is thereby disabled from competing with them in the distribution of the proceeds of sale of the mortgaged property, and from asserting any rights therein, until the debts due them are fully paid, and that the syndic, succeeding only to Clarke's rights, is equally disabled.

The bank and Westfeldt Bros. rely upon the following decisions of this court, which hold, in the language of the leading case, that, "when the holder of a claim secured by mortgage assigns a part of it, he cannot be permitted to come in competition with his assignee, if the pledge is insufficient to pay both." Salzman v. Creditors, 2 Rob. (La.) 241; Ventress v. Creditors, 20 La. Ann. 361; Mechanics v. Ferguson, 29 La. Ann. 549; Barkdull v. Herwig, 30 La. Ann. 621; Reine v. Jack, 31 La. Ann. 860; Abney v. Walmsley, 33 La. Ann. 590. Reference to these cases will show that they all deal with concurrent mortgage notes,—with debts arising from the same transaction, and secured by the same mortgage. They rest upon the equity that where the holder of several notes, representing the same debt and secured by the same mortgage, assigns part of the notes, and, with them, the mortgage securing them, and has received the full value, he should not be permitted, by any act of his, to prevent his assignee from recovering the sum which he has paid. The doctrine rests upon the authority of Troplong and Grenier. Troplong expressly confines it to the case stated by him as follows: "Pierre is creditor of Jacques for 50,000 francs, the price of an estate which he had sold. Pierre assigns a part of his credit to Sempronius who pays him therefor 24,000 francs. The immovable, being seized and sold, produces only 40,000 francs. Ought Peter and Sempronius to concur and bear the loss proportionally; or should Sempronius be paid by preference?" He concludes that concurrence would be unjust on the ground that "it would be altogether contrary to good faith that the vendor of part of the debt ceded, after having received the price, should come in, by his own act, to prevent his assignee from recovering the sum disbursed by him." 1 Troplong, Priv. & Hyp. No. 367. Troplong refers to Grenier as holding the same view, and we find that Grenier assimilated the price to a part payment of the debt operating a quasi subrogation of the assignee to the rights of the assignor in the thing ceded, and its accessories, to the extent necessary to secure his reimbursement, and he says: "In such a case the subrogor could not be heard to claim payment of the amount remaining due to him until his subrogees had received the full amount of their subrogations; at least, in absence of an express convention to the contrary." 1 Grenier, Hyp. No. 93. It thus conclusively appears that the authorities have confined this doctrine to cases arising between the assignor and assignee of part of the same debt secured by the same mortgage. We are now asked, for the first time, to extend the same principle to the case of an assignor who, holding distinct credits, secured by different and successive mortgages on the same property, has transferred one of the credits, inferior in rank, and to hold that by such transfer he has not only practically subrogated the assignee to all his rights in the credit and accessory mortgage transferred, but in all other mortgages held by him on the same property. We have considered this subject very maturely, and from every point of view suggested in the able and ingenious briefs of counsel, but we can discover no principle of law which would justify the extension claimed. The debts represented by these several mortgage notes, and the several mortgages securing them, are as distinct as if they were the notes of different persons secured by mortgages on different properties. Clarke did not stand in the case of an assignor of part of a claim secured by a mortgage, and who is contesting his assignee's right to be paid out of the proceeds of that mortgage by preference over himself, as holder of the other part of said claim. On the contrary, the syndic concedes that each assignee is entitled to be first paid the full amount due him out of the whole avails of the mortgage securing it. But he says: "I hold a distinct claim against our common debtor, secured by a different mortgage, which I have not assigned or pledged to you in any manner, and on which you have no rights, legal or equitable. I yield your right to be paid by preference out of the proceeds applicable to the mortgage which I transferred to you; but you cannot interfere with my rights as holder of a different credit, secured by a different mortgage, which I never assigned to you in whole or in part." Not only are the facts of the instant case entirely different from those in which the principle invoked was applied, but the reasons which supported the application in the latter are entirely wanting in the former. What possible right, legal or equitable, can the assignee of one debt and mortgage acquire upon or against a distinct debt and mortgage not assigned? Or if we were to adopt the analogy to subrogation suggested by Grenier, we can understand that the party who had made a part payment, with subrogation of one of these mortgage notes, would be subrogated to the right of the holder in the note paid and in the mortgage securing it; but would any one contend that such subrogation extended to his rights in a distinct debt, secured by a different mortgage? We can discover no reason why the holder of distinct claims, secured by different mortgages, even on the same property, cannot assign one of them without waiving or prejudicing any of his rights as holder of the others.

In this case all the assignments are made by pledges. The first mortgage note was never pledged to anybody but Butler. He would have had the right to enforce his pledge either by selling the note itself or by foreclosing the mortgage. Suppose he had pursued the former course, and had sold the note for a price exceeding the debt due to him. To whom would the surplus have gone? There is no plausible ground for disputing that it would have gone to Clarke or his syndic, and the purchaser of the note would undoubtedly have been entitled to assert all his mortgage rights. Can a mere difference in the mode of enforcing this pledge affect Clarke's right to the surplus of the avails of the thing pledged over the debt for which it is pledged? The bank and Westfeldt Bros. no doubt feel themselves aggrieved in not collecting the whole of their claims; but we are bound to apply the law, and, moreover, to consider the rights and interest of other creditors. Under our law a man's property is the common pledge of his creditors. This common pledge the law permits, in certain cases, to be invaded by special preferences, such as privileges, pledges, and mortgages, when constituted according to law. Nevertheless, such permitted preferences are in derogation of the rights of the common pledge, and are to be strictly construed, and not extended beyond their plain legal meaning and effect. We think, in this case, that each one of these pledgees has acquired no preference, except to the extent of the debt secured by each pledge, and to be paid out of the proceeds applicable to payment of the particular note pledged, and that the surplus of the proceeds applicable to the payment of each pledged note, after paying the debt secured by that particular pledge, must be paid over to the syndic for distribution among the mass of the creditors. The above views eliminate the particular contentions urged by Westfeldt Bros. against the transactions of the Mutual National Bank. The Westfeldt Bros. have no rights here, except upon the particular res pledged to them, or its avails. The thing pledged to the bank was an entirely different res; and as it has never been extinguished, and as the proceeds applicable to its satisfaction must go either to the bank or to the syndic, Westfeldt Bros. have no interest in raising questions as to the validity of the bank's rights therein which the syndic has not propounded.

It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled, avoided, and reversed; and it is now adjudged and decreed that the opposition of the syndic of the creditors of James Clarke be maintained, and that the fund in the hands of the sheriff, after paying the claim of plaintiff, Thomas Butler, the state, city, and drainage taxes, and the costs of these proceedings, be distributed in the following order: (1) To the syndic of James Clarke, the amount remaining due on the first mortgage note, after paying the claim of Butler; (2) to the Mutual National Bank, the sum of $2,300 with 8 per cent. interest from August 4, 1890, till paid; (3) to the syndic, the amount remaining due on the second mortgage note, after deducting the foregoing payment to the Mutual National Bank; (4) to the Mutual National Bank, the amount of the third mortgage note; (5) if any funds remain, to the Mutual National Bank, the amount of the fourth mortgage note; (6) to Westfeldt Bros., the amount of the fifth mortgage note. And it is further ordered that the oppositions of the Mutual National Bank and of Westfeldt Bros., in so far as they conflict herewith, be rejected.

EYRICH v. HIS CREDITORS. (No. 10,914.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Jan. 18, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)[1]

RESPITE TO DEBTOR—RIGHTS OF CREDITOR—SECURITY.

The right to require security by a creditor from a debtor who has been granted a respite is absolute, under the provisions of Act 134 of 1888, and the creditor is not limited in time to require the security.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; THOMAS C. W. ELLIS, Judge.

Application of J. C. Eyrich for a respite, which was granted by his creditors and confirmed by judgment. The American Book Company and others, who took no part in the proceedings of the creditors, took a rule to compel plaintiff to give security for their claims. Rule made absolute, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. Rehearing refused.

Gus A. Breaux, for appellant. Rice & Armstrong and Ernest T. Florance, for appellees.

MCENERY, J. J. C. Eyrich applied for a respite, which was unanimously granted by the creditors who appeared and voted at the meeting of creditors. The respite was confirmed by a judgment. Certain creditors, who took no part in the proceedings of the meeting of creditors, and who did not oppose the homologation of said proceedings, took a rule against the plaintiff to compel him to give security, in accordance with the provisions of Act 134 of 1888. The rule was made absolute, and the plaintiff appealed.

The question presented is, can a debtor who has obtained a respite by the unanimous vote of creditors appearing at the meeting of creditors be compelled to give security by a creditor who did not appear at said meeting, and who did not oppose his application for respite, and the homologation of the proceedings of the meeting of creditors? The act referred to provides that "any creditor who has not assented to the respite may require that the debtor shall furnish security that the property of which he is left in possession shall not be alienated, or, in case it is, that the money arising from the sale or mortgage of the same shall be employed in paying ratably the debts existing at the time of the respite." The creditor cannot exercise this right until the respite has been granted. He is not limited to any period of time beyond which he cannot exercise this right. It is an absolute right conferred by the statute. It does not appear that the complaining creditor either expressly or tacitly assented to the respite. Judgment affirmed.

BLEDSOE et al. v. GARY et al., (two cases.)

CITY COURT OF SELMA—POWERS OF JUDGE—EXEMPTIONS—CONTEST.

1. Under Acts 1875-76, p. 386, as amended by Acts 1876-77, p. 266, which provides that the judge of the city court of Selma shall have "all the powers and jurisdiction which are now or may hereafter be lawfully exercised by the judges of the circuit court and chancellors of this state, including the authority to issue writs of injunction, mandamus, certiorari, prohibition, ne exeat, and all other remedial writs;" and under Code 1886, § 2981, which provides that a writ of attachment may be issued by any judge of the circuit court, returnable to any county in the state,—the judge of the city court of Selma has authority to issue a writ of attachment returnable to any county in the state.

2. Where defendant files a declaration of exemption of personal property, and plaintiffs make affidavit and give bond for a contest, and attachment issues, but written notice of the levy is not served on defendant as required by Code, § 2520, defendant is not bound to contest; and where he voluntarily enters his appearence, and files an inventory of his personalty, it is error for the court to strike it from the files, and render judgment against him on the ground that the inventory was not filed sooner.

3. Where there is no waiver of exemption as to the kind of property on which a levy is sought to be made, but the right to make the levy is based on the institution of a contest in the mode prescribed by Code, § 2520, it is not necessary to indorse the fact of such contest on the process.

Appeals from circuit court, Marengo county; WILLIAM E. CLARKE, Judge.

Proceeding in attachment by Gary & Kennedy against Bledsoe Bros. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Affirmed. Proceeding by Gary & Kennedy against Henry T. Bledsoe to contest a claim of exemption. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

These two cases involve the same questions, which arose from the levy of the same process, and hence are submitted together. The action was commenced by attachment, which was issued by the judge of the city court of Selma at the suit of Gary & Kennedy against H. T. Bledsoe and William Bledsoe, partners under the firm name of Bledsoe Bros., and was made returnable to the next term of the circuit court of Marengo county, to be held on the 1st day of March, 1890. The attachment was not levied on the property of the defendants, who were merchants, because, prior to the issuance of the attachment, one of the firm, H. T. Bledsoe, purchased his brother's interest in the said property, and had filed his declaration of claim of exemptions thereto. The plaintiffs made the affidavit and bond required by the statute, and filed them with the sheriff, who then levied the attachment on the property claimed to be exempt. There was no indorsement on the writ at the time it was issued or levied, showing that the claim of exemptions was contested, or that the suit was on the debt for which the exemptions were waived. There was no notice given by the sheriff to the defendant H. T. Bledsoe that the claim of exemptions was contested. When the case came up for trial the defendant H. T. Bledsoe moved to dismiss the levy because there was no indorsement on the writ, or the affidavit securing the writ, showing that the claim of exemptions was contested, or that there was a waiver of exemptions. This motion was overruled, and the defendant duly excepted. The plaintiffs, by permission of the court, then wrote an indorsement on the writ, showing the contest of the claim of exemptions. The defendant then filed a plea in abatement, which raised the question whether the indorsement showing the contest could be made during the trial, and whether an indorsement which was so made was sufficient at law. The court refused to allow this plea to be filed. The plaintiffs made a written demand upon the defendant, prior to the first day of the term of the circuit court of Marengo county, to file, within the first three days of the term, an inventory, verified by affidavit, of his property, as required by statute. The defendant failed to file this inventory within the time required, and did not file the same until the next succeeding term of said court. At the fall term of said court the plaintiffs moved to strike from the file the inventory which was filed on the 22d of September, 1890, which motion was granted, and a judgment by default was rendered by the court against the defendant on the contest of the claim of exemptions. During the same term of the court a judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs in the attachment suit against Bledsoe Bros. for the amount of their demand. The defendant H. T. Bledsoe filed a motion in arrest of the judgment, which raised the question whether the writ of attachment was void because issued by the judge of the city court of Selma, returnable at the next term of the circuit court of Marengo county. The defendant also moved in arrest of judgment on the ground that there was no notice of the levy of the attachment given to the defendant as required by the statute. Both of these motions were overruled, and the defendant excepted thereto. This appeal is prosecuted by both Bledsoe Bros. and Henry T. Bledsoe, and the various rulings of the lower court upon the motions and in rendering judgment by default are assigned as error.

G. B. Johnston, for appellants. N. H. R. Dawson and John C. Anderson, for appellees.

WALKER, J. The writ of attachment in this case was issued by the judge of the city court of Selma, and was made returnable to the next term of the circuit court of Marengo county. The judge of the city court of Selma was, by the terms of the act creating that court, and of the amendment thereto, clothed with "all the powers and jurisdiction which are now, or may hereafter be, lawfully exercised by the judges of the circuit court and chancellors of this state, including the authority to issue writs of injunction, mandamus, certiorari, prohibition, ne exeat, and all other remedial writs." Acts Ala. 1875-76, p. 386; Acts 1876-77, p. 266. This court has held that the language just quoted confers upon the judge of the city court the authority to issue, or to order the issue of, the writs referred to, returnable into any court of the state having jurisdiction of them. East & West R. Co. v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co., 75 Ala. 275. Under the general statute, a writ of attachment may be issued by any judge of the circuit court, returnable to any county in the state. Code 1886, § 2931. The writs of attachment against property which are authorized by our statutes are remedial writs, within the meaning of the language above quoted. The plain effect of that language is to confer upon the judge of the city court of Selma the same authority to issue attachments returnable to any county in the state as is vested in the judges of the circuit court.

Before the levy of the writ of attachment the defendant Henry T. Bledsoe had filed in the office of the judge of probate his declaration stating and describing the personal property claimed by him as exempt, and such declaration had been duly recorded. As there was no indorsement on the process that there had been a waiver of exemptions as to personalty, the property embraced in the declaration was not subject to levy, unless the claim of exemptions was contested. Code, § 2519; Tonsmere v. Buckland, 88 Ala. 312, 6 South. Rep. 904. When a contest has been instituted in the mode prescribed by section 2520 of the Code, the officer holding the process shall proceed to make a levy, and within three days thereafter shall notify the defendant in writing of the same. The last clause of this section seems to require the officer to notify the defendant of the levy only, and not of the contest; but section 2522 speaks of the service of notice of contest in such a way as to indicate that the service of such notice is required in any contest of a claim of exemption to personal property. It seems to have been the intention of the legislature that the written notice to the defendant of the levy of process upon property which he had already claimed as exempt should also operate as notice to him of the institution of a contest of his claim of exemptions. Provision is also made elsewhere for notice to the defendant in all cases of the levy of a writ of attachment. Code, § 2937. Whether or not the contest itself should be mentioned in the written notice to the defendant, it is plain that he is not put to his defense of his claim of exemptions against process subsequently issued until he has been notified in writing of the levy of such process. A person who has duly filed his declaration claiming personal property as exempt before the levy of process upon it is entitled to treat the filing of such declaration as a protection of the property therein described against process upon which the fact of a waiver of exemption is not indorsed, until, in the mode prescribed in the statute, he is brought into court to defend a contest of his claim of exemption. He is made a party to the contest by the service of written notice of the levy of the process. The service of such notice is the mode prescribed by the statute of citing the defendant to appear and support his claim of exemption. The provision for giving him notice is what secures to him the opportunity to be heard upon the question of the validity of his claim. Some such provision for notice to the defendant is necessary to give the statutory proceeding for a contest in such a case the character of due process of law. Betancourt v. Eberlin, 71 Ala. 461. At any rate, the requirement that notice shall be given is one not to be disregarded. In the present case the plaintiffs made the affidavit and bond for a contest in the mode prescribed by section 2520 of the Code, and the writ of attachment was levied on February 17, 1890. But there is nothing to show that the defendants were notified in writing of the levy, or that they had any actual notice thereof. The notice to the defendant H. T. Bledsoe to file an inventory makes no mention of the writ of attachment, and does not state that any process had been levied. On September 23, 1890, he waived his right to such notice by appearing and filing his inventory. He was not in default up to that time, because he had not been served with the statutory notice of the levy, and had done nothing to waive such notice. Prior to his voluntary appearance the steps had not been taken to entitle the plaintiffs to a judgment on the contest, the contestee not having been brought into court by the service of notice of the levy, which is required by the plain language of the statute. Code, § 2520; Fears v. Thompson, 82 Ala. 294, 2 South. Rep. 719; Hutcheson v. Powell, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 170. On the plaintiff's written demand, a defendant who has been made a party to a contest of his claim of exemption is required, under the penalty of having a judgment by default rendered against him in the contest, to file an inventory of his personal property. Code, § 2525. But a notice merely to file such inventory is insufficient to supply the want of the notice which is required to make the defendant a party to the contest. The law informs him that until he has received written notice of the levy of process he is not called upon to defend a contest of his previously filed declaration and claim of exemption, and until he has received such notice he can safely ignore the plaintiff's proceedings, so far as they purport to affect property already claimed as exempt. Until the defendant became a party to the contest, he was not bound to comply with the plaintiff's written demand for an inventory. He did not become a party to the contest until his voluntary appearance therein at the September term of the circuit court. He filed the inventory on the day of his voluntary appearance. The trial court erred in striking the inventory from the files on the ground that it had not been filed within the first three days of the previous term. The defendant had not then been put in the position to be bound by the plaintiffs' demand. When he voluntarily appeared he was not in default in any way, and it was incumbent on the plaintiffs to tender an issue on the claim. It was error to render judgment by default thereon against the defendant, because he was not then in default, as he had not been made a party to the contest in the mode prescribed by the statute. He had done nothing to relieve the plaintiffs of the duty of tendering an issue on the claim of exemptions. An issue should have been formed and tried as directed by the statute. Code, § 2526.

If there has been a waiver of exemption as to the kind of property on which the levy is sought to be made, the indorsement of that fact on the process is a prerequisite to the right to make the levy. Code, § 2519. If there has been no such waiver, and the right to make the levy is based upon the institution of a contest in the mode provided by section 2520 of the Code, there is no requirement that the facts of such contest shall be indorsed on the process. The defendant H. T. Bledsoe, in his plea in abatement, and in his motion to dismiss the levy of the attachment, seems to have erroneously assumed that the statute requires the fact of contest to be indorsed on the process. No such indorsement was required, and the absence thereof did not affect the validity of the levy. The indorsement made by the plaintiffs upon the writ at the time of the trial was useless and ineffectual. No injury resulted therefrom to the appellant. The appellant's plea in abatement, and his motion to dismiss the levy of the attachment, were both put upon the untenable ground that there should have been an indorsement on the writ of the fact that the claim of exemptions was contested; and for this reason both the plea and the motion were properly rejected. After these objections were disposed of, the appellant interposed a plea in bar to the complaint, without suggesting the objection that he had not been served with written notice of the levy of the attachment. He thereby waived the right to such notice, and a personal judgment could then be rendered against him, though he had not been served with any legal process at all. After a voluntary appearance, and the rendition of a personal judgment thereon, the objection because of the failure to give written notice of the levy of the writ of attachment was too late. That objection was cured by the voluntary appearance of the defendant. So far as the proceeding in the main case was concerned, we have discovered no error prejudicial to the appellant. The judgment in that branch of the case is affirmed. For the reason above stated the judgment rendered on the contest of the claim of exemptions is reversed, and that case is remanded.

GAFFORD v. LOFTON.

CHATTEL MORTGAGES — ASSIGNMENT — RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEE.

Where a mortgage of personal property, and the note thereby secured, are embodied in the same instrument, an assignment indorsed thereon, and signed by the mortgagee, conveys to the assignee the legal title to the mortgaged property, and the assignee may sue for its recovery in his own name.

Appeal from circuit court, Covington county; JOHN P. HUBBARD, Judge.

Detinue by R. H. Gafford against W. C. Lofton. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

J. F. Jones, for appellant.

WALKER, J. The plaintiff claimed the personal property sued for under a mortgage executed by the defendant to one Rosenfield. The defendant's promissory note, and the mortgage to secure its payment, were embodied in one instrument. The mortgagee wrote and signed the transfer on the back of the instrument. The trial court held that, under the transfer to the plaintiff, he had no title to the property sued for, and that he could not recover in this action. Evidence of the mortgage, and of the transfer thereof, was excluded. This ruling was erroneous. An assignment indorsed and signed by the mortgagee upon a mortgage of personal property conveys the legal title to the mortgaged property, and the assignee can sue in his own name to recover possession thereof. Graham v. Newman, 21 Ala. 497; Tison v. Association, 57 Ala. 323. The one instrument containing both the note and the mortgage, the transfer carried the mortgagee's entire interest. Buell v. Underwood, 65 Ala. 285. The assignment conferred upon the assignee the same right which the mortgagee had had to maintain detinue for the recovery of the personal property conveyed by the mortgage, though there had been no foreclosure. 2 Brick. Dig. p. 252, § 63. No other question is presented for review. Reversed and remanded.

SCOTT v. STATE.

CARRYING WEAPONS—EVIDENCE—STRIKING CAUSE FROM DOCKET.

1. On a trial for carrying a concealed pistol, it appeared from the undisputed evidence that defendant, with his hands in his pockets, rubbed up against an officer several times, whereupon the officer and another caught defendant's hands, and, on taking them out of his pockets, discovered a concealed pistol. Held, that such evidence was sufficient to justify a conviction. Chastang v. State, 3 South. Rep. 304, 83 Ala. 29, followed.

2. Crim. Code, § 4387, which provides that after a capias has issued for two terms, and returned, "Not found," the solicitor may, by leave of court, withdraw and file the indictment, with leave to reinstate the same when the ends of justice require it, is not mandatory, and the cause may remain on the docket if advisable, and the failure of the clerk to issue process did not operate a discontinuance, of which defendant could take advantage.

Appeal from city court of Montgomery; THOMAS M. ARRINGTON, Judge.

Indictment against Aleck Scott for carrying a concealed pistol. Verdict of guilty, and judgment thereon. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

COLEMAN, J. At the October term, 1885, the defendant was indicted for the offense of carrying a concealed pistol. He was arrested in Jefferson county, of this state, in the month of July, 1891, and, in default of bail, the sheriff of that county committed him to jail. Upon the order of the judge of the city court of Montgomery he was removed to the jail of the county of Montgomery, and there held until put upon his trial for the offense for which he was indicted. The defendant moved to strike the cause from the docket, upon the ground "that the cause was commenced at the October term, 1885, and a capias was regularly issued, and returned, 'Not found;' and that nothing further was done in said cause until the 5th day of September, 1890, when an alias capias was issued, and said capias was executed by arresting the defendant," etc.; and "that said cause has been discontinued." The motion was overruled, and the defendant put upon trial upon the plea of not guilty. When the evidence was introduced and closed, the court charged the jury, if they believed the evidence, to find the defendant guilty.

After a capias has issued for two terms, and returned, "Not found," the solicitor may, by leave of the court, withdraw and file the indictment, with leave to reinstate the same when the ends of justice require such reinstatement. Crim. Code, § 4387. This provision is not mandatory, and, if deemed advisable, the cause may remain on the docket. The mere failure of the clerk in the performance of his ministerial duty to issue process will not operate a discontinuance, of which the defendant can take advantage. This rule was declared as early as the case of State v. Drinkard, 20 Ala. 13.

The evidence shows that "an officer, with a warrant for the arrest of another person, went out where the defendant lived in search of the person named in the warrant, and, while in search of him, the defendant, with his hands in his pocket, rubbed up against the officer several times; whereupon the officer, with the assistance of another, caught the defendant's hands, and took them out of his pockets, and that he had a pistol in the pocket, which was concealed." This evidence was not disputed. Venue having been proven, and the time when this occurred, there was no error in giving the general charge. The principles involved are the same as those declared in the case of Chastang v. State, 83 Ala. 29, 3 South. Rep. 304, and Bowdon v. State, 91 Ala. 61, 8 South. Rep. 694. Affirmed.

BIBB v. STATE.

CRIMES OF WIFE—COERCION BY HUSBAND.

On trial of a woman for a murder shown to have been committed by herself and husband, the court properly charged that the jury should consider defendant a feme sole, and properly refused to charge that, unless defendant acted willingly, she should be acquitted, the presumption that the wife acted under the coercion of the husband not being allowable in cases of homicide.

Appeal from city court of Montgomery; THOMAS M. ARRINGTON, Judge.

Judy Bibb was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

Defendant was sentenced to the penitentiary for life. The state introduced evidence tending to prove that, before the finding of the indictment in this case, one Ed. Starke was killed by defendant and her husband, Joe Bibb, by cutting him with an axe, as was alleged in the indictment; that defendant held Starke from behind his back, holding his arms down, while her husband cut him in the head with the axe: and that, while the killing was being done, Joe Bibb was heard to say: "Hold him up, God damn it; hold him up." This is all the evidence, as set out in the bill of exceptions. The court, among other things, gave the jury the charge copied in the opinion, and to the giving of which defendant excepted, and she also excepted to the court's refusal to give the following charge: "Unless the jury believe that defendant acted willingly and voluntarily, they must acquit her."

B. C. Tarner and Gordon McDonald, for appellants. Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

CLOPTON, J. On the trial of defendant for murder, the court instructed the jury: "In the trial of this case on the issue of guilty or not guilty, the jury should not consider the defendant as otherwise than as a feme sole." There is no error in this charge. The presumption of the common law, that when the wife acts with her husband in the commission of a crime she acts under his coercion, and consequently without guilty intent, is not allowed in all offenses, in the administration of the criminal law. "It may not be positively settled," as has been well observed, "where the line of separation is, but for certain crimes the wife is responsible, although committed under the compulsion of her husband." 1 Benn. & H. Lead. Crim. Cas. 85. The exceptions ingrafted on the general rule are based on the nature, grade, and heinousness of the felony. Among these is murder. The rule that the law holds the wife answerable for murder, though committed in the presence of or in company with her husband, without any presumption that she acted under his coercion, and that she is punishable as much as if sole, is sustained by the great weight of authority. 1 Hale, P. C. 45; 1 Hawk. P. C. 4; 1 Cooley, Bl. Comm. 444; 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 361; 14 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 649. On the same principles, the charge asked by defendant was properly refused. Affirmed.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—ESTOPPEL TO PLEAD.

Where the payee of a note asks the maker to renew the contract, and he replies that it would never run out of date, his personal representatives, in an action on the note after his death, are not estopped from pleading the statute of limitations.

Appeal from chancery court, Jackson county; THOMAS COBBS, Chancellor.

Action by J. B. Adams, administrator, against Mary J. Cameron and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

On the final submission of the cause the chancellor rendered his decree dismissing the bill, holding that there was no trust relation; that the indebtedness was a simple contract debt; and that the action was barred by the statute of limitations.

Wm. L. Martin, for appellant.

STONE, C. J. The object of this suit is to collect a bill single, or note under seal, executed September 23, 1861, by Daniel Cameron, by which he promised to pay Martha Cameron $600, one day after date. In November, 1862, there was a payment made on the note of $148, which is not denied by either party. In 1884, Daniel Cameron died leaving property, real and personal,—the real estate being in excess of 160 acres, and worth, probably, more than $2,000; personal estate worth some $300. He died intestate, leaving a widow and several children. No administration was had on the estate, but the widow and children continued to use and occupy the homestead and effects. Daniel and Martha Cameron were brother and sister, and lived very near each other. The bill in the present case was filed September 15, 1886, by Martha Cameron. She has since died, and the suit is now in the name of her administrator. The widow and heirs at law—children—of Daniel Cameron are made defendants. The object of the bill is to enforce payment of the bill single out of the estate left by Daniel Cameron. Among other defenses, the statute of limitations of 10 years is pleaded, that being our statutory limitation on such cause of action. Code 1886, § 2614. To forestall the defense of 10 years' limitation, the bill charges that Daniel Cameron made payments on said sealed note during each of the years 1869 or 1870, 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878, 1879, and 1883. These alleged payments were very small, never in excess of $2 in any one year, and sometimes as low as 25 cents. If, however, they were made as payments on the note, and, in each case, before the bar was complete, the statute is no bar to the recovery. Code, § 2628. The answers deny that any of these alleged payments were made, except the one in 1862, 24 years before this suit was commenced. The note is made an exhibit to the bill and purports to have two credits upon it, —one of $148, dated November, 1862; and the other of 25 cents, dated in March, 1883. A great deal of oral testimony was taken on each side. Some of it was illegal, and properly objected to on that account. In forming our conclusions we have disregarded all such testimony, but consider it unnecessary to specify it. We think the testimony fails to show that any of the small sums of money which Daniel Cameron let his sister have after 1862 were intended or, in fact, were payments on the bill single. We therefore hold that the prima facie bar is not obviated by that line of proof.

It is contended, in the second place, that the real relation between Daniel Cameron and his sister was not that of debtor and creditor, but of voluntary trustee and cestui que trust. Vincent v. Rogers, 30 Ala. 471, and Whetstone v. Whetstone, 75 Ala. 495, are relied on in support of this contention. We find nothing in the record to sustain this view. The facts show only a plain case of debtor and creditor. There is some testimony tending to show that, before the 10 years expired after the execution of the bill single, Martha Cameron asked her brother to renew the contract, and that he replied it would never run out of date. It is contended for appellant that this estops appellees from interposing the defense of the statute of limitations. There are several answers to this. It was only a promise not to plead the statute of limitations, and the statute runs against that promise as well as against the bill single itself. We think it would inaugurate a very hazardous, if not injurious, practice, if we were to sanction this new and wide departure from the policy which dictated the statute of limitations. A second reason: Whether or not the statute of limitations would run was a question of law. Against such mistakes, as a rule, there is no redress in any court. Clark v. Hart, 57 Ala. 390; 1 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 334; 2 Pom. Eq. § 842. So, on this aspect of the case, appellant is in this dilemma: If we treat the statement as a promise, it is barred by the statute of limitations; if we regard it as an assertion, it was a mistake of law, and not a ground of recovery. Affirmed.

McADORY v. LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO.

NEGLIGENT KILLING—RECOVERY BY PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVE—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. Under Code, § 2591, which provides that in certain cases a master is liable for the death of a servant, and that the damages shall be distributed according to the statute of distribution, the measure of damages, where the heirs are in no relation of dependence on deceased for support, is such sum as, with legal interest during the period of his expectancy of life, would produce at the expiration of such period a sum equal to the accumulations of his earnings for the same period, estimated on the basis of his health, ability, habits of sobriety, industry, economy, gross earnings, and expenditures.

2. Where a switchman, 20 years old, unmarried, healthy, sober, industrious, and economical, earning $2.20 per day, whose expectancy of life is 40 years, is negligently killed by a railroad company, and the data from which to ascertain his net earnings are very meager, a verdict of $9,895, which will produce at the end of 40 years a sum equal to four times the amount of his probable net earnings for that period, is excessive.

Appeal from city court of Birmingham; H. A. SHARPE, Judge.

Action by M. J. McAdory, administrator of William E. Beavers, against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, for the negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. New trial granted. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Plaintiff's intestate was a switchman in the service of the defendant at the time of the accident which resulted in his death. The court granted a new trial on the ground that the verdict, as assessed by the jury, was excessive. The evidence bearing on the measure of damages was undisputed, and it was substantially as follows: About two years before he was killed, plaintiff's intestate, then between 18 and 19 years of age, left his father's farm in Georgia, with a scanty supply of clothing, to go out into the world for himself. Prior to that time he was healthy, strong, sober, industrious, and economical. He went first to his uncle's in Atlanta. There we have no account of him. Sixteen months before his death he came to Birmingham, where his cousin was at work for one of the railroads. He did not secure employment for about three months, during which time his cousin paid his board, at $20 per month, and advanced him money for expenses, making in all $71. At the expiration of that time intestate secured employment with defendant for watching a street crossing, at $30 per month. He was subsequently promoted to watch another crossing, at $45 per month, and a short time before his death was again promoted to be a switchman, at a salary of $66⅔ per month. During the time he worked as switchman he lost no time from any cause, and during the whole time of his employment he was absent from work only two days. His foreman and several other witnesses testified that he was able and willing to work, and performed all his duties well. He was of rather slight physique, though he was strong and healthy. He was never known to drink intoxicating liquor, and spent neither time nor money foolishly. His landlady testified of him in the highest terms, saying he was not like other young men, but, when off duty, spent his time reading and improving himself. During his life in Birmingham he corresponded with his father and sister. Before intestate had begun receiving his increased salary he had repaid to his cousin the $71 borrowed, then he sent his sister $10, and at the time of his death had an abundant supply of good clothes, including one nice new suit that cost $22.50. He had a bank deposit of $25. His employer owed him $43.45, and his landlady found on his person, and turned over to his father, $1.90 in cash. He owed nothing whatever. He was paying, at the time of his death, $18 for board and lodging. American tables of mortality showed expectation of life to be about 40 years. From these facts the court below undertook to calculate the gross amount that intestate would probably have left at the end of his expectancy of life, and discounted that sum for 39 years at 8 per cent., arriving at the sum of $3,800.

Bowman & Harsh, for appellant. Hewitt, Walker & Porter, for appellee.

CLOPTON, J. Under the statute, which entitles the personal representative of an employe, whose death is caused by the negligence of the employer, to maintain an action, the measure of recoverable damages, established by this court, is the money value of the life. The recovery is limited to actual compensation for the pecuniary loss suffered by those entitled to inherit his estate according to the statute of distribution, allowing nothing for the pain which the deceased may be supposed to have suffered, or as solace to the grief of surviving relations. James v. Railroad Co., 92 Ala. 231, 9 South. Rep. 335. The courts have encountered great difficulty in establishing a clear and definite rule by which the pecuniary loss may be calculated with appropriate accuracy, especially when there is no status of dependency. In Railroad Co. v. Orr, 91 Ala. 548, 8 South. Rep. 360, it is said: "That the jury may have proper data from which a pecuniary compensation may be fixed, it is proper to admit evidence of the age, probable duration of life, habits of industry, means, business, earnings, health, skill of the deceased, reasonable future expectations; and perhaps there are other facts which should exert a just influence in determining the pecuniary damage sustained." And in James v. Railroad Co., supra, referring to this enumeration of the proper data, the court says: "All this we reaffirm, and add that net income and habits of economy should enter into the account as factors—important factors—in the ascertainment of accumulating capacity. This, at least, seems to be the proper standard by which to measure the damages." These are mentioned as circumstances and considerations to be taken into the account in ascertaining the accumulations of the deceased during the probable continuance of his life had he not been untimely cut off, as elements of the value of the life destroyed, not the value itself. In Railroad Co. v. Butler, 57 Pa. St. 335, after stating that the proper measure of damages is the pecuniary loss suffered by the parties entitled to the sum recovered, it is observed: "And that loss is what the deceased would have probably earned by his intellectual or bodily labor in his business or profession during the residue of his life-time, and which would have gone for the benefit of his children, taking into consideration his age, ability, and disposition to labor, and his habits of living and expenditure." True, this language is susceptible of the construction that the sum of the probable future accumulations is the measure of the pecuniary loss suffered by the surviving next of kin; but we do not suppose that the learned justice who rendered the opinion intended to be understood as laying down the rule that the net earnings during the period of the expectancy of life constitute the absolute measure of the present pecuniary value. In Railroad Co. v. Trammell, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 870, the employe annually earned $300, all of which he expended in the support of his family, consisting of himself and wife; and the probable duration of his life was about 27 years. The court below gave judgment for $2,500, on the theory that that sum would annually produce, at the legal rate of interest, a sum equal to the portion of his annual earnings expended in the support of his wife,—$200, as found by the court. This was held to be wrong, and the judgment excessive, for the reason that the wife would receive and expend all she would have gotten had her husband lived, and still have at the end of his probable life-time the principal of the judgment, which she would not have received at all but for his death. It is said: "The true measure of damages manifestly is that which gives such sum as, being put to interest, will each year, by taking a part of the principal and adding it to the interest, yield $150.00, this being the amount which the court ascertained was annually expended in the support of the wife; and so that the whole remaining principal, at the end of the twenty-seventh year, added to the interest on his balance for that year, will equal $150.00." The principle of the decision is that the pecuniary value to the wife of the husband's life is that sum which would yield her, during its probable duration, a benefit equal to what she would have derived from its continuance, and no more. In that case there was the relation of dependence, but no net earnings. In these respects it differs from the present case. When there is dependency, such as wife or child, and also net earnings, considerations enter into the calculation other than when no such relation exists, so that the strict rule therein adopted cannot be applied; but the principle is analogous.

Whatever may be the inherent difficulty of estimating the pecuniary value of human life, it is important and necessary, in view of the frequent occurrence of cases arising under the statute, that a clear and definite rule be established for the ascertainment, with reasonable certainty, of the pecuniary value of the life destroyed; so clear and definite, if practicable, that juries will be capable of applying it, when the facts of the particular case are shown. The application of any rule will be attended with more or less uncertainty, for in some respects the value is speculative. The precise loss cannot be calculated with exact accuracy. The net income which the deceased is earning at the time of his death may not have been continued for any considerable portion of the expected term of life. Sickness or accidental injuries may impair the accumulating capacity, and want of employment may diminish his earnings; while, on the other hand, they may be increased, as he may acquire skill and ability. While courts and juries are compelled to compute from reasonable probabilities, mere speculations should be discarded. The rule should be so formulated as to give the surviving next of kin full actual compensation for the pecuniary loss suffered by them, and at the same time not unduly oppress the defendant. The present case devolves the duty of endeavoring to formulate a rule to govern in cases where there are net earnings, and no relation of dependence. As the statute[1] provides that the damages recovered shall be distributed according to the statute of distributions, they should be calculated in reference to the reasonable expectation of benefit for the continuance of the life. That benefit is the estate of the person killed, had he survived, consisting of the accumulations by his labor or skill, not including any income derived from property, or investments or employment of capital. In computing the pecuniary loss, the first term or unknown quantity to be ascertained is the aggregate amount of the net earnings at the end of the expected term of life, estimated on the basis of his health, ability to labor, habits of sobriety, industry, and economy, gross annual earnings and expenditures. The sum of such accumulations, however, is not the measure of the pecuniary value of the life at the time death resulted from the injury, but merely constitutes the benefit which his distributees would have received at the expiration of the period of probable duration, had he remained living till then. The object of inquiry is the value at the time of death of the probable future accumulations had the person not been killed. The rule that the aggregate amount of the net earnings is the measure of recovery, gives, presently, to the next of kin, the entire benefit, which they would not have been entitled to and would not have received until the expiration of the expected term of life. In this case, the probable duration of life being about 40 years, this rule would enable the distributees to realize the entire fruits of the accumulating capacity 40 years before they would or could have realized them had he lived; giving the accruing interest on the damages recovered during the whole period of the probable duration of life in excess of the actual pecuniary loss suffered by them. Considering that the pecuniary value of the life is to be calculated in reference to the reasonable expectation of advantage from its continuation, and that, had it continued for the period of probable duration, the distributees would not have received any benefit from its continuance until the termination of that period, a rule fixing the measure of damages at such sum as, with legal interest during the period of the expectancy of life added, would produce at its expiration a sum equal to the amount of the net earnings during the same period, seems to be founded on reason and principle, and just to all parties. By this rule the pecuniary value of the life is approximated with reasonable certainty, ample compensation afforded to the surviving next of kin, and the purposes of the statute fully accomplished. For example, if the probable duration of life be 25 years, and the net earnings $7,500, $2,500, with legal interest added, would produce, at the end of the twenty-fifth year, the aggregate amount of the net earnings; consequently that sum is the pecuniary value of the life, at the time of its destruction, to the distributees. This is substantially the principle on which the measure of damages is fixed in the case of Railway Co. v. Cowser, 57 Tex. 293, stated as follows: "Perhaps the nearest measure of damages approximating this reasonable certainty would be such sum as would purchase an annuity, if such security was in the market, equal to the value of the pecuniary aid which the plaintiff would have derived from the deceased, calculated upon the basis of all the facts and circumstances of the particular case, reasonably accessible in evidence, and including the probable duration of life, as shown by the approved tables." The evidence shows that plaintiff's intestate was at the time of his death between 20 and 21 years of age. He was unmarried, healthy, and of sober, industrious, and economical habits; was receiving $2.20 per day as wages; and his expectancy of life was about 40 years. The data from which to ascertain his net earnings are meager. The verdict of the jury was for $9,395.95. We presume that this sum was intended to cover the probable amount of his net earnings during the expectancy of life. Allowing that he worked every day, including Sundays, and received $2.20 for each day, his annual gross earnings would have been $803. The annual interest on the amount of the verdict is $751.67, which, added to the principal, would produce at the end of the fortieth year $39,462.75,—more than four times the value of the estate which the deceased would have accumulated by his labor had he lived the 40 years; fourfold the actual pecuniary loss suffered by the next of kin. It is obvious that the verdict goes far beyond any just rule of compensation, and is so largely in excess of the pecuniary value of his life to those entitled to inherit his estate as to render it the imperative duty of the court to grant a new trial. Rose v. Railroad Co., 39 Iowa, 246; Railway Co. v. Bayfield, 37 Mich. 205; Telfer v. Railroad Co., 30 N. J. Law, 188.

[1] Code 1886, § 2591, relative to injuries suffered by servants through negligence of the master, provides: "If such injury results in the death of the servant or employe, his personal representative is entitled to maintain an action therefor, and the damages therefor are not subject to the payment of debts or liabilities, but shall be distributed according to the statute of distributions."

JACKSON v. STATE.

JURY — CHALLENGES — ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL — INSTRUCTIONS.

1. A trial court, on being informed that a juror had been convicted of a felony and had not been pardoned, declined to exclude him unless he was challenged for that cause. Defendant thereupon challenged him for that cause, and the court sustained the challenge. Held, that defendant was not injured by the ruling of the court, as the exclusion of the juror was not charged to defendant as one of his peremptory challenges.

2. Where, in a criminal case, the court refused to exclude certain testimony when defendant first objected to it, and thereafter defendant objected to the exclusion of such testimony by the court, it was not an error of which defendant could complain for the court to permit the testimony to remain before the jury.

3. At a trial for assault with intent to murder, it is not error for the court to refuse to charge that a "specific intent" must be shown, as the intent to take life may be inferred from the character of the assault, the use of a deadly weapon, and the attendant circumstances, and as such charge would tend to mislead the jury.

4. In respect to defendant's right to use a deadly weapon in resistance of an impending assault, it was not error for the court to charge that, "if defendant was assaulted by T. with a stick, then there arose for their consideration two propositions: First, whether defendant assaulted T. in heat of blood, which would reduce the offense to assault and battery; and, second, whether defendant assaulted T. with intent to take his life, with malice, and, if with malice, this would constitute assault with intent to murder."

5. It was not error for the court in such case to refuse to charge the jury that "if defendant struck the blow under the honest belief that his life was in danger, or that he was in fear of having great bodily harm inflicted upon him, then you cannot convict defendant of assault with intent to murder;" as, to justify the defensive use of a deadly weapon, the danger must be really or apparently imminent, and there must be no other reasonable mode of escape.

6. The fact that defendant had his assailant in his power, and could have killed him, but refrained from doing so, does not raise a presumption that the assault was without intent to take life.

Appeal from circuit court, Conecuh county; JOHN P. HUBBARD, Judge.

Charlie Jackson was indicted and tried for an assault with intent to murder one Alexander Thomas, was convicted of an assault and battery, and appeals. Affirmed.

The testimony introduced for the state tended to show that at a meeting of a "benevolent association," of which both the defendant and said Thomas were members, and of which one Jim Dunklin was secretary, the defendant and Alexander Thomas got into a dispute, which resulted in the defendant's cutting said Thomas several times. The state proved, against the objection and exception of the defendant, the circumstances of a difficulty between the defendant and Jim Dunklin which arose from the said Dunklin pulling the defendant off of the said Thomas. After the state had introduced all of this evidence, the court excluded all of said testimony as to the difficulty between defendant and Dunklin; but, upon defend ant's insisting upon its going into evidence, "inasmuch as it had been adduced," the court allowed this testimony to remain in evidence. The testimony for the defendant was in conflict with that introduced by the state as to the circumstances of the rencounter between the defendant and said Thomas, the evidence for the defendant tending to show that he struck in self-defense. The defendant proved, by certain witnesses, his general good character in the neighborhood in which he lived. The court, in connection with its general charge, charged the jury, among other things, as follows: (1) "When you come to look at the evidence in the case that he (defendant) is a man of good character, you cannot look at this to strengthen his testimony when he testifies, as a witness, for himself." (2) "The law says the assault must be with intent to take life with malice, to authorize conviction with intent to murder." (3) "If the jury should not find the defendant not guilty on the evidence, then, if they found that defendant was first assaulted by Alex. Thomas, with a stick, then there arose for their consideration two propositions: First, whether defendant assaulted Thomas in heat of blood, which would reduce the offense to assault and battery; and, second, whether the defendant assaulted Thomas with intent to take his life, with malice, and, if with malice, this would constitute assault with intent to murder." The defendant separately excepted to the giving of each of these portions of the general charge, and also excepted to the court's refusal to give the following written charges requested by him: (1) "The court charges the jury that the burden of proving the alleged intent is on the state, and if you are satisfied by the evidence that, at the time the defendant and Alex. Thomas were separated, [defendant] had one of his hands on the throat, and in the other hand he had an open knife, and had Alex. down under him, and did not cut him, but desisted from cutting of his own free will, a presumption arises that he did not have the intent to murder." (2) "The court charges the jury that the state is bound to prove that the defendant had the specific intent to murder Alex. Thomas, as charged in the indictment; and if the state has failed to prove to your satisfaction, beyond all reasonable doubt, that he had the intent to murder Alex. Thomas, you should find him not guilty of the intent to murder." (3) "The court charges the jury that, if the evidence leaves your minds in such a state or condition that you are unable to say whether or not the specific intent to murder existed beyond all reasonable doubt, you should find him not guilty of the higher grade of offense charged in the indictment, although you might find him guilty of the offense of assault and battery." (4) "The court charges the jury that defendant is charged with an assault with intent to murder Alex. Thomas with malice aforethought, and I charge you that the defendant must have formed, in his mind, the specific intent with malice aforethought, to take human life, or he is not guilty of this charge, and the evidence must show you that defendant formed this specific intent, beyond all reasonable doubt, or you should acquit him of this." (5) "The court charges the jury that if the proof shows you that defendant struck the blow under the honest belief that his life was in danger, or that he was in fear of having great bodily harm inflicted upon him by Alex. Thomas, that then you cannot convict defendant of an assault with intent to murder."

Stallworth & Burnett, for appellant.
Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

STONE, C. J. As we understand the facts, when it was made known to the trial court that A. G. Smith, one of the persons from whom a jury was to be selected, had been convicted of a felony in this state, and had not been pardoned, the court declined to exclude him as a juror, unless he was challenged for that cause. The defendant thereupon challenged him for cause, and the court held the challenge well taken. So the juror Smith neither sat upon the jury, nor was his exclusion charged to the defendant as one of his peremptory challenges. It was impossible for this ruling to have done the defendant any injury, and the circuit court in thus ruling committed no error.

It is certainly much the safer and better practice to exclude illegal testimony when first objected to. This, because of the difficulty of eradicating from the minds of the jury the impression such testimony is liable to make. The succeeding altercation and encounter which the accused had with Dunklin could certainly shed no light on the question of his prior assault on Thomas, alleged to have been made with intent to murder him. If that testimony had been subsequently excluded from the jury, it would have healed the error. Smith v. Maxwell, 1 Stew. & P. 221; Huckabee v. Shepherd, 75 Ala. 342; Booker v. State, 76 Ala. 22; Cleveland v. State, 86 Ala. 1, 5 South. Rep. 426; Childs v. State, 55 Ala. 28; Dismukes v. State, 83 Ala. 287, 3 South. Rep. 671. The court announced it would withdraw all the testimony relating to the altercation and difficulty with Dunklin, to which exceptions had been reserved. This was objected to by defendant's counsel, and thereupon it was permitted to remain before the jury. This was not an error of which defendant can complain.

It is settled in this state that, when a defendant testifies in his own behalf in a criminal prosecution, his proven good character, unless first assailed, is not an evidential circumstance to which the jury may look in determining the credibility of his testimony. Morgan v. State, 88 Ala. 223, 6 South. Rep. 761; Gibson v. State, 89 Ala. 121, 8 South. Rep. 98.

An intent to take life is an essential element of the statutory felony, assault with intent to murder, and must be proved to the satisfaction of the jury. But, like the malicious intent in murder, it may be inferred by them from the character of the assault, the use of a deadly weapon, and the other attendant circumstances. No charge should be given which would authorize a conviction, without satisfactory proof that the prisoner entertained such intent. A charge, however, which adds other words or matter, by way of particularizing this necessary intent,—as that it must be positive, deliberate, actual, or specific, etc.,—tends to mislead the jury, and should not be given. This, not because the intent need not, as matter of law, be positive, deliberate, actual, and specific, to an extent which satisfies the minds of the jury, but because such mode of expression has a tendency to mislead them as to the true measure of convincing proof to authorize a verdict of guilty. Walls v. State, 90 Ala. 618, 8 South. Rep. 680; Allen v. State, 52 Ala. 391. Under the principles declared above, the circuit court did not err in giving the first and second charges excepted to, nor in refusing charges 2, 3, and 4 asked by defendant.

When one is menaced with an assault, several inquiries present themselves: First. Is he free from fault in bringing on the difficulty? Second. Is there reasonable room and ground for escape from the threatened injury? Third. Is the threatened assault of such character as, if perpetrated, is likely to produce death, or "grievous bodily harm," as that phrase is defined in the books? All these considerations enter into and qualify the right to resist with a deadly weapon. Meredith v. State, 60 Ala. 441; Washington v. State, 53 Ala. 29; Robinson v. State, 54 Ala. 86; Ex parte Nettles, 58 Ala. 268; Mitchell v. State, 60 Ala. 28; Ex parte Brown, 65 Ala. 446; Hadley v. State, 55 Ala. 31. Construed in the light of the authorities cited, and the principles we have many times declared, the circuit court committed no error in giving charge 3, excepted to, and in refusing charge 5, requested. Charge 3 places defendant's right to employ a deadly weapon in resistance of an impending assault in as favorable a light as the law authorizes. Charge 5, requested, is manifestly faulty. It requires more than "fear of having great bodily harm inflicted" to reduce an assault made with a deadly weapon below the grade of felony, if the intent to take life be found to have been entertained. To fully justify such defensive use of a deadly weapon, the danger must be really or apparently imminent, and there must be no other reasonable mode of escape. So, to repel the implication of malice, the party using the deadly weapon must be in real or apparent danger of losing his life, or of suffering grievous bodily harm, and must be free from fault in bringing on the difficulty. Even with these conditions, if there was a previously formed design to use such deadly weapon, this would supply the element of malice, unless the person so using the deadly weapon was in real or apparent peril of life or limb, and had no other reasonable mode of escape.

The facts postulated in the first charge asked, if found by the jury, would certainly be a circumstance to be weighed by them in determining whether there was an intent to take life. We suppose they were so weighed, for the jury failed to convict the defendant of an intent to murder. They could not, however, as matter of law, raise the presumption that there was no intent to take life. The defendant may have originally had such intent, and after inflicting many dangerous blows, and having his adversary in his power, he desisted from carrying out his original intention. This charge was properly refused. Affirmed.

RECEIVERS — APPOINTMENT — ATTACHING CREDITORS.

An attachment creditor cannot have a receiver appointed for property alleged to have been fraudulently conveyed by his debtor to a third person, where the attachment could have been levied on the property, and possession thereof taken by the sheriff.

Appeal from city court of Montgomery; THOMAS M. ARRINGTON, Judge.

Action by Thomas W. Jennings and others against J. Hollie Pearce and others to set aside a transfer of personal property on the ground of fraud, and to have a receiver appointed. From a decree appointing a receiver, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Arrington & Graham, for appellants. Richardson & Reese, for appellees.

CLOPTON, J. We will not undertake to decide whether the bill shows that complainant has such interest in, title to, or incumbrance on the property in controversy as is essential, under section 3414 of the Code, to give courts of chancery jurisdiction of non-residents, when the object of the suit concerns personal property in this state. The bill shows, not only that a material defendant resides, and that the property which complainant seeks to reach is, in this state, but also that the non-resident defendant, who asserts an adverse claim, was found here, and personally served with process. This is sufficient, if there be no other objection, to authorize the court to take cognizance of the case.

The case made by the bill does not come within the class of cases in which a court of equity will intervene to aid a creditor with a lien in obtaining satisfaction by removing a fraudulent conveyance, obstructing the complete execution of the process of law. Though purporting to be in aid of proceedings at law, the bill is evidently filed under section 3544 of the Code, which provides: "A creditor without a lien may file a bill in chancery to discover or to subject to the payment of his debt any property which has been fraudulently transferred or conveyed, or attempted to be fraudulently transferred or conveyed, by his debtor." As, however, no objection to this character and frame of the bill is made by demurrer or otherwise, we will not decide whether a creditor who has sued out an attachment at law, and had the same levied on personal property, whereby a lien is created in his favor, may, under the statute, file a bill to invoke the aid of the court in the enforcement of the inchoate and conditional lien acquired by the levy of the attachment, or, independently, a bill to subject the property levied on to the payment of the same debt on which the attachment is founded by removing a fraudulent conveyance. As this appeal involves only the question of the appointment of a receiver, the averments in respect to the suing out and levy of the attachment are important and material only as they affect the propriety of appointing a receiver. Receivership is adopted by courts of equity as a suitable and efficient mode of saving the subject of litigation from waste, loss, threatened destruction, material injury, or removal beyond the jurisdiction of the court,—its preservation for the benefit of the party ultimately decreed to have the right. Owing to the injustice often resulting therefrom, the authority to appoint a receiver, it has been frequently observed, should be exercised with caution and circumspection. As a general rule a receiver should not be appointed unless the court is able to see some resultant benefit to the party seeking the relief, not otherwise obtainable, or that some injury, not otherwise avoidable, will ensue from the refusal, and only when a reasonable necessity is shown. The circumstances charged in the bill and shown by the affidavits which, it is insisted, justify the appointment of a receiver, are that Henry Pearce, one of the defendants, who is indebted to complainant in a sum of about $1,200, is owner of the horses, mules, wagons, and other personal property described in the bill; that he has transferred or conveyed the same, by mortgage or other instrument, to his brother J. Hollis Pearce, for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or defrauding his creditors, especially complainant, and is arranging to remove the property out of this state as soon as he can settle the claim of the defendant Chandler, for the feed and pasturage of the stock, so that complainant will probably lose his debt, or have to sue for it in another state. Whether these facts, if unconnected with other considerations, would authorize the appointment of a receiver, it is unnecessary to decide. The bill also alleges that complainant had sued out an attachment against Henry Pearce, returnable to the city court of Montgomery, the court in which the bill is filed, on the ground that he resides out of the state of Alabama, and has had the attachment levied on the property in controversy, subject to the claim and lien of Chandler, who is summoned as garnishee.

As a general rule a court of equity will not appoint a receiver, in the absence of special circumstances showing a necessity for placing the property in the custody of the court, when the party seeking the relief has an adequate and complete remedy at law,—when he may obtain ample redress and protection by the usual course of legal proceedings. Inadequacy of the legal remedy is in such case requisite to call the authority into exercise. In Iron-Works Co. v. Foster, 54 Ala. 622, after observing that writs of injunction and equitable attachment are allowed only upon the execution of an adequate bond with sureties for the indemnification of the defendant, the court says: "And whenever either of these writs will afford protection to rights asserted by the plaintiff in a court of equity, and these rights are disputed, it should rarely appoint a receiver to take the property from the defendant." The same principle applies when the party resorting to this extraordinary relief has any other safe or expedient remedy. Speights v. Peters, 9 Gill. 472; Rice v. Railroad Co., 24 Minn. 464. High, Rec. § 10. An attachment at law, when a statutory ground exists for its issue, affords as ample redress and protection, in ordinary cases, as a receivership; fully securing the forthcoming of the property to answer any judgment obtained in the attachment suit, if found liable to the attachment. Complainant having sued out an attachment on the ground that defendant is a non-resident, and having had the writ levied on the property, as the bill avers, we are unable to see what benefit, other or additional to that furnished by the legal remedy, can result to complainant from the appointment of a receiver, or any necessity for such appointment, unless circumstances are shown, rendering the attachment inadequate and inefficacious. As a circumstance having such effect, the bill avers that the property was in the possession of Chandler, who held it under a lien for the feed and pasturage of the stock, and that there is no way by which complainant can compel the enforcement of his lien; in other words, that a valid levy of the attachment cannot be made while Chandler is entitled to keep possession for the preservation and continuance of his lien. It may be conceded that property in the possession of a person having a lien thereon cannot be taken from him under an attachment against the general owner. It does not appear, however, from the facts averred in the bill, that Chandler had such lien as would prevent the levy of the attachment. He was an agistor. At common law, a person who pastures stock for hire has no lien; and by the statute only the keeper, owner, or proprietor of a livery-stable has a lien on the stock kept and fed by him. Code, § 3089; Bissell v. Pearce, 28 N. Y. 252. But, if he had a lien, it is shown by his own affidavit that his claim for the feed and pasturage of the stock had been fully paid before the receiver was appointed. The only impediment to the complete and full execution of the process at law was thereby removed. If, after its removal was known to complainant, he omitted to have the attachment levied, when a regular and valid levy could have been made, and the property lawfully taken into possession by the sheriff, the effectiveness of the remedy at law was lost by his own laches; and in such case he cannot come into equity and have a receiver.

On consideration of all the circumstances charged in the bill and shown by the affidavits, we are forced to the conclusion that complainant had a complete and adequate remedy at law, and that no necessity is shown for the appointment of a receiver. The order appointing a receiver must be reversed. Reversed and remanded.

WHISENANT v. GORDON.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE — SALE OF LAND — REDELIVERY OF DEED — REINVESTMENT OF TITLE.

1. In an action for specific performance it appeared that a woman had conveyed land to her son on condition that he would care for her and furnish her a life support; that the son had afterwards returned the deed, and that the mother had then conveyed the land to another. The last grantee contended that, though the son had never reconveyed to his mother the legal title, there was a binding agreement for such reconveyance, on which the mother had been restored to the possession. The son denied that he had ever agreed to reconvey, or that he ever agreed to a cancellation of the deed. On the return of the deed the mother left the son's house, and after that he contributed but little to her support. Several witnesses testified to conversations, in which the son said that he had returned the deed, and abandoned his claim to the land, because his mother was troublesome, and it would be worth more than the land to take care of her. Doubt was cast upon this testimony by the son's denial of any such conversations, and by the fact that one of the said witnesses had made an entirely different statement on a former trial. The son, after returning the deed, retained possession of the land for a considerable time, and there was evidence that before the last conveyance he sent a message to the grantee, warning her that if she bought the land she would buy a lawsuit. The amount paid by the said grantee was less than one-third of the value of the land. Held, that the agreement to reconvey was not so clearly established as to justify a decree for specific performance.

2. The redelivery of a deed to the grantor, though accompanied by a parol agreement to reconvey, does not operate to revest the title in the grantor, or estop the grantee from afterwards asserting his title.

Appeal from chancery court, Marshall county; S. K. MCSPADDEN, Chancellor.

Bill by Bethsheba Gordon against George E. Whisenant to restrain the execution of a judgment in ejectment in favor of the defendant, and to compel him to convey the legal title to the land in dispute. There was a judgment for complainant, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

John G. Winston, for appellant. Brown, Holliday & Street, for appellee.

WALKER, J. The parties to this suit claim the land in dispute under different conveyances from Mrs. Mary Whisenant. In October, 1877, she conveyed the land by deed to the appellant, who is her son. In October, 1881, she executed another conveyance of the same land to Mrs. Gordon, the appellee. It is not alleged or claimed that the appellant ever reconveyed the legal title to his mother. The claim is that by a parol agreement between them, made prior to the execution of the conveyance to Mrs. Gordon, the deed to the appellant was canceled, and by him surrendered to his mother, who was restored to the possession of the property. Mrs. Gordon acquired possession of the land under the deed to her, and remained in possession for several years, and until after the death of Mrs. Whisenant. The appellant having recovered a judgment against the appellee in a statutory action of ejectment for the land, the bill in this case was filed by the appellee to restrain the execution of the judgment in favor of the appellant, and to compel him to convey the legal title to the appellee. The legal title, which was vested in the appellant by the execution and delivery of the conveyance to him, has remained in him, as it could not be divested by the cancellation of that conveyance and its redelivery to the grantor therein. Bailey's Adm'r v. Campbell, 82 Ala. 342, 2 South. Rep. 646; Smith v. Cockrell, 66 Ala. 64; Kimball v. Greig, 47 Ala. 230. The appellee insists that though there has been no reconveyance of the legal title, yet there was a binding agreement for such reconveyance under which Mrs. Whisenant was restored to possession of the land, and that this agreement should be specifically enforced in favor of the appellee as Mrs. Whisenant's vendee. The appellant denies that he consented to a cancellation of the conveyance to him, or that he agreed that the title to the land should be reinvested in his mother. There is no competent direct evidence of such consent or agreement. The most that can be said of the proof in support of the claim set up by the bill is that it establishes certain facts which point to the conclusion that the arrangement between Mrs. Whisenant and her son, which was evidenced by her deed to him, was not fully carried out, but was abandoned. The deed to the appellant recites as a consideration the payment by him of the sum of one dollar, and also the further consideration that he is to take care of the grantor, and furnish her house-room, board, lodging, clothing, and medical attention when necessary during her life-time.

It appears from the evidence that Mrs. Whisenant removed from the land in dispute to the residence of the appellant about the time of the execution of her deed to him; that she lived with him between two and three years, when she left his residence, and thereafter lived elsewhere; that he redelivered the deed to her, and she had possession of it at the time of her execution of the conveyance to the appellee, when she delivered it to the latter; that, after the appellant redelivered his deed to his mother, and she left his residence, he contributed but little towards her support; and that, with knowledge of the deed to the appellee, he permitted the latter to obtain and keep undisturbed possession of the land until after his mother's death. The facts here referred to indicate that Mrs. Whisenant did not continue to receive from the appellant the care and support stipulated for in her deed to him, and that when he ceased to furnish her a home, and after she made a deed of the same land to another person, he abandoned possession of the land until after her death. One witness, who appears from his own statement not to be on friendly terms with the appellant, testifies to conversations in which the appellant said that he had returned the deed to his mother; that he was tired of her; that she was troublesome, and he would not be bothered with her for two such places; that he gave her back the deed, as she was wanting the land back, to sell it, or to make a support out of it for herself. Another witness testified: "I have heard him [the defendant] say that he was not going to cultivate the land; that he had given her up the deed, and that he was not going to have anything more to do with it; and said also that he thought he had pay for all he did for her; that she was troublesome and aggravating, and that he would never have anything more to do with her. * * * The defendant told me he had given back to his mother the deed, because she was so much trouble that he did not want to be bothered with her. He stated to me that he intended never to have anything more to do with her or the land, and also stated that he would not be bothered with her for two such places, and that she might live five or six years longer, and that it would be worth more than the land to care for her if she did live that long. He thought he had about got pay for all he had done for her." Doubt is cast upon this testimony by the appellant's explicit denial that he had any such conversations, and by the testimony of several other witnesses to the effect that when this witness was examined in the unlawful detainer case between the same parties he gave a materially different version of the statement made by the appellant to him. The evidence above referred to is what must be relied on to support the conclusion that when the appellant handed his deed back to his mother he abandoned his claim to the land, and that it was understood between them that she should be the owner of the land from that time. But there are several considerations in the way of accepting this conclusion with any confidence in its correctness. In the first place, even after rejecting a mass of incompetent evidence on both sides, we are still confronted with irreconcilable conflicts at every material point throughout the testimony. Furthermore, it appears that the appellant did not give up the land when he handed his deed back to his mother, but retained possession of it by his tenant for a considerable time thereafter. There is no competent evidence to show that he knew of or consented to the mutilation of his deed by tearing off the signature and acknowledgment. There is evidence tending to show that before the conveyance was made to the appellee a message was sent to her by the appellant, warning her that if she bought the land from his mother she would buy a lawsuit; and it is plain that the appellee was informed of the prior conveyance to the appellant, and yet refrained from making any inquiry of him as to his alleged relinquishment of his claim; and also that she paid less than one-third of the value of the land, which is a circumstance tending to show that there was doubt as to the ability of the seller to convey a good title, and that it was not clearly understood that the appellant had abandoned his claim. The result of the examination of the record is that we find that the appellee relies upon an alleged agreement by the appellant that his mother should again become the owner of the land; that there is an entire absence of direct evidence of the terms of the alleged agreement, or of the consideration to support it; and that the conclusion that there was any such agreement at all can be reached only by relying upon doubtful inferences from circumstances not established by clear and satisfactory proof. It cannot be said that it plainly appears from the evidence that the appellant's act in handing his deed back to his mother, and her act in removing from her son's residence, were done in the performance of a definite agreement between them that the son should cease to be the owner of the property which had been conveyed to him, and that the mother should be restored to the ownership. The utmost effect that can be given to the evidence as to the conduct of the mother and son is to concede that it suggests the probability that there was some such understanding between them. It was not incumbent on the appellee to show that in the making of the alleged agreement by the appellant to reinvest his mother with the title the requirements of the statute of frauds were conformed to. Any objection because of such non-conformity was waived by the failure to interpose a defense on that ground, either by demurrer or answer. Shakespeare v. Alba, 76 Ala. 351. But the failure to plead the statute of frauds did not relieve the appellee of the duty of furnishing the full measure of proof which is required to justify a decree for the specific enforcement of a contract for the sale or conveyance of land. The terms of the contract must be definitely alleged, and established, as alleged, by clear and satisfactory proof. If the evidence fails to prove the contract, or any of its terms are left in doubt or uncertainty, a specific performance will be refused. Courts will not, in such cases, grope their way on inconclusive probabilities, or grant relief on merely persuasive testimony. The evidence must be such as to produce a clear conviction of the existence and terms of the contract as alleged. Carlisle v. Carlisle, 77 Ala. 339; Derrick v. Monette, 73 Ala. 75; Pike v. Pettus, 71 Ala. 98; Daniel v. Collins, 57 Ala. 625; Aday v. Echols, 18 Ala. 353; Bogan v. Daughdrill, 51 Ala. 312. Conveyances for the alienation of land are required to be in writing, and their execution must be accompanied by formalities the observance of which is calculated to remove all uncertainty as to the grantor's intention to divest himself of the title. The provision of the statute on this subject would fail in its purpose to prevent the divestiture of title to land by any act of equivocal meaning if the land-owner could be charged with the duty to convey by evidence which leaves it in doubt or uncertainty whether or not he intended to bind himself by a contract to part with his title. The testimony in this case is so conflicting, and the claim that the appellant agreed that his mother should be reinvested with the title to the property in dispute is so dependent upon inferences from circumstances of doubtful import, that the evidence cannot be regarded as so clearly establishing an agreement to reconvey as to justify a decree for its specific enforcement.

The appellee does not occupy the position of a bona fide purchaser without notice of the prior conveyance to the appellant, for, though that conveyance had not been recorded, yet it is plain from the evidence that the appellee was informed of its existence when the deed of later date was made to her. There is no evidence to show that the appellee in making her purchase was influenced by any representation or admission made by the appellant, or that she acted on any assurance from him that he no longer claimed the property. There is nothing upon which the appellee can rest a claim that the appellant estopped himself from asserting against her the title vested in him by the prior conveyance, unless such estoppel resulted from his act in redelivering that conveyance to his grantor, who thereafter undertook to convey the same land to the appellee. It is plain, as has been already stated, that the redelivery of the deed, and its destruction by the parties, are ineffectual to revest the estate in the grantor. It was not decided in Reavis v. Reavis, 50 Ala. 60, or in Carithers v. Lay, 51 Ala. 390, that the mere cancellation of a deed could operate as a divestiture of the title of the grantor therein, or to preclude him from asserting his title. Those cases merely recognize the equitable title of the real purchaser of land, who had paid the purchase money, and taken possession with the full consent of the person who was the grantee in the conveyance, which had been destroyed. It was not held in either of those cases that the consent of the grantee to the cancellation of his deed would estop him from claiming title under it. But it has been held by some courts that a grantee may estop himself from claiming title under his unrecorded deed by consenting to its cancellation, or by redelivering it to his grantor, with the intention that the latter should reacquire the property. Farrar v. Farrar, 4 N. H. 191; Trull v. Skinner, 17 Pick. 213; 1 Devlin, Deeds, § 302. The text-writer just quoted says: "These decisions, however, are confined to but a few states, and it is obvious that they must, in a measure, conflict with the provisions of the statute of frauds. If the rule that the cancellation of a deed or its redelivery to the grantor would operate to revest the title were adopted, it would permit the perpetration of the frauds which it was the design of the statute to prevent. The deed might be redelivered to the grantor for many other purposes than a transfer of the title. As in the cases cited in the following section the deed might be returned for the purpose of correction or acknowledgment, resort would have to be had to parol evidence in case of controversy, to determine the intention with which the redelivery was made. These decisions have frequently been referred to in other states, but always with disapproval. And as said by Mr. Justice COMPTON in a case in Arkansas, [Strawn v. Norris, 21 Ark. 80, 82:] 'It would not be easy to maintain the soundness of these decisions upon principle.'" 1 Devlin, Deeds, § 305. The contention in this case illustrates the unsatisfactory operation of such a rule of estoppel. Here only the bare fact of redelivery is clearly shown. That act was of equivocal import. It did not necessarily indicate that the grantor intended to give up the property. We now find the deed in mutilated condition, but the evidence does not show that the grantor consented to the mutilation, or treated that act as a cancellation of the conveyance. We have only the testimony of the witnesses to look to for information as to the circumstances attending the redelivery and mutilation of the instrument, and as to the acts and expressions of the parties indicating the presence or absence of an intention that the grantor should be restored to the ownership of the property. The mere act of redelivering the deed was without effect upon the title. The accompanying agreement of the parties, and not the mere act of redelivery, is the feature of the transaction which must be relied upon as the basis of an estoppel. That agreement rests wholly in parol. As an agreement it is without effect upon the title to the land. The effort is to give it the same effect, by way of an estoppel upon the grantee to assert his legal title, as it would have had if it had been reduced to writing, and signed by the parties. If such a rule of estoppel is recognized, the result is that a change in the beneficial ownership of land may be effected by a mere parol agreement, proved only by the testimony of witnesses. We cannot recognize a rule of estoppel which would offer such temptations for fraudulent evasions of the requirements of the law upon the subject of conveyances for the alienation of land. We may add, in this connection, that the impression made upon us by the testimony of the appellee is that she acted on the erroneous supposition that the effect of the prior unrecorded conveyance was destroyed by the mere acts of redelivery and mutilation, rather than that she was misled, in making the purchase of the land, by any declaration or conduct of the appellant indicating his disavowal of all claim to the property. She was simply mistaken as to the law when she supposed that the appellant was bound by a transaction which in reality had no legal effect. Certainly it does not satisfactorily appear that she was induced to make the purchase by anything said or done by the appellant, and for this additional reason she is not in a position to claim that he has estopped himself from asserting his legal title. Morris v. Alston, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 315; Leinkauf v. Munter, 76 Ala. 194.

It is unnecessary to review the ruling made on the demurrer to the bill. Any want of proper allegations in the bill might be cured by amendment. Conceding the sufficiency of the bill, yet the evidence adduced does not warrant the granting of the relief prayed upon either of the grounds that the defendant had made a valid agreement to reconvey the land in dispute to the complainant's grantor, or that the defendant is estopped from asserting against the complainant the legal title vested in him by the prior conveyance. For the reason that the complainant's claim is not supported by sufficient evidence, the decree of the chancery court is reversed, and a decree will be here rendered dismissing the bill.

Reversed and rendered.

CENTRAL RAILROAD & BANKING CO. OF GEORGIA v. INGRAM.

(Supreme Court of Alabama. Jan. 27, 1892.)

EVIDENCE — CONSISTENT STATEMENTS — INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In a suit against a railroad company for negligently killing plaintiff's mules, defendant's engineer testified that the immediate locality of the accident was enveloped in a dense fog, so that it was impossible to see the mules in time to avoid killing them, and that the fog arose from the bed of a creek, extended across the track, and was about 100 feet thick. Held, that this testimony was not inconsistent with testimony that the night was clear and starlight, and that there was no fog at a point three-quarters of a mile from the place of the accident, and that the fireman on the same train with the engineer testified that he could "not say there was any fog that night."

2. In such case, where there was nothing in the evidence inconsistent with defendant's evidence, which went to show that its employes were without fault, the court erred in refusing to charge the jury that, if they believed all the evidence in the case, they should find for defendant.

Appeal from circuit court, Russell county; J. M. CARMICHAEL, Judge.

Action by C. E. Ingram against the Central Railroad & Banking Company of Georgia. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

James T. Norman, for appellant. John V. Smith, for appellee.

MCCLELLAN, J. The general affirmative charge was asked by the defendant (the Central Railroad & Banking Company of Georgia) below, and refused. The only exception reserved goes to that action of the trial court. The correctness of the ruling confessedly depends upon whether any evidence was adduced in conflict with, or which afforded an inference inconsistent with, the testimony of the engineer that the immediate locality of the casualty was so enveloped in a dense wall of fog as that it was impossible to see plaintiff's mules until too near them to avoid colliding with and killing them. This fog wall, he says, arose from the bed of a creek, along which was timber, was scarcely a hundred feet thick, and extended across the track. This testimony is not, we apprehend, unreasonable in itself; but, if so, the jury would have been free to disregard it, under the charge requested and refused. So, too, with respect to supposed contradictions in other parts of this witness' testimony. The giving of the charge asked would not have prevented the jury, had they seen proper, from discrediting the witness as to the existence of fog, and finding for the plaintiff, since the instruction was that they should find for defendant only in the event they believed all the evidence. The sole question, we repeat, therefore is, was there any evidence inconsistent with the testimony of the engineer as to the existence of the fog at the time and place of the casualty? Certainly neither the fact that the night was clear and starlight,—the accident occurred a little after 3 o'clock A. M.,—or that the dawn was fair and bright, is at all inconsistent with the theory of the existence of a fog wall at that particular point; for it is common knowledge that fogs of this character, arising from watercourses, usually, if indeed not always, occur only during very clear nights. Nor do we conceive that the testimony of the witness Smith affords any basis for an inference to be drawn by the jury that the engineer was mistaken as to the fog. Smith was three-fourths of a mile away. It was night. It does not appear that his attention was at all diverted to the point of the alleged fog. If it had been, it is not reasonable to suppose that he would at that distance and at that time have detected the wall of fog hanging over the bed of the creek, and among the trees which lined its banks. It is common knowledge that such fogs, "after depositing a heavy dew, lie still in the valleys," over the water and damp ground from which they are exhaled; and it would have been singular, under the conditions shown by the evidence, if there had been any traces of fog at the place where Smith was. The evidence does not inform us how many creeks, swamps, and the like this train had passed over on that night; but the engineer testified that he had passed through a similar fog at Uchee creek, and, for aught that we can know, this was the only other point on the line traversed by the train which afforded the same aqueous and atmospheric conditions that existed at the point of the accident. So that we are unable to conceive how the fact that fog existed elsewhere only at Uchee creek could afford any inference that it did not exist at the place in question.

Another matter relied on to sustain the court's action is the testimony of the fireman. This witness testified as to the fog only this: "I cannot say there was any fog that night." This could mean no more than that the witness did not know at the time of the trial whether there was a fog at the time and place inquired about. How this ignorance arose—why he is unable to say that there was a fog—he does not undertake to inform the jury, as we construe his testimony. It may be that his attention was not on the alert, and hence he did not know at the time whether there was a fog; or it may be that he knew at the time that there was or that there was not such fog as the engineer deposed to, and has since forgotten what was the real fact in that connection. However that may be, one thing is certain,—he neither affirms nor denies the existence of the fog, directly or inferentially; and his evidence cannot, in any just sense, be said to corroborate or contradict that of the engineer, or to afford any basis for a legitimate inference in line with or inconsistent with the latter's testimony. Manifestly, the jury might have given full credence to every fact deposed to by the fireman, and full force to every inference deducible from his evidence, and yet have implicitly believed all that was deposed to by the engineer in respect of the existence of a dense fog at the place of the casualty. So far as the testimony of the fireman is concerned, therefore, the general charge requested should have been given.

There is no evidence in this record that any of the mules were stricken elsewhere than at the point which the engineer swears was enveloped in the fog. No indications of a collision at any other point are deposed to. All the animals which were killed outright were found at that place. Several hours afterwards one of the mules, which had been wounded in the collision, was found on the track at another place, a short distance from this, in the direction from which the train came. That it had gone to that place after the train passed is manifest from the fact that it was found on the track, where it could not have remained and lived while the train was passing; and that it might have come from the place where the other mules were killed is demonstrated by the fact that it was still able to move about, and was driven off the road. In the absence of any evidence of a collision at the point where this mule was found, it would be unreasonable to allow any inference, under the circumstances, to be drawn that it was stricken at that place. This fact, like the other circumstances to which we have alluded, —and this and those others constitute all the evidence relied on to afford an inference inconsistent with the evidence of the engineer,—affords nothing contradictory of or inconsistent with the evidence for the defendant, which went to show that its employes were without fault in respect of the occurrence; and the jury should have been instructed, as requested, that, if they believed all the evidence in the case, they should find for the defendant. Reversed and remanded.

CROFT v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—REASONABLE DOUBT—PROBABILITY OF INNOCENCE.

An instruction, in a criminal case, that a reasonable doubt of defendant's guilt is not the same as a probability of his innocence, but that such a doubt may exist when the evidence fails to establish a probability of innocence, is not objectionable on the ground that it is argumentative, or that the phrase "probability of innocence" is of such a character as to require explanation. Bain v. State, 74 Ala. 38 followed.

Appeal from circuit court, Etowah county; JOHN B. TALLY, Judge.

Prosecution against Will Croft. From a judgment of conviction defendant appeals. Reversed.

Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

MCCLELLAN, J. The only exception reserved on the trial below goes to the refusal of the court to give the following charge, requested by defendant: "A reasonable doubt of defendant's guilt is not the same as a probability of his innocence. A reasonable doubt of defendant's guilt may exist when the evidence fails to convince the jury that there is a probability of defendant's innocence." There can be no doubt that the abstract proposition involved in this request is a sound one. Under the ruling in the case of Williams v. State, 52 Ala. 411, however, this charge would be condemned, as being confusing, in that it fails to enlighten the jury as to the meaning of the expression "probability of innocence." In that case the trial court refused to instruct the jury that "if, from all the evidence, there is a probability of the innocence of the defendants, the jury must find them not guilty;" and this court, holding that the refusal was proper, said: "It [the charge] would have involved the jury in doubt and uncertainty, unless it had been carefully explained to them what was intended by 'a probability of innocence.'" But in the subsequent case of Bain v. State, 74 Ala. 38, Williams' Case was overruled as to the point under consideration, and it was held that a charge requested by the defendant to the effect that "a probability of defendant's innocence is a just foundation for a reasonable doubt of his guilt, and therefore for his acquittal," should have been given. Reaffirming Bain's Case, our conclusion must be that there is nothing in the phrase "probability of innocence," as employed in the present case, which involves a tendency to confuse the jury, and that the request is not objectionable on that ground. Nor can it be contended that any other term or phrase of the proposed instruction was of a character to require explanation to avoid confusing the jury. So that, when taken as a whole, we are unable to perceive that the request belonged to that class of charges which is condemned in Railroad Co. v. Hall, 87 Ala. 723, 6 South. Rep. 277, as being ambiguous, involved, and metaphysical. The only other possible objection to it is that it is argumentative; and this, we think, is untenable. It is, of course, the right of a defendant to have the jury instructed as to the measure of proof necessary to his conviction, and the character of the doubt of his guilt which will justify—even require—his acquittal. This, it would seem, cannot be better or more intelligibly accomplished than by differentiating the reasonable doubt which demands a verdict of "not guilty" from other possible mental conditions which, though they too require acquittal, are not essential to that result; since, though they may not exist at all, yet there may be such a doubt reasonably arising from a fair consideration of all the evidence as would entitle the defendant to a favorable verdict. And there would appear, indeed, to be a sort of necessity for this differentiation between a reasonable doubt and a probability of innocence, in view of our decisions, which, to the mind of a layman, might admit of being contorted into a requirement that the jury should believe that the defendant is probably innocent before they would be justified in finding him not guilty. The charge, in our opinion, ought to have been given. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

MITCHELL v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—OBSTRUCTING RAILROAD TRACK—EVIDENCE—WITNESS—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. On a prosecution for obstructing a railroad track, where there is evidence that a crow-bar which had been kept at the depot near by was missing after the night the obstruction was placed on the track, that defendant was seen on the track that night with a crow-bar, and that a crow-bar was found next morning at the scene of the obstruction, evidence is admissible to show that the crow-bar so found was the same that was missing from the depot.

2. A witness, in identifying an article, stated that he could not tell positively whether it was the same. The court then told him that he could determine whether it was the same on the same principles that he would determine whether his hat or knife was his own, and he answered that he was satisfied that the article was the same. Held, that there was no error in the instruction to the witness, nor in the admission of his answer.

3. On a prosecution for obstructing a railroad track, where there is evidence that a shovel which had been left near the scene of the obstruction was found under defendant's house after his arrest, it is not improper to allow the shovel to be exhibited to the jury.

4. In a criminal case, on the cross-examination of a witness for the state, where it is not proposed to show that he has been before examined in the case, or in any case connected with or resembling it, it is not error to exclude a question as to how many times he has been a witness in court.

5. In a criminal case, where it is brought out on cross-examination that a witness for the state has been indicted for the same offense with which defendant is charged, it is competent for the state to rebut the inference which might be drawn from the circumstance, by proof that the witness has not been induced by any promise to testify against defendant.

6. Where defendant in a criminal case has testified in his own behalf, the state may, for the purpose of impeaching his credibility, ask witnesses the general character of defendant in the neighborhood in which he lived, without restricting the inquiry to his reputation for truth and veracity.

7. On a prosecution for obstructing a railroad track, defendant asked the court to instruct the jury: "In the absence of proof of the exact time when the obstruction was placed on the railroad, you are not authorized from the evidence to fix the exact time only from the evidence in the case; but when there is proof that defendant is seen at a certain place with a crow-bar, and the next morning at a certain place on the railroad, at a certain time, then it is competent for defendant to prove that he was elsewhere at the times and places; and if defendant has shown you this by proof, or the evidence in the case shows you at the times and places named and specified in the evidence, this is a circumstance in the case in favor of defendant; and if this, with the other evidence in the case, creates the abiding conviction in your mind that he has proven this, you must give him the benefit of it; and unless you believe from all the evidence, beyond all reasonable doubt, that defendant is guilty, then you must acquit him." Held, that the instruction was confused and involved, and argumentative, and was properly refused.

8. In a criminal case an instruction that if, after looking at all the evidence, there are two theories arising therefrom, one of which shows defendant's guilt, and the other of which shows his innocence, it is the duty of the jury to adopt that theory which shows his innocence, and acquit him, is properly refused, as it makes it the jury's duty to acquit if one phase of the evidence tends to exculpate defendant, whether they believe it or not.

9. It is improper to instruct the jury which of two conflicting theories of the evidence they shall accept.

10. Bad character may be proved against a witness for the purpose of impeaching his credibility, though the witnesses who testify as to his character fail to state that his character or reputation is such that he would not be believed when testifying on his oath.

Appeal from circuit court, Conecuh county; JOHN P. HUBBARD, Judge.

Indictment against George Mitchell for wantonly and maliciously placing obstructions on a railroad track. Defendant having been convicted, and sentenced to the penitentiary for five years, appeals. Affirmed.

There was evidence introduced by the state which tended to show that there had been an attempt to wreck a train on the Louisville & Nashville Railroad at a short distance from Evergreen, in Conecuh county; that the section boss of the road-on coming to the place where the obstruc, tions were placed on the track, found a broken crow-bar and a broken jack-screw, together with other articles of obstruction; and that there was near the scene of the attempted wreck a shovel, which was afterwards found at the defendant's house. On the examination of one Deming, he testified that he was, and had been for some time, depot agent of the Louisville & Nashville road at Evergreen, and that he had a crow-bar at the depot which was used around the warehouse, and that he had not seen the crow-bar since the night of the attempted wreck. The witness was then shown the broken crow-bar, and asked if it was the crow-bar he used at the warehouse, to which he replied: "He could not tell positively, and would not like to swear positively to this being the identical bar." After the witness had further testified "that the crow-bar had been around his office, and had been used there for a long time, and that he had seen it there often," the court instructed the witness "that it was a question of identity, and that he could determine whether it was the crow-bar or not upon the same principles that he would determine whether his hat or knife was his own." On the question of identity being repeated to the witness, he answered: "I am satisfied that it is the same crow-bar we had at the depot." There was further evidence introduced by the state which tended to connect defendant, together with others, with the commission of the crime for which he was indicted. After proving that the shovel which had been left on the side of the road near the scene of the obstruction was found under the defendant's house after his arrest, the state offered the shovel in evidence, and the court overruled defendant's objection thereto. On the introduction of one Stewart as a witness for the state, after testifying that he was a special agent of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, and had come up to investigate this obstruction of the track at Evergreen, and after he had given further testimony, defendant, on cross-examination, asked him this question: "You have been in court before frequently,—a witness in court frequently,—have you not?" The state objected to the question, and the court sustained the objection, and refused to allow the witness to answer. Upon the introduction of one Dick Agee as a witness for the state, and after he had sworn that, the morning after the train was attempted to be wrecked, he met defendant and one Mack Thomas on the road about one and a half or two hours by sun, in the morning, and both laughed, and said, "Oh, fellow, we liked to had something last night," the defendant, on cross-examination, asked said witness "if he was not indicted for the same offense for which the defendant was on trial;" and the witness answered, "Yes." Thereupon the solicitor asked this witness the following question: "I made you no promises, did I?" to which the witness answered, "You made me no promises." The defendant objected to both question and the answer, and duly excepted to the court's overruling his objection. After defendant had testified in his own behalf, the state introduced several witnesses for the purpose of impeaching him, and to each one of these witnesses the following question was propounded by the state: "Do you know the general character of George Mitchell, the defendant, in the neighborhood in which he lives?" Each of said witnesses answered "that he knew the general character of the defendant, and that defendant's character is bad." One witness said he was regarded as a "mean negro." The defendant objected to these questions, and also to the answers. The testimony for defendant tended to prove an alibi.

The defendant requested the court to give the following written charges, and separately excepted to the refusal of the court to give each of them as asked: (4) "The court charges the jury that, in the absence of proof of the exact time when the obstruction was placed on the railroad, you are not authorized from the evidence to fix the exact time only from the evidence in the case; but when there is proof that defendant is seen at a certain place with a crow-bar, and the next morning at a certain place on the railroad, at a certain time, then it is competent for the defendant to prove that he was elsewhere at the times and places; and if the defendant has shown you this by proof, or the evidence in the case shows you, at the times and places named and specified in the evidence, this is a circumstance in the case in favor of the defendant; and if this, with the other evidence in the case, creates the abiding conviction in your mind that he has proven this, you must give him the benefit of it; and unless you believe from all the evidence, beyond all reasonable doubt, that defendant is guilty, then you must acquit him." (9) "The court charges the jury that it is your duty to look at all the evidence in the case, and if, after looking at all the evidence, there are two theories arising from the evidence in the case, one of which shows his guilt, and the other shows his innocence, then it is your duty to adopt that theory which shows his innocence, and acquit him." (10) "The court charges the jury that while it is competent for the state to show that defendant is a man of bad character, to affect the weight of his testimony, this but throws a shade on the testimony that is not so dark as that if the evidence should go further, and show not only that he has the character of being a 'mean negro,' but his character for truth and veracity is bad, and he would not be believed on oath in a court of justice by the witnesses or witness; and if there is no evidence that the witness or witnesses would not believe him, in a court of justice, on oath, then you must not look at his testimony with this shade upon it."

Stallworth & Burnett, for appellant.
Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. There was evidence tending to show that a crow-bar which had been kept in the depot at Evergreen had been missing from that place since the night the obstruction was put on the track; that the defendant was seen on the track that night with a crow-bar; and that a crow-bar was found the next morning at the scene of the obstruction. Evidence was admissible to show that the crowbar which was found there was the same one which was missing from the depot. On the question of the identification of persons or things, a witness may be allowed to speak as to his opinion or belief. He may be certain and free from doubt, or he may not be fully assured of the correctness of his conclusions. He may state the result of his examination of the person or object sought to be identified, and it is proper for him so to express himself as to inform the jury whether his statement is made confidently or doubtingly. The testimony is not to be excluded because the witness does not speak with positive assurance. Turner v. McFee, 61 Ala. 468; Walker v. State, 58 Ala. 393; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 440; 1 Whart. Ev. § 511. There was no error in the instruction to the witness Deming on the question as to the identity of the crow-bar, and the answer of the witness, after such instruction, was properly admitted.

There was evidence tending to show that a shovel which had been left on the side of the railroad near the scene of the obstruction was found under the defendant's house after his arrest. It was not improper to permit this shovel to be produced and exhibited to the jury. Watkins v. State, 89 Ala. 82, 8 South. Rep. 184; Holly v. State, 75 Ala. 14.

On the cross-examination of one of the witnesses for the state he was asked as to the number of times he had been in court and had testified. It was not proposed to be shown that this witness had been examined in this case before, or had testified in other cases having any connection with or resemblance to this one. We are unable to discover the pertinency or relevancy of the inquiry. It seems plain that the defendant could not have been prejudiced by the action of the court in sustaining the objection to the question.

One of the witnesses for the state had been indicted for the same offense with which the defendant was charged. It was competent for the state to rebut the inference which might be drawn from this circumstance, which was brought out on a cross-examination, by proof that the witness had not been induced, by any promise in reference to his own case, to testify against the defendant.

The defendant testified in his own behalf. It was competent for the state to impeach his credibility. For this purpose, inquiry into his general character or reputation was proper. Such inquiry was not restricted to his reputation for truth and veracity. It was proper to ask a witness if he knew the general character of the defendant in the neighborhood in which he lived. McInerny v. Irvin, 90 Ala. 275, 7 South. Rep. 841; Ward v. State, 28 Ala. 53. No objection was interposed to the answers of the several witnesses to that question.

The fourth charge requested by the defendant is confused and involved; besides, it is plainly argumentative in character; and for that reason, also, the court was justified in refusing to give it. Railway Co. v. Hale, 90 Ala. 8, 8 South. Rep. 142; Hussey v. State, 86 Ala. 34, 5 South. Rep. 484; Snider v. Burks, 84 Ala. 53, 4 South. Rep. 225. Obedience to charge No. 9 would have made it the duty of the jury to acquit the defendant if one phase of the evidence tended to exculpate him, whether they believed that evidence or not. It is improper for the court to instruct the jury which of two conflicting theories of the evidence they shall accept. Fonville v. State, 91 Ala. 39, 8 South. Rep. 688. Bad character may be proved against a witness for the purpose of impeaching his credibility, although the witnesses who testify as to his character fail to state that his character or reputation is such that he would not be believed when testifying on his oath in a court of justice. This consideration discloses one of several objectionable features in charge No. 10. That charge was properly refused. The other exceptions reserved by the defendant during the progress of the trial are obviously without merit. Affirmed.

THOMPSON v. STATE.

LARCENY—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

On a prosecution for larceny, where the evidence shows that defendant struck the hand of a person who was showing him money, but does not show whether he got the money, or merely knocked it to the ground, where it was lost, it is error to refuse to charge that defendant cannot be convicted unless he got the money into his hands or actual possession, since that only would constitute larceny.

Appeal from circuit court, Pike county; JOHN P. HUBBARD, Judge.

Indictment against Amos Thompson for larceny. Defendant was convicted, and appeals. Reversed.

At the trial the court refused defendant's request to charge: (1) "The jury must believe, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant got the money into his hands, or actual possession, before they can convict him of larceny."

R. L. Harmon, for appellant. Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. The witness for the state testified that he held out his open hand, with two silver dollars therein, showing the money to the defendant; that the defendant struck witness' hand, and the money was either knocked out of his hand, or was taken by the defendant, he could not tell positively which. It was after 12 o'clock at night, and the witness did not see the money either in defendant's possession or on the ground. The court charged the jury: "If the jury find from the evidence that the defendant, with a felonious intent, grabbed for the money, but did not get it, but only knocked it from the owner's hand with a felonious intent, this would be a sufficient carrying away of the money, although defendant never got possession at any time of said money." This charge was erroneous. To constitute larceny, there must be a felonious taking and carrying away of personal property. There must be such a caption that the accused acquires dominion over the property, followed by such an asportation or carrying away as to supersede the possession of the owner for an appreciable period of time. Though the owner's possession is disturbed, yet the offense is not complete if the accused fails to acquire such dominion over the property as to enable him to take actual custody or control. Frazier v. State, 85 Ala. 17, 4 South. Rep. 691; Croom v. State, 71 Ala. 14; Edmonds v. State, 70 Ala. 8; Wolf v. State, 41 Ala. 412. It is not enough that the money was knocked out of the owner's hand, if it fell to the ground, and the defendant never got control of it. The defendant was not guilty of larceny, if he did not get the money under his control. If the attempt merely caused the money to fall from the owner's hand to the ground, and the defendant ran off without getting it, the larceny was not consummated, as the dominion of the trespasser was not complete. Charge No. 1 was a proper statement of the law as applicable to the evidence above referred to, and it should have been given. Reversed and remanded.

FESTORAZZI et al. v. ST. JOSEPH'S CATHOLIC CHURCH.

(Supreme Court of Alabama. Feb., 1892.)

APPEAL—INTERLOCUTORY DECREE.

An appeal will not lie from a decree overruling a demurrer to a cross-bill.

Appeal from chancery court, Mobile county; W. H. TAYLOE, Chancellor.

Action by S. Festorazzi and another, as executors, against St. Joseph's Catholic Church. From a decree overruling plaintiffs' demurrer to defendant's cross-bill, plaintiffs appeal. Dismissed.

Hannis Taylor, Overall & Bestor, and Fred. G. Bromberg, for appellants. Gaylord B. & F. B. Clark, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This is an appeal from a decree overruling a demurrer to a cross-bill. There is no authority for an appeal from such an interlocutory decree. Barclay v. Spragins, 80 Ala. 357; Jones v. Iron Co., 90 Ala. 545, 8 South. Rep. 132; Code 1886, § 3612. The court being without authority to entertain the appeal, it must be dismissed.

F. S. & H. ROSENBERG v. H. B. CLAFLIN CO.

ATTACHMENT—DEFECTIVE WRIT—WAIVER—PLEADING—AMENDMENT—APPEAL.

1. Where the record fails to show that defendant's motion to require plaintiff to give security for costs was insisted on, the motion is presumed to have been waived.

2. Though Code, § 2995, provides that a suit commenced by attachment is triable at the return-term of the writ, if the levy has been made and notice thereof given 20 days before the commencement of such term, defendant, by a general appearance, waives plaintiff's failure to serve the notice within proper time.

3. A defendant in attachment, by filing pleas involving a recognition of the service of the writ, and by going to trial without objection, enters a general appearance, within Code, § 2996, providing that, if the defendant appears and pleads, the cause proceeds as in suits commenced by summons and complaint.

4. Under Code, § 2998, providing that plaintiff, before or during trial, must be permitted to amend any defect of form or substance in the affidavit, and no attachment must be dismissed for any defect therein, if the plaintiff will make a sufficient affidavit, a plaintiff corporation, having stated its name correctly in the original affidavit, may file an amended affidavit averring its corporate character.

5. An unverified plea denying plaintiff's corporate character will be stricken out, under Acts 1888–89, p. 57, providing that plaintiff cannot be required to prove its corporate existence unless the same is denied by verified plea.

6. An order sustaining a demurrer cannot be reviewed on appeal, where the record fails to show the grounds of the demurrer.

7. Where two pleas present the general issue, an error in sustaining a demurrer to one of them is harmless.

Appeal from circuit court, Dallas county; JOHN MOORE, Judge.

Action by the H. B. Claflin Company against F. S. & H. Rosenberg in the nature of attachment proceedings. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This action was commenced by attachment. Defendant filed 13 pleas, the tenth and eleventh of which are not found in the record. The second and third pleas alleged that the plaintiff was a foreign corporation, and had not complied with the constitutional and statutory provisions which authorized it to do business in this state. The original affidavit upon which the attachment was issued did not describe the plaintiff as a corporation, but, by permission of the court, the plaintiff amended this affidavit, as well as its complaint, by describing the plaintiff as a body corporate. The defendant moved to dissolve and dismiss the attachment, and dismiss the levy, on the ground that the original and amended affidavit made a new cause of action, and because no notice of the levy of the attachment sued out by H. B. Claflin Company, a body corporate, had been served on the defendant. The court overruled these motions. On motion of the plaintiff, the court ordered the defendant's pleas numbered 1, 4, 5, 6, 8, and 9 to be stricken from the file, and the court sustained the plaintiff's demurrer to plea No. 13.

Gaston A. Robbins, for appellant. Dawson & Pitts, for appellee.

WALKER, J. 1. The record fails to show that any action was taken by the circuit court on the motion of the defendant to require the plaintiff to give security for the costs. As it does not appear that the motion was insisted on, or even called to the attention of the court, the presumption on appeal is that it was abandoned or waived. Hutcheson v. Powell, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 170; Covington Co. v. Kinney, 45 Ala. 176; Dougherty v. Colquitt, 2 Ala. 337.

2. A suit commenced by attachment is triable at the return-term of the writ, if the levy has been made and notice thereof given 20 days before the commencement of such term. Code, § 2995. If the notice of the levy has not then been given, and the defendant does not appear, the case cannot be tried at that term; but it may be continued, and notice of the levy may be given thereafter. No reason is perceived why the mere failure of the officer to serve the notice at the proper time should confer on the defendant the right to have the attachment dismissed. However that may be, it is plain that nothing remains to be accomplished by a service of the notice, if the defendant voluntarily appears and pleads to the complaint. The purpose of the notice is to afford the defendant the opportunity to appear and make defense. A general appearance dispenses with the necessity of a formal notice, and is a waiver of any previous irregularity in the service of process. Lampley v. Beavels, 25 Ala. 534; Moore v. Easley, 18 Ala. 619; Peebles v. Weir, 60 Ala. 413.

The appearance of the defendant in this case was not limited to the purpose of the motion to quash the levy and to dissolve and dismiss the attachment. It recognized the case as in court by filing a number of pleas, several of which involved a recognition of the service of the writ of attachment, and by going to trial, without objection, so far as the record discloses. All objections because of the failure of the officer to serve written notice of the levy were waived by this general appearance. If the defendant in attachment appears and pleads, the cause proceeds as in suits commenced by summons and complaint. Code, § 2996. In claiming that the motion to quash the levy and to dissolve and dismiss the attachment should have been granted because of the failure to serve written notice of the levy, the appellant urges an objection which has been removed by themselves.

3. The original affidavit for the attachment correctly stated the name of the plaintiff, but did not describe it either as a partnership or as a corporation. The plaintiff was permitted to file an amended affidavit, in which its corporate character is duly stated. It has been held that the absence of an allegation of the plaintiff's corporate capacity in an original complaint filed by a corporation could not be regarded as a failure to name any plaintiff at all, and that an amendment of the complaint by stating the plaintiff's corporate character should be allowed. Insurance Co. v. Roberts, 60 Ala. 431; Alabama Conference, etc., v. Price, 42 Ala. 47. Such an amendment is a mere correction of the description of a plaintiff, already named. It does not amount to a departure from the original complaint, to the institution of a new action, or to the introduction of a different party plaintiff. A similar amendment of the affidavit in an attachment case is plainly authorized by the provision of the statute that the plaintiff, before or during the trial, must be permitted to amend any defect of form or substance in the affidavit; and no attachment must be dismissed for any defect in the affidavit, if the plaintiff, his agent or attorney, will make a sufficient affidavit. Code, § 2998. The mandate of the statute that the attachment law must be liberally construed to advance its manifest intent need not be invoked to justify this conclusion. The sufficiency of the defendant's pleas numbered 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9 depended upon the correctness of the assumption that the suit was not commenced by the plaintiff corporation, because its corporate capacity was not stated in the original affidavit. That assumption was erroneous, and there was no error in striking the above-mentioned pleas from the files. None of them presented a valid defense to the suit.

4. The first plea was a denial that the plaintiff is a corporation authorized to maintain this suit. This plea was insufficient, because it was not sworn to. It presented an issue as to the existence of the plaintiff as a corporation. The plaintiff cannot be required to prove its corporate existence, unless the same is denied by a plea verified by affidavit. Acts Ala. 1888–89, p. 57.

5. No demurrer to the thirteenth plea is found in the record. As there is nothing to show what were the grounds of the demurrer, we are unable to review the ruling of the court in sustaining it. However erroneous that ruling may have been, it involved no injury to the appellant. The plea amounted only to the general issue. Railroad Co. v. Trammell, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 870. The twelfth plea amounted to the same thing. Under this plea the defendant had the full benefit of all matter of defense that would have been available to it under the thirteenth plea. Sustaining the demurrer to the latter plea was, for this reason, error without injury, if error at all. Manning v. Maroney, 87 Ala. 563, 6 South. Rep. 343. We have discovered no error in the record, and the judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed.

(94 Ala. 55)

HORNSBY v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Alabama. Feb. 3, 1892.)

DRAWING JURY—MURDER—INDICTMENT—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS UNDER ARREST—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Under Act 1888–89, p. 430, amending Act 1886–87, p. 151, § 4, and providing that, as far as it applies to Pike county, the names of the persons from whom jurors are to be drawn shall be placed in fifteen boxes, one for each precinct in the county, a jury for the trial of a capital case in Pike county must be drawn from fifteen boxes, instead of from one box, as provided in the original act.

2. An indictment which charges that "defendant unlawfully and with malice aforethought killed P. by stabbing him with a knife or other weapon," is demurrable, as the alternative averment, "or other weapon," insufficiently describes the means used.

3. Where a count in an indictment is in the alternative, with one of the averments good and the other charged in the alternative bad, and no objection is taken to the indictment, a general verdict of guilty will be referred to the good averment, and a judgment on conviction sustained. State v. Coleman, 5 Port. (Ala.) 40, followed.

4. It is not error for a court in a criminal case to refuse to permit defendant to inquire of a juror on his voir dire whether he is willing to accord a negro as fair a trial as a white person, as neither party to the action has a right to interrogate a juror before he is challenged.

5. The mere facts that defendant was under arrest for homicide, and that the officer who had him in charge was armed, are not sufficient to exclude a statement of defendant to the officer concerning the homicide, and how it occurred.

6. Defendant alleged that deceased was killed by falling on a broken wagon-spoke, and offered in evidence a piece of wood, claimed to be similar in shape to the wagon-spoke when the homicide occurred. Held, that the court did not err in excluding the piece of wood, as the wagon-spoke itself was in evidence, and as it was a matter of proof whether its appearance differed from what it was at the time of the death of deceased.

7. In such case, the testimony of a witness that at the time the spoke was cut from the wheel he called the attention of a person to it, and asked him to preserve it, was properly excluded as hearsay.

8. It is error to charge the jury that, "if defendant killed P. with a deadly weapon, it is presumed to be murder," where such charge is unaccompanied with the further statement, "unless the evidence which proves the killing rebuts the presumption."

9. It is not error for the court to refuse to charge that, in order to find defendant guilty, the jury must be convinced beyond a reasonable doubt, both that defendant took the life of deceased and that he did it with premeditation and deliberation.

10. A charge that "manslaughter in the first degree is the voluntary depriving a human being of life," is erroneous, in that it omits the important qualifying clauses "unlawful" and "without malice."

11. On a trial for murder, a charge that the "absence of all evidence of motive affords a strong presumption of innocence," is misleading, for, if the offense is clearly made out by other evidence, it is not necessary for the state to go further, and also prove a motive.

12. On a trial for murder defendant requested the court to charge that the burden was on the state to prove the guilt of the accused, and was not necessarily on defendant to explain suspicions; that circumstances and suspicion were not enough; that conviction beyond a reasonable doubt was what the law required; and that, if any facts or circumstances established by the evidence were absolutely inconsistent with the supposition of guilt, the defendant must be acquitted. Held, that the requests to charge were properly refused, as they were misleading and argumentative.

Appeal from circuit court, Pike county; JOHN P. HUBBARD, Judge.

L. Hornsby was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appeals. Reversed.

Upon the formation of the jury, as the names of the jurors summoned for the trial were drawn from the box, and were examined on their voir dire as to the cause of challenge, the defendant requested the court to ask the persons so drawn "If they were willing to accord to the defendant, who was a negro, as fair a trial as if he was a white man." The court refused to propound said question to the persons so drawn, and defendant excepted. The evidence introduced by the state tended to show that when the deceased, who was drunk, was riding home with the defendant in a wagon they were heard talking in a loud voice. One of the persons exclaimed, with an oath, "Don't throw me out!" That just shortly after that the defendant was seen driving at a rapid pace alone in the wagon, and the deceased was afterwards found in the road about where the exclamations were heard, with his throat cut. That the defendant went up to the plantation on which he lived, and told the proprietor, one Col. Perdue, "that a man had gotten tangled up in the wheels of the wagon, and he had better go down and see to him; that he did not know how badly he was hurt;" and that, upon Col. Perdue's going down the road, he found deceased lying in the road, dead, with a wound in his neck. The evidence further shows that the defendant fled when the officer went to arrest him; that the officer, in arresting the defendant while he was fleeing, drew a pistol on him, and carried him back to the house in which he lived; that while he was sitting at the door, waiting for his coat to be brought to him, and while he was in the custody of the officer, who had a pistol drawn, and was holding it in his hand, but was not threatening, nor pointing it towards, the defendant, a statement was made by the defendant to the officer to the effect that the deceased fell out of the wagon, and got his head hung in the wheel, and stuck a wagon-spoke in his neck. The defendant objected to the introduction of this testimony, and moved to exclude the same, on the ground that it was not voluntarily made by the defendant. The court overruled this motion, and the defendant duly excepted. The defendant's testimony tended to show that the deceased came to his death by accident; that he fell out of the wagon, and caught his head in the wheel, which had a broken spoke in it, and that this spoke stuck in the deceased's throat, which wound caused his death. The defendant offered to introduce in evidence a piece of wood, which was cut, and which purported to be similar to the broken spoke at the time the accident occurred. The state objected to the introduction in evidence of this piece of wood. The court sustained the objection, and the defendant excepted. The broken spoke had previously been cut out of the wheel, and introduced in evidence by the state, but the evidence was in conflict as to whether the spoke was, at the time of the injury, sharpened. One witness testified that he examined the spoke at the time it was cut out of the wheel, and called Col. Perdue's attention to it, and asked him to preserve it. The state objected to the latter part of this evidence, which objection the court sustained, and the defendant excepted. The court in its general charge, among other things, instructed the jury as follows: "Murder in the first and second degrees differ, in that in murder in the first degree there must be deliberation and premeditation; whereas, in murder in the second degree, these elements of deliberation and premeditation or formed design are absent or wanting; murder in the first degree being more atrocious than murder in the second degree, by reason of deliberation and premeditation." To the giving of this charge the defendant duly excepted. At the request of the solicitor the court gave the following written charges: (1) "The court charges the jury that if they believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant killed Jerre Perdue with a deadly weapon, it is presumed to be murder, and it devolves upon the defendant to reasonably satisfy the minds of the jury by evidence that he is guilty of a less crime, or acted in self-defense." (2) "The court further charges the jury that the expressions that, unless the evidence against the defendant should be such as to exclude to a moral certainty every hypothesis but that of his guilt of the offense imputed to him, they must find him not guilty. That the evidence of the state should be so convincing as to leave the mind of the jury to the conclusion that the accused cannot be guiltless are but strong expressions of that full measure of proof which the law exacts before it will sanction a conviction of a criminal offense, all of which only means that the jury must be convinced beyond a reasonable doubt." (3) "The court further charges the jury that the doubt which requires an acquittal must be actual and substantial, not mere possibility or speculation. It is not a mere possible doubt, because everything relating to human affairs and depending upon moral evidence is open to some possible or imaginary doubt." To the giving of each of these charges defendant separately excepted, and also separately excepted to the refusal of the court to give the following written charges asked by him: (1) "If the jury have no reasonable doubt that defendant took the life of deceased, and they are in doubt whether the act done was a deliberate, premeditated act, or the result of heat of blood, excited by an attack made or threatened by deceased, their finding must be for manslaughter in the first degree." (2) "The jury are instructed that manslaughter in the first degree is the voluntary depriving a human being of life." (3) "The plea of not guilty puts in issue every constituent of the crime of homicide, and, although the jury may not know or be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt how the death of the deceased was brought about, yet if they are not satisfied beyond such doubt that defendant did the act with premeditation, then they cannot convict him of either degree of murder." (4) "In criminal prosecution, the weight and sufficiency of the evidence are for the jury. The guilt of the accused should be fully proved. It is not enough that the weight of the evidence points to his guilt. It must do more. It must point to his guilt with such force and certainty as to exclude every reasonable supposition of innocence. Circumstances may point to a party accused, may create suspicion of his guilt, and there may be no explanation of them; still they may fall far short of producing that satisfied conviction which leaves on the mind no reasonable doubt. The burden is on the state to prove the guilt of the accused, and is not necessarily on the defendant to explain suspicions. Circumstances, suspicion, without more, is not enough. Conviction—conviction beyond a reasonable doubt—is what the law requires." (5) "The jury are instructed that, if there is an absence of all evidence of an inducing cause to guilt,—that is, a motive,—it affords a strong presumption of innocence." (6) "The jury are instructed that the supposition of guilt should flow naturally from the facts proven, and be consistent with them all. They should make an examination of all the facts of the case, free from bias or prejudice; and an examination of the case on both sides, in its aspects of favor or disfavor. They should avoid precipitancy or haste in drawing their inferences, and resist any tendency to jump at conclusions, without examining all the facts of the case, and allowing them every interpretation which they will reasonably admit. The process of coming to a conclusion is to be a natural one without the use of any mental violence in straining facts beyond their real significance. If any of the facts or circumstances established by the evidence be absolutely inconsistent with the supposition of guilt, the jury must acquit." (7) "The defendant cannot be convicted of the higher degree charged in the indictment unless the jury are convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant took the life of the deceased intentionally, and with premeditation and deliberation; and if the jury are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that deceased came to his death at the hands of defendant, and they are in doubt whether the death was occasioned by the deliberate act of defendant, or that it was done accidentally, they must acquit."

Gardner & Wiley, for appellants. Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

COLEMAN, J. The defendant was arraigned upon an indictment for murder, to which he pleaded, "Not guilty." Afterwards, but before the day fixed for his trial, he filed a plea to the effect that the special venire was drawn from 15 different boxes, and not "a single box," as required by law. The proper way to reach a venire not drawn in accordance with law is by a motion to quash the venire There was no ruling of the court upon this plea, and the record fails to show that the attention of the court was called to it. Pretermitting the fact that there is no ruling to which an exception was taken or legal question is reserved upon this point, (Ex parte Knight, 61 Ala. 486,) we are of opinion the venire was properly drawn. Section 4 of the act of 1886–87, p. 151, which provides that jurors shall be drawn from a box, was amended by the act of 1888–89, p. 430, so far as it applied to Pike county. By the latter act it is provided that the names of the persons from whom the jurors are to be drawn shall be placed in fifteen boxes,—one box for each precinct in the county. The fifteen boxes are here clearly substituted for the one box mentioned in the original act, and it must be so regarded when a jury is to be drawn for the trial of a capital case as provided in section 10 of the act. The record shows the special venire was drawn according to law.

The indictment charges that the defendant unlawfully and with malice aforethought killed Jerre Perdue, by stabbing him with a knife or other weapon, against the peace and dignity of the state of Alabama. Section 4383 of the Criminal Code provides: "When the offense may be committed by different means, or with different intents, such means or intents may be charged in the same count in the alternative." In the case of Horton v. State, 53 Ala. 493, it was declared that the purpose of the statute "is to dispense with a multiplicity of counts. Permitting one, by alternative averments of different offenses, to serve the purpose of several counts, it follows that each alternative averment must present an indictable offense, or the indictment is insufficient, as, at common law, the separate count, not presenting an indictable offense, would be bad." We think this to be a correct exposition of the statute, which permits the averments in the alternative, in one count, of the means by which an offense may be committed. Burdine v. State, 25 Ala. 60. The indictment must be examined, under the rules of the common law, as if it contained two counts; the first charging that the offense was committed by stabbing with a knife, and the second by stabbing with a weapon. The first count undoubtedly would be sufficient. Is there such a description of the means in the second as to make it a good count? At common law it was necessary to set forth in an indictment for murder the means by which the offense was committed; and, if by a weapon, it was necessary to say what the weapon was, or allege it to be unknown to the grand jury. 2 Bish. Crim. Proc. § 514; 1 East, P. C. 341. The form given in the Criminal Code retains a description of the means used, as by shooting him with a pistol or gun, or by striking him with an iron weight, etc. Section 4378 provides that when the means are unknown it may be so averred in the indictment. We hold that the alternative averment "or other weapon" insufficiently describes the means used, and rendered the indictment demurrable.

Instead of demurring to the indictment, the defendant pleaded "not guilty," and after conviction moved in arrest of judgment, upon the ground that the indictment was defective. We are of opinion that the particular defect complained of is not available on motion in arrest of judgment, but, to be available, advantage must be taken of the defect before trial and conviction. The authorities are uniform, and on principle must be correct, that averments in the alternative in one count are mere substitutes for so many different counts. The validity of such forms are maintainable in a great measure upon this principle. As was held in Burdine v. State, 25 Ala., supra, the defendant is as well informed when he is charged in the alternative, as if he had been charged in different counts; and it is upon this principle that each alternative averment must present an indictable offense. In the case of State v. Coleman, 5 Port. (Ala.) 40, it was stated that "it seems now well settled that, when there is a verdict and judgment on an indictment with good and bad counts, the judgment shall not be arrested or reversed, but that the finding of the jury will be upheld by the good counts; for it will be presumed that the court, and, of consequence, the jury, were controlled in their actions by a reference to the good counts." This ruling of the court has been uniformly approved. 1 Brick. Dig. p. 501, § 761; May v. State, 85 Ala. 16, 5 South. Rep. 14; Glenn v. State, 60 Ala. 104. It would seem to follow from these authorities that when a count is in the alternative, with some of the averments good and others charged in the alternative are bad, and no objection is taken to the indictment, a general verdict of guilty will be referred to the good averments, and a judgment on conviction will be sustained. Under any other rule no attorney of any skill would interpose a demurrer or other objection where an indictment was defective by reason of having bad counts or insufficient averments. He would simply take the chances of an acquittal, and, failing in this, would move in arrest of judgment, and thereby secure the discharge of the defendant or a new trial. To sustain a judgment of conviction there must be a good count in the indictment, or if there is but one count, containing charges in the alternative, there must be one or more good and sufficient averments. There may be some decisions not altogether consistent with the rule here laid down, but we think this the better practice, and in harmony with the principles of law declared in the cases cited supra.

There is no rule of law which authorizes the defendant to inquire of a person summoned as a juror, upon his voir dire, whether he was willing to accord to a negro as fair trial as he would to a white person. The statute lays down the rule for ascertaining the qualifications of jurors, and the cause of challenge. As was said in Bales v. State, 63 Ala. 38: "We know of no authority, and we perceive no reason, for any such speculative, inquisitorial practice, consuming needlessly the time of the court, and offensive to the persons subjected to it. The rule is ancient that neither party has a right to interrogate a juror before he is challenged." Hawes v. State, 88 Ala. 66, 7 South. Rep. 302; Lundy v. State, 91 Ala. 100, 9 South. Rep. 189.

The statement of the defendant in regard to the killing, and how it occurred, seems to have been wholly voluntary. The facts that he was under arrest, and that the officer who had him in charge was armed, alone are not sufficient to exclude such statements. There must be some improper influence, proceeding from the person to whom the confessions are made, or from some other person, or arising from the surrounding circumstances, to exclude the statement of a defendant upon the ground that they were not freely and voluntarily made. The mere fact of arrest, and his being guarded by an officer who is armed, is not sufficient. The statements of the defendant, if true and believed, moreover tended to exculpate, and not to criminate, him. Redd v. State, 69 Ala. 259; Spicer v. State, Id. 163; Meinaka v. State, 55 Ala. 47; Dodson v. State, 86 Ala. 63, 5 South. Rep. 485.

There was no error in sustaining an objection to the introduction of the piece of wood claimed to be similar in shape to the wagon-spoke as it was said to be when the homicide occurred. The wagon-spoke itself was in evidence, and, if its appearance from any cause differed from what it was at the time of the death of deceased, this was a matter of proof. To permit the introduction of another piece of wood, and evidence to show its similarity, merely presented a collateral, controverted issue, calculated to confuse the jury, and draw their minds from the main issue. The conversation between the witness and Col. Perdue in regard to the shape of the spoke was mere hearsay, and properly excluded.

The definition of murder in the first degree given by the court in its general charge is not, as an abstract proposition of law, absolutely correct. As we interpret the charge, it holds that whenever there is a formed design to take life, and life is taken in pursuance thereof, that will constitute the offense of murder in the first degree, without regard to other facts in the case. There may be a formed design to take life by one acting entirely in self-defense. If a party is without fault in provoking a difficulty, if there is no reasonable way open to him to retreat and escape, and if the assault upon him is of such a character as to endanger his life, or such as to impress a reasonable man that to save his own life it is necessary to strike, he may strike in self-defense, and with the formed design to take life, and if death to his assailant ensues, under such circumstances, it will be excusable homicide. No particular duration of time for the existence of formed design is necessary to raise the offense to murder when the formed design is the product of malice, premeditation, deliberation, and not engendered by passion suddenly aroused, upon sufficient provocation, or the necessities which justify a striking in self-defense. The law does not require one to retreat from his own castle. In law his castle is the wall, the limit of retreat. He may take life with a formed design here in resisting assault apparently dangerous to his life or limb, or in the necessary protection of his dwelling, and it may be excusable homicide, although, under like circumstances at another place, he would be bound to retreat, and, failing to do so, he would not be excusable. Lee v. State, 92 Ala. 19, 9 South. Rep. 407. An officer of the law having a writ to execute, having reasonable grounds to apprehend resistance, may, in some cases, arm himself, with a formed design to take life if it becomes necessary in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by law. In some cases a person is justified in taking life to prevent the commission of a felony, although done with a formed design. A person guilty of manslaughter may have instantaneously formed the design to take life, but to make it manslaughter there must be an absence of malice, deliberation, and premeditation. The design in such case is the result of sudden passion upon sufficient provocation, as distinguished from that formed design which results from malice, deliberation, premeditation. As was said in Harrington v. State, 83 Ala. 15, 16, 3 South. Rep. 425, and reaffirmed in Williams v. State, 83 Ala. 17, 3 South. Rep. 616: "In order to constitute manslaughter in the first degree there must be either a positive intention to kill, or an act of violence from which ordinarily, in the usual course of events, death or great bodily injury may be a consequence." It is difficult to conceive how there can be a "positive intention" to kill without forming the design to kill, and such "positive intention" necessarily precedes the killing. Whether the "design" or "positive intention" is the offspring of the elements which constitute murder in the first degree, that is, "willful, deliberate, malicious, and premeditated," or of the facts which constitute murder in the second degree, or of sudden passion upon sufficient provocation, or in self-defense, is always a question of fact for the jury under proper instructions of the court. This is the proper meaning and full extent of the law as declared in the leading case of Mitchell v. State, 60 Ala. 26, when correctly construed.

It is undoubtedly a canon of the law that, "if one man intentionally shoot another with a gun or other deadly weapon, and death ensues, the law implies or presumes malice," and, we may add, a "formed design" to take life, and it imposes upon the slayer the burden of rebutting this presumption by other proof, unless the evidence which proves the killing rebuts the presumption. Hadley v. State, 55 Ala. 37; Mitchell v. State, 60 Ala. 28; Gibson v. State, 89 Ala. 121, 8 South. Rep. 98. Whenever there are any facts testified to on a trial for murder, and which are necessary and are relied upon to sustain the charge of murder, and a jury could legally infer from the facts proving the offense that the defendant acted in self-defense, or the homicide was the result of sudden passion, engendered by sufficient provocation, and without malice, it is error to charge the jury as to the presumptions arising from the use of a deadly weapon, without accompanying such charge with the further statement, "unless the evidence which proves the killing rebuts the presumption." When the facts which prove the killing do not tend to rebut the presumption which the law raises from the use of a deadly weapon, then it becomes incumbent on the defendant by other evidence to rebut the presumption, and, failing to meet this burden, the presumptions of law are conclusive against him. Hadley v. State, supra. Although the jury may have discredited the account given by the defendant as to the means by which the deceased came to his death, and although they may have been satisfied that his statements in this respect were unreasonable, this would not deprive the defendant of the benefit of the evidence in the case, whether introduced by the state for the purpose of criminating him, or by himself as exculpatory evidence. It is upon the whole evidence the jury must make up their verdict. Smith v. State, 68 Ala. 430, 431. It would be improper, perhaps, for this court to make special reference to any particular portions of the evidence, but we think when the evidence sustaining the charge is wholly circumstantial, and the character of the wound causing death tends to show that it was done by cutting or stabbing, and the relations of the parties to each other existing as shown in this case, the safer rule is to charge on the law of manslaughter, and to let the jury say whether there are facts which would reduce the crime to a lower degree than murder. Hall v. State, 40 Ala. 706. There was no error in giving the second and third charges requested by the solicitor. Coleman v. State, 59 Ala. 52.

The first and seventh charges requested by the defendant exact too high a degree of conviction in the minds of the jury of the guilt of the defendant. The law does not require that the jury be satisfied beyond all doubt. The definition of manslaughter in the first degree contained in the second charge requested by the defendant is erroneous, and was properly refused. It omits the important qualifying clauses "unlawful" and "without malice." The statute does not attempt to define manslaughter, and we must look to the common law for its definition. Smith v. State, 68 Ala. 430; 3 Brick. Dig. p. 218, § 560. Premeditation is not necessarily a constituent of murder in the second degree. As was said in Ex parte Brown, 65 Ala. 447, 448: "If there be a killing without previous malice provoked by abusive language or other offense less than an immediate preceding assault, and the insulted party, maddened by the insult, immediately and without reflection, without time to reflect, and with no purpose formed or thought of, take life with a deadly weapon, this reduces the crime to murder in the second degree; but it reduces it no lower." The statute itself (Crim. Code, § 3727) declares that killing in a sudden rencounter by the use of a deadly weapon concealed, his adversary having none, under certain circumstances is murder in the second degree. There was no error in refusing this charge. Charge 5, requested by the defendant, is misleading, and asserts an incorrect proposition of law. It is always permissible for the state to prove facts which tend to show a motive for the commission of the offense. Such evidence assists in fixing the crime upon the proper person, and in some cases is strongly instrumental in determining the degree of the offense; but, if the offense be clearly made out by other evidence, it is not incumbent on the state to go further, and also prove a motive. A person who deliberately shoots and kills another with a deadly weapon, without excuse, whom he never heard of or saw before, may be guilty of murder, although there may be an entire absence of proof of motive. Under such a rule, as asserted in the charge requested, the very atrocity of the offense would be made to furnish a presumption of innocence. The fourth and sixth charges are misleading and argumentative in their character. Courts and text-writers often precede their conclusions by just reason and sound argument to sustain them, but, when copied into a charge to a jury, would confuse and mislead. This court never reverses for refusing to give a charge of this character. Tanner v. State, 92 Ala. 8, 9 South. Rep. 613. For the error pointed out in the first charge given at the request of the solicitor the case is reversed, and the cause remanded.

DEXTER v. OHLANDER.

(Supreme Court of Alabama. Jan. 27, 1892.)

CONTRACTS—REFORMATION—INJUNCTION—REFUNDING BOND.

1. Where the answer in a suit to reform a contract denies every allegation which tends to give the bill equity, the relief prayed for will be denied.

2. An interlocutory decree, dissolving an injunction to stay proceedings on a judgment at law, should order defendant to give a refunding bond, as required by Code 1886, § 3581, as a condition precedent to the enforcement of the judgment in case it should afterwards be perpetually enjoined.

Appeal from chancery court, Montgomery county; JOHN A. FOSTER, Chancellor.

Bill by R. P. Dexter against August Ohlander, praying that a certain receipt given by Dexter to Ohlander, and upon which suit had been brought and judgment rendered, should be reformed so as to speak the intention of the parties, and that an injunction should issue to enjoin the said Ohlander from all further proceedings for the enforcement of the judgment. A temporary injunction having been issued, defendant filed his answer, denying all the facts upon which the equity of the bill vested. He also moved to dissolve the injunction on the ground that the bill contained no equity, and because the answer denied all its material allegations. From a decree dissolving the said injunction, plaintiff appeals. Corrected and affirmed.

W. S. Thorington and L. C. Smith, for appellant. Watts & Son and E. P. Morrisette, for appellee.

STONE, C. J. It requires very great particularity of averment and very clear proof to authorize the reformation of a written contract. 1 Story, Eq. § 152; Campbell v. Hatchett, 55 Ala. 548; Turner v. Kelly, 70 Ala. 85. The answer is a full denial of every averment of the bill which tends to give it equity, and the chancellor did not err in dissolving the injunction. The suit, however, being instituted to enjoin and "stay proceedings on a judgment at law," the decree is imperfect, in that it did not order and "require of the defendant a refunding bond," according to the provisions of section 3531 of the Code of 1886.[1] The decretal order of the chancellor is here corrected and amended, so as to require the defendant, Ohlander, to give a refunding bond with two sufficient sureties in double the amount of the sum enjoined, as a condition precedent to the enforcement of said judgment; the bond to be payable and approved as required by the statute. Let the costs of this appeal be paid equally by appellant and appellee. Corrected and affirmed.

[1] This section provides that when an interlocutory decree is made dissolving an injunction to stay proceedings on a judgment at law, the chancellor must require of the defendant a refunding bond, conditioned for the repayment of the money collected on the said judgment if the same should afterwards be perpetually enjoined.

HURD v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—REASONABLE DOUBT.

On a trial for larceny it is error for the court to refuse to charge, at the request of defendant, that "if the jury, on considering all of the testimony, have a reasonable doubt about defendant's guilt, arising out of any part of the evidence, they should find him not guilty."

Appeal from circuit court, Pike county; JOHN P. HUBBARD, Judge.

Indictment of Gus Hurd for petit larceny. Verdict and judgment of conviction. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

The defendant in this case was indicted, tried, and convicted for petit larceny, for stealing four silver dollars. The testimony for the state tended to show that the defendant took from one John Hobdy, without his consent, while he held it out in his hand, the money alleged to have been stolen, and that he refused to give up the same, although requested to do so. The testimony for the defendant tended to prove an alibi, and that he did not see the said John Hobdy on the night the money was alleged to have been taken. The defendant requested the court to give the following written charges, and duly excepted to the refusal to give each of them: (1) "If the jury believe the evidence for the defendant, they should find him not guilty." (2) "All of the witnesses stand as persons of good character and credible, unless impeached, or have their characters shown to be bad by proof." (3) "If the jury, upon considering all of the testimony, have a reasonable doubt about defendant's guilt, arising out of any part of the evidence, they should find him not guilty." (4) "If the jury believe that the prosecutor has worn falsely in some matters, this should tend to weaken his testimony."

Robert L. Harmon, for appellant. Wm. J. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

STONE, C. J. It is certainly the duty of the jury in pronouncing on issues submitted to them, to consider and weigh all the testimony in the case. This does not mean that all or any of it shall be believed. The law exacts no such rule as that. It must be considered, and given such weight as the manner of giving it in, its intrinsic nature, and the other testimony in the cause, entitle it to. This much, and nothing more. This the jury must and will do, as the only way of performing their highest, sworn duty of rendering a true verdict according to the evidence. And the jury would be derelict if a segregated part of the testimony were made the basis of a verdict, without at least considering what influence should be accorded to other testimony in the cause. A finding of the jury based on any other principles would not come up to what the word "verdict" implies,—veredictum, a true saying. It would not be the truth. And this rule applies in all issues submitted for decision, without reference to the parties, their pursuits, calling, race, or condition in life; for all have equal rights before the law. It is for these reasons that we have uniformly held that charges should not, as a rule, select a portion of the testimony, or a part only of several material controverted propositions, and seek to make such selected part, without reference to other testimony, and without reference to other qualifying inquiries of fact, decisive of the entire controversy. Charges thus framed have a tendency to mislead, and to give undue prominence to a part of the testimony, or to a selected phase of the inquiry. But we have not held, and could not hold, that when there is an entire failure of proof as to any separable, necessary ingredient of a public offense or private claim, a charge to that effect may not be asked, and should not be given when asked. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 111 et seq., §§ 83–85, 93. So, charges so framed as to be likely to mislead or confuse the ordinary mind should never be given. Carney v. State, 79 Ala. 14; Street v. State, 67 Ala. 87. We think charge 3, as asked, asserts a clear legal proposition, is free from ambiguity and tendency to mislead, and that it ought to have been given. Reversed and remanded.

Ex parte RILEY.

MASTER AND SERVANT—REFUSAL TO PERFORM SERVICES—CRIMINAL LIABILITY.

A father made a written contract for the hire of his minor son to another person for ten months, and for as much longer as might be necessary to work out any advances that might be made the boy during that time. No money was actually paid the father in consideration of the contract, but the understanding was that he should be credited on a past indebtedness. If the boy failed to render the service, the father was to serve in his stead. After the boy had worked six months, and some advances had been made him with the father's approval, he refused to work any longer, and the employer demanded that the father take his place. This the father refused to do because he was cultivating a crop. The father, however, made efforts to compel the boy to return to work, and other efforts to effect the payment of the amount due. Held, that as there was nothing to show that the father entered into the contract with intent to injure or defraud the employer, or that his refusal to perform was with like intent, and without just cause, no conviction could be had, under Criminal Code, § 3812, which declares that if any person, with intent to injure or defraud his employer, enters into a written contract for the performance of any act, and thereby obtains money or property from the employer, and with like intent, and without just cause, refuses to perform the said act, or to return the money or property, he must be punished as for theft.

Petition by Enoch Riley for writs of habeas corpus and certiorari. Granted.

Hargrove & Vandegraaff, for petitioner.

WALKER, J. The petitioner was committed on a preliminary examination before a justice of the peace. When he was brought before the judge of probate upon habeas corpus, the prosecutor and all the witnesses who had testified on the preliminary examination were present and were examined. After such examination the probate judge made an order remanding the petitioner. He was entitled to be discharged from custody if, on such examination, it appeared that no offense had been committed, or that there was no probable cause for charging him therewith. Crim. Code, § 4781; Ex parte Champion, 52 Ala. 311; Ex parte Mahone, 30 Ala. 49. The petitioner is held for an alleged violation of section 3812 of the Criminal Code, which is in the following words: "Any person who, with intent to injure or defraud his employer, enters into a contract in writing for the performance of any act or service, and thereby obtains money or other personal property from such employer, and with like intent, and without just cause, and without refunding such money, or paying for such property, refuses to perform such act or service, must, on conviction, be punished as if he had stolen it." The effect of this statute is to provide for the punishment criminally of a certain class of frauds which are perpetuated by means of promises not meant to be kept. These frauds closely resemble those perpetrated by means of false pretenses or tokens, but are not punishable under the statute on that subject, as a false pretense is a false representation relating to some existing or past fact, and does not include a promise of something to be done in the future. Colly v. State, 55 Ala. 85. The ingredients of this statutory offense are: (1) A contract in writing by the accused for the performance of any act or service; (2) an intent on the part of the accused when he entered into the contract to injure or defraud his employer; (3) the obtaining by the accused of money or other personal property from such employer by means of such contract, entered into with such intent; and (4) the refusal by the accused with like intent, and without just cause, and without refunding such money or paying for such property, to perform such act or service. This statute by no means provides that a person who has entered into a written contract for the performance of services, under which he has obtained money or other personal property, is punishable as if he had stolen such money or other personal property, upon his refusal to perform the contract, without refunding the money or paying for the property. A mere breach of a contract is not by the statute made a crime. The criminal feature of the transaction is wanting unless the accused entered into the contract with intent to injure or defraud his employer, and unless his refusal to perform was with like intent and without just cause. That there was an intent to injure or defraud the employer, both when the contract was entered into and when the accused refused performance, are facts which must be shown by the evidence. As the intent is the design, purpose, resolve, or determination in the mind of the accused, it can rarely be proved by direct evidence, but must be ascertained by means of inferences from the facts and circumstances developed by the proof. Carlisle v. State, 76 Ala. 75; Mack v. State, 63 Ala. 138. In the absence, however, of evidence from which inferences may be drawn, the jury are not justified in indulging in mere unsupported conjectures, speculations, or suspicions as to intentions which were not disclosed by any visible or tangible act, expression, or circumstance. Green v. State, 68 Ala. 539.

In the present case the petitioner entered into a written contract for the hire of his son, Ben Riley, a boy about 16 years of age, to T. J. Countess, for the term of 10 months, to begin on the 16th day of February, 1891, and to continue "until all lost time and all advances made him by said Countess during his term of service is worked out or paid in full by said Enoch Riley." It was provided that, if the boy should from any cause fail to render the service contracted for, the petitioner should serve in his stead. The contract embodied an acknowledgment by the petitioner of his receipt of $60 paid and advanced to him by Countess. There was the further stipulation "that, in case the said Enoch should pay in cash all advances and for all time lost during said term of service, this contract to hold good only until the 16th day of December, 1891, but, if not paid in full, to hold good forever, until paid." No money was actually paid to the petitioner when the contract was made, but the understanding was that he should be credited with the sum of $60 upon an indebtedness due from him to a brother of T. J. Countess. Ben Riley was reluctant to enter the employment of Mr. Countess under the contract made by his father; but, on Countess' refusing to consent that he be hired to another person for wages which were to be paid to Countess, the boy did later enter the service of the latter, pursuant to the contract, and remained in such service from about the 16th day of February, 1891, until the following August. During this time Countess made some advances to the boy with the knowledge and approval of the father. The boy abandoned the service without the consent and against the directions of his father, the petitioner. Countess demanded that the father should himself come and work out the amount due under the contract. When this demand was made, the petitioner did not comply with it, as he had to attend to a crop which he was making on land which he had rented for that year, but he made several efforts to effect satisfactory arrangements for the payment of what was due to Mr. Countess. There is not a single circumstance in the case to indicate that the petitioner entered into the contract with any fraudulent purpose. In the first place, the arrangement was, in fact, primarily for the payment of a past indebtedness. The petitioner realized nothing on it for himself. The only advances thereafter made were to the boy while he was working for Countess. Furthermore, all the evidence indicates that the petitioner did everything in his power to enable Countess to get the benefit of the boy's work. There is not a particle of proof that he advised, encouraged, consented to, or connived at the boy's abandonment of the service. There is absolutely nothing shown against the petitioner beyond his failure to serve in the boy's stead, when the latter, against the petitioner's commands, abandoned the employment of Countess after working for him six months. This failure, without more, was a mere breach of contract. All the circumstances point to the conclusion that the petitioner entered into the contract with the honest intention of having his son perform the service stipulated for. The making of the contract was not a trick, contrivance, or device for getting money or other personal property. There is nothing in the evidence to suggest that at the time the contract was entered into the petitioner intended thereby to injure or defraud Countess. This essential element of the charge against him is wholly unsupported by proof. The court cannot permit the lack of evidence on a material point to be supplied from the imagination of the jury. It is not the duty of the court to submit to the jury a criminal accusation, in the absence of evidence tending to support it. The evidence in this case did not tend to show that there was any probable cause to charge the petitioner with the commission of any criminal offense, and he should have been discharged. The writs of certiorari and habeas corpus will be awarded, unless the petitioner, when informed of this ruling, shall elect to renew his application before a court or judge of original jurisdiction. Certiorari and habeas corpus nisi ordered.

STANDARD LIFE & ACC. INS. CO. v. JONES.

ACCIDENT INSURANCE—ACTION ON POLICY—PLEADING—DUE CARE—INTOXICATION.

1. Where, in a suit on an accident policy providing that the assured, a railroad switchman, should at all times use due care for his personal safety, the insurer pleads that the assured failed to use due care, but contributed directly to his injury by getting off a moving engine with his back towards the direction in which it was going, a replication which does not deny that the assured failed to use due care, but only alleges that he was insured as a switchman, and that the injury occurred while in the discharge of his customary duties, is insufficient in assuming that the policy would cover all such injuries, whether the assured was in the exercise of due care or not.

2. An instruction that it was the duty of the assured to exercise, in such a case, a greater degree of care in getting off a moving engine at night than was necessary in the day-time, was argumentative, and tended to mislead the jury.

3. The fact that a policy insures a person with reference to a particular employment, and provides that the insurer shall be exempt from liability for injuries resulting from a violation of the rules of the employment, does not impose on the insurer the duty of informing the assured as to the existence of such rules, but the assured is bound to inform himself.

4. Such an exemption must be specially pleaded by the insurer before it can be made available as a defense; and, if it be not pleaded, the court may exclude any evidence offered to establish the rule which it is claimed has been violated.

5. Where suit is brought on an accident policy which exempts the insurer from liability if the assured is injured while intoxicated, or in consequence of his having been under the influence of intoxicating liquor, an instruction that if at the time he was injured the assured was "under the influence" of liquor, whether intoxicated or not, the insurer would not be liable, was either misleading, in the absence of a further instruction that the phrase "under the influence" of liquor meant a condition amounting to intoxication, or affirmatively bad, in authorizing a verdict for the insurer notwithstanding the jury may have found that the assured was not intoxicated.

6. A provision in an accident policy exempting the insurer from liability for any injury which might happen to the assured while intoxicated, or in consequence of his having been under the influence of intoxicating liquor, is sufficient to exclude liability for all injuries suffered while the assured was intoxicated, whether the intoxication contributed to the injury or not.

Appeal from city court of Montgomery; THOMAS M. ARRINGTON, Judge.

Action by Jane Jones against the Standard Life & Accident Insurance Company upon a policy of insurance. The defendant requested the following charges, which were refused: (1) "If the jury believe from the evidence that, at the time of the injury and death of Albert, or Elbert, Hutchinson, said Hutchinson was under the influence of whisky, whether intoxicated or not, then the plaintiff cannot recover." (2) "It was the duty of said Hutchinson, the person insured by the policy sued on, to exercise a greater degree of care in getting off a moving engine at night-time than is necessary by day." (3) "The policy of insurance, which is the subject of this suit, does not cover any accident or injury to said Albert, or Elbert, Hutchinson, happening while he was under the influence of liquor." (4) "If the jury believe from the evidence that, at the time of the accident and injury to Albert Hutchinson, he was in any way under the influence of liquor, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action, even if they should find that his being under the influence of liquor had nothing to do with causing the death of said Hutchinson." (5) "If the jury believe the evidence, they must find for the defendant." There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Falkner & Jones, for appellant. Sayre & Pearson, for appellee.

MCCLELLAN, J. This action is prosecuted by Jane Jones, appellee here, upon a contract inuring to her benefit, whereby the defendant, appellant here, insured Albert Hutchinson against death by accident. The complaint alleged the contract, in substance, and that the insured came to his death, while the policy was in force, "by external, violent, and accidental means." The policy was issued upon a written application of Hutchinson, in which is made this statement: "My habits of life are correct and temperate, and I understand and agree that the policy to be issued on this application will not cover any accidental injury which may happen to me either while under the influence of narcotics or intoxicating drinks, or in consequence of having been under the influence of either;" and in the policy itself is incorporated the following stipulation: "This insurance does not cover * * * death or disablement happening to the insured while intoxicated, or in consequence of his having been under the influence of any narcotic or any intoxicating drink whatsoever." It is also an expressed condition of the policy that the insured should at all times use due care and diligence for his personal safety and protection. Upon these stipulations, the defendant interposed several special pleas, to the effect (1) that at the time of the alleged injury the insured was intoxicated; (2) that he was under the influence of whisky; (3) that said injury happened in consequence of the insured having been under the influence of whisky; and (4) that at the time in question the insured "failed to use due care and diligence for his personal safety and protection, but contributed directly and proximately to his own injury and death by getting off an engine in motion in the night-time, with his back towards the direction in which said engine was going, which was an unsafe and dangerous way of alighting from said engine." Plaintiff's demurrers to these pleas having been severally overruled, she joined issue on the first three of the series, and replied to the fourth, as follows: "To the fourth plea plaintiff says that the insured was a railroad switchman, was insured as such, and met the accident which caused his death while in the discharge of his customary duties as such switchman." The action of the trial court in overruling defendant's demurrer to this replication constitutes the subject-matter of the first assignment of error.

1. In our opinion, this action was erroneous. The stipulation set up by this fourth plea was in the nature of an exception in favor of the insurer. It was not necessary that the complaint should have negatived the facts which brought the defendant within the exception. Their existence was a matter of affirmative defense, and the onus, both of averment and proof of them, rested on the defendant. Freeman v. Insurance Co., 144 Mass. 572, 12 N. E. Rep. 372; Cronkhite v. Insurance Co., 75 Wis. 116, 43 N. W. Rep. 731. This onus, so far as averment is concerned, was discharged by the interposition of the plea in question, which alleges facts involving the absence of that care and caution on the part of the insured which were, by the terms of the policy, a condition to defendant's liability. The replication to this plea does not deny that the insured failed to use due care and caution for his own safety and protection; it affirms merely that he was insured as a switchman, and that the accident which caused his death occurred while he was in the discharge of his customary duties as such. The replication assumes that the policy covers all injuries received while the insured was in the performance of the duties of his occupation, wholly regardless of the manner of such performance, as being within the exercise of due care, or in a careless and negligent manner. It assumes, in effect, that there could be but one possible mode in which the insured's customary duties might be performed, and that the adoption of that mode by him involved, of necessity, the observance of the care required by the policy for his personal safety. It proceeds on the idea that if the act being done by the assured at the time of the injury was within the scope of his employment, and one which it was his duty to perform, it is immaterial whether he used care to avoid the dangers incident to it, or was wholly wanting in respect of the exercise of diligence and prudence in conservation of his personal safety. The theory of the replication is manifestly unsound. The policy has a broad field of operation, without extending its application to injuries received in consequence of negligence on the part of the insured. The duties of a switchman, even when performed with the utmost care, are attended with many perils. The employment in itself, and without reference to additional dangers resulting from the negligence of the employe, is a hazardous one. The policy sued on was intended to cover the inherent danger of the occupation,—dangers which the exercise of due care could not eliminate from it, and not dangers which arise, not from the occupation itself, but from the negligent manner in which its duties are discharged. And while, as alleged in the replication, Hutchinson was insured as a switchman, and was injured while discharging the customary duties of that position, it may be that he was negligent in the manner of his performance of those duties; that that negligence was the cause of, or contributed to, his injury: and, of consequence, that, in admitting the truth of the replication, every fact laid in the plea might also be true, and, if true, afford a full answer to the complaint. This test demonstrates the insufficiency of the replication, and the error of the trial court in overruling the demurrer thereto. Tuttle v. Insurance Co., 134 Mass. 175, and authorities there cited; Bon v. Assurance Co., 56 Iowa, 664, 10 N. W. Rep. 225; Freeman v. Insurance Co., 144 Mass. 572, 12 N. E. Rep. 372; Tooley v. Assurance Co., 3 Biss. 399. The case of Association v. Jackson, 114 Ill. 533, 2 N. E. Rep. 414, is not opposed to the conclusion we have reached. No question was made in that case as to the manner in which the insured discharged the duty in the performance of which he was killed. The contention was that he voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger, or, in other words, that he should not have attempted the act in question at all. The court held, on the facts, that the duty was embraced in his employment with reference to which the policy was issued, and that, therefore, the policy covered any injury received while attempting to discharge it, for aught that appeared in the case, in a careful and prudent manner. It is of no consequence in this connection that the complaint alleged due care and diligence on the part of the insured. Notwithstanding this, the action of the trial court forced the defendant to take issue on the replication, and thus to try the case upon inquiries as to facts which were not really controverted by the defendant, and upon which its rights in the premises did not depend. It is to be observed with respect to this replication that it does not allege that the insured was killed while in the discharge of a duty incident to his employment, in the customary mode of performing that duty, as counsel seem to insist, but only that he was performing a customary duty of the service; no account being taken and nothing alleged in respect of the manner in which the attempt was being made. Whether, therefore, had the averment been that he was discharging the duty in the mode and manner customary and usual in the service, the replication would have been good, is a question not presented for our consideration; but see Warden v. Railroad Co., (Ala.) 10 South. Rep. 276.

2. It is the well-settled doctrine of this court that, in actions by employes against railroad companies sounding in damages for personal injuries, the plaintiff is not chargeable with negligence upon the mere fact that his conduct at the time of the infliction of the injury, and contributing to it, was violative of a rule of the employer, unless knowledge of the rule is brought home to him. Railway Co. v. Propst, 83 Ala. 527, 3 South. Rep. 764; Railway Co. v. Davis, 92 Ala. 300, 9 South. Rep. 252; Railroad Co. v. Hawkins, 92 Ala. 241, 9 South. Rep. 271. This doctrine is, in part, at least, rested on the consideration that it is the duty of the employer to inform the employe of the rules adopted for his guidance in the service he has undertaken to perform, and, in the nature of things, it would be unjust and wrong to hold the servant responsible for a violation of a rule of which he knew nothing, and his ignorance of which is due to the dereliction of the master. This rule does not obtain between passengers and common carriers, because, in a measure, of the absence of this element of duty, and probably, also, because of the impracticability of instructing each passenger as to the rules made for his observance while the relation exists; and the passenger must therefore acquaint himself with these rules, and comply with them, or fail therein at his own peril. This principle, in our opinion, obtains between the insurer and the insured in a case like this, where the insurance is effected with reference to a particular employment, and the policy contains a stipulation that it shall not cover any injury resulting from the violation of the rules of the employer. The insurer cannot know the rules which the employer has adopted for the government of the employe,—it may be, indeed, that the insurer does not know who the employer is,—and there can be no duty resting on the insurance company to instruct the insured as to the rules of the service in which he is engaged. On the other hand, it is not only entirely practicable for the employe to inform himself in this respect, but it is, certainly, as between him and the insurer, his duty to do so. He undertakes to conform to rules made for his protection, the terms of which the insurer is not and cannot be advised of, but which he can and should acquaint himself with, as a condition to availing himself of the benefits of the policy; and he must be held to have discharged this duty, and to have informed himself of their existence and terms, so that when he is injured, in consequence of conduct violative of an existing rule applicable to him and the service he is rendering, it is wholly immaterial whether, in point of fact, he knew of the rule or not. Tooley v. Assurance Co., 4 Bigelow, Ins. Cas. 34, 3 Biss. 399. But this exception to the insurer's liability was also a matter of affirmative defense, and, under the principle stated and the authorities cited above, should have been specially pleaded before it could be availed of by the defendant. In the absence of such plea, it was not error for the court to exclude the evidence offered to establish the existence of the rule which it was proposed to show had been violated by the insured in such sort as that the violation contributed to his death.

The action of the trial court in refusing certain charges requested by the defendant depends for justification upon a construction of the application for insurance and the policy, in respect of the exception to liability growing out of the use of intoxicants by the insured. It will be noted that there is this difference in the language used in the application and policy, respectively, in this connection. In the former the exception is rested on the fact of the insured being under the influence of intoxicating drinks, while in the latter it is based on the fact of the insured being intoxicated. In common parlance, and hence as addressed to a jury, these two expressions mean different conditions. To be under the influence of whisky is not necessarily to be intoxicated. One may well be said to be under the influence of strong drink when he is to any extent affected by it,—when he feels it,—and this condition may result from potations so small as not to impair any mental or physical faculty, and when the passions are not visibly excited, nor the judgment or any physical function impaired. This is very far short of "intoxication," which is the synonym of "inebriety," "drunkenness,"—implying or evidenced by undue and abnormal excitation of the passions or feelings, or the impairment of the capacity to think and act correctly and efficiently. If the terms are to be accorded these definitions, as employed in the application and policy, respectively, it is manifest there is a repugnance between the two, and in such case the stipulation in the body of the policy would, we apprehend, control, as against the undertaking set forth in the application, since the policy is the later expression of the minds of the parties, and, indeed, in a sense, the only expression of those matters upon which their minds have finally met, except in so far as the statements of the application are made part of the policy by reference. But the phrase, "under the influence of intoxicating drinks," as used in policies of this character and in this connection, has a legal significance, differing from the popular one, and implying such influence as in reality amounts to intoxication. In a well-considered case it was said by the supreme court of New York that "to be 'under the influence of intoxicating liquors,' within the meaning of this policy, the insured must have drunk enough to disturb the action of the physical or mental faculties, so that they are no longer in their natural or normal condition." When, therefore, the defendant imposed upon persons insured by it the condition that it would not be liable when death or injury should happen while the insured was under the influence of liquor, the intention manifestly was to require the insured to limit its use in such a degree as that he retained full control over his faculties of mind and body. While he did so, the company was reasonably secure against the insured exposing himself unnecessarily to dangers from his own acts or the acts of others, produced "by his own irritating or offensive conduct or language," or, we may add, as applicable to the present case, produced by his failure or inability to conserve his own safety consequent upon the influence exerted by the liquor to the impairment of his faculties. Shader v. Assurance Co., 5 Bigelow, Ins. Cas. 331, 5 Thomp. & C. 643. It is clear that giving to the words, "under the influence of intoxicating drinks," the meaning accorded them by the case quoted from, and which we think is eminently sound, they import nothing more or less than intoxication, and hence that there is no inconsistency, from the point of view of the law, between the application and the policy itself, in this respect; they each and both rest the exception in question upon the intoxication of the insured at the time of the accident. It follows that charges 1, 3, and 4 asked by the defendant were properly refused. They are either misleading, in that they rest defendant's immunity from liability on the mere fact that the insured was under the influence of liquor, which the jury would probably have understood to mean a condition not amounting to inebriety, or affirmatively bad, in that they would have authorized a verdict for defendant under this exception, notwithstanding the jury might have found that the insured was not intoxicated at the time the injury was sustained.

We entertain no doubt but that it was competent for the parties, by appropriate stipulations, to take out of the field of inquiry and controversy, in the event a claim should be advanced for an injury alleged to be within the policy, the question whether the intoxication of the insured did in fact contribute to the injury, and to provide that the policy should not cover any injury sustained while the insured was in that condition, irrespective of any agency the fact of intoxication may or may not have had in the production of the result complained of. There can be no doubt, either, that this policy contains such a provision. It stipulates, as we have seen, that it shall not cover any accidental injury which may happen to the insured while (not in consequence of being) intoxicated; and, serving to emphasize the purpose to exclude injuries suffered while the insured was under the influence of drink, whether that fact contributed to the result or not, it is provided further, in the same sentence, that the exclusion shall apply also to injuries suffered in consequence of the insured having previously been under the influence of liquor, though not so at the time of the accident,—a causal connection between the condition of the insured and the catastrophe being necessary in the latter case, and not essential in the former, to bring the injury within this exception to the insurer's liability. Shader v. Assurance Co., 5 Bigelow, Ins. Cas. 335. The charges referred to above were not, therefore, open to the objection made to them, on the theory that the intoxication which would bring the case within the exception must have contributed to the injury. Charge 2, requested by the defendant, is argumentative, and tends to confuse or mislead the jury, if, indeed, it is not erroneous. The court properly refused to give it. There was conflicting evidence, or conflicting inferences deducible from the evidence, on every issue of fact presented on the trial, and the court's action in refusing the general affirmative charge requested by the defendant was clearly right. Reversed and remanded.

MOSES v. McCLAIN et al.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—INSUFFICIENT EVIDENCE.

In a bill for specific enforcement of a contract to sell land, plaintiff testified positively that he notified defendant of his acceptance within the time specified in the contract, which defendant denied with equal emphasis. One witness confirmed plaintiff partially, while the evidence of three witnesses tended to confirm defendant. Held, that the chancellor properly found that plaintiff failed to prove his case.

Appeal from chancery court, Colbert county; THOMAS COBBS, Chancellor.

Action for specific performance by Abram J. Moses against John W. McClain and another. Bill dismissed. Complainant appeals. Affirmed.

Thos. R. Roulhac, for appellant. J. B. Moore and R. C. Brickell, for appellees.

STONE, C. J. This is a bill by Moses for the specific enforcement of a purchase of a tract of land alleged to have been agreed upon between McClain and himself. McClain signed a writing dated October 21, 1886, by which he proposed to sell the land to Moses for $8,000; $3,000 to be paid in cash, and the remaining $5,000 to be paid in two equal installments, due in one and two years, with interest from the time possession was delivered. The paper writing is what is called an "option." It recites a consideration of one dollar, and gives to Moses the privilege or option, for two hours, in which to determine whether or not he would purchase the land on the terms proposed. The bill alleges that within the two hours Moses elected to accept the offer, and make it a purchase, and that he so informed McClain before the time expired. McClain refused to consummate the trade, and in his answer denies that Moses notified him within the two hours of his acceptance of the offer. The burden of proving acceptance was thus cast on Moses. It is not disputed that Moses did notify McClain that he accepted the offer. The dispute and controversy are whether this notice was given within the two hours. Moses testified positively that it was, while McClain testified with equal emphasis that it was after the two hours had expired. J. S. Whittemore confirms Moses to some extent, while two witnesses (Parshall and Stegar) tend to confirm McClain. Dill also does to some extent. The chancellor found, as a fact, "that the acceptance of the terms of the instrument was not made within the specified time." It was long the rule in this court that, when a chancellor made a finding of fact, we would not reverse such finding unless clearly convinced that he erred. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 400, § 549; Moon v. Crowder, 72 Ala. 79. That rule was changed by statute. Code 1886, § 675. We do not think that the proof of acceptance of McClain's offer within the two hours allowed is sufficient. Affirmed.

CITY ORDINANCES—LICENSE TAX.

1. Acts 1886-87, p. 247, giving the city council of Mobile power to assess a license tax upon all persons carrying on "any business, trade, or profession" within the city, authorizes the assessment of a tax for retailing cigars, although the cigars are sold in connection with a grocery business, and the grocer has taken out a general license for such business.

2. A provision of the said act that no tax therein authorized should exceed 75 per cent. of the tax imposed by the last ordinance upon the subject must be construed as meaning only that the general tax imposed upon any business should not exceed 75 per cent. of the tax previously imposed upon that business, and not as prohibiting the assessment of a tax upon business which had previously been carried on free from taxation.

Appeal from city court of Mobile.

Craft & Co., having been fined for violation of an ordinance of the city of Mobile, appealed to the city court, where they obtained judgment in their favor. The city appeals to this court. Reversed.

Pillans, Torrey & Hanaw, for appellant.
Hannis Taylor, for appellees.

COLEMAN, J. Craft & Co. were fined by the mayor of Mobile for violating a city ordinance which imposed a license tax upon persons engaged in the business of retailing cigars. The case was appealed to the city court, and there the court overruled the demurrers interposed to the pleas of the defendant. The case was then tried without the intervention of a jury, under section 2743 of the Code. The court found the facts to be as set up in the pleas of the defendant, and entered judgment accordingly.

The city ordinance fixing and establishing the rate of license tax for the year commencing March 15, 1890, "imposed and assessed a special license tax of two 50/100 dollars upon all persons trading in or carrying on the business of selling cigars by retail in hotels, bar-rooms, drug-stores, coffee saloons, restaurants, and all places of business other than tobacco stores." Section 40 of an act to incorporate the port of Mobile, approved December 10, 1886, (Acts 1886-87, p. 247,) provides "that the said general council shall, besides the tax heretofore authorized, have the authority to assess and collect from all persons or corporations trading or carrying on any business, trade, or profession, by an agent or otherwise, within the limits of said corporation, a license tax, which shall be fixed and declared each year by an ordinance of said corporation; and the license so laid shall be issued, and the amount imposed shall be collected, as may be provided by ordinance of said corporation. * * * Said general council may also, by ordinance, impose such fines and penalties, within the limitations named in this act, as they may deem advisable, for the doing of any business, or the carrying on of any trade, or the practicing of any profession, by any party who shall fail to take out such license, as may be imposed by said general council, under the authority conferred by said general act: provided, also, that the license tax hereby authorized shall not exceed seventy-five per centum of the amounts fixed for licenses by the last ordinance on the subject enacted by the mayor, aldermen, and common council of the city of Mobile."

The facts set up in the pleas of the defendant, the demurrers to which were overruled, and which were found to be true by the court, are that after the passage of the ordinance fixing the license tax for the retail of cigars at $2.50 an ordinance was passed which "imposed and assessed a general license upon every pursuit, business, profession, or trade not specially provided for in a foregoing enumeration, and defendants paid to said city the sum of fifty-six 25/100 dollars for a general license tax as wholesale and retail grocers, and that the sale of cigars by them was an element of their general trade as wholesale and retail grocers, and not as a separate pursuit or business, and that the sum of fifty-six 25/100 dollars paid for their general license was a sum equal to seventy-five per centum of the amount fixed for license by the last ordinance on this subject, and that under said last ordinance no special tax was imposed upon the selling of cigars, whether such business was carried on as a separate business or as an element in the business of wholesale and retail grocers, and that the said special license tax for retailing cigars is a new subject of special license tax, not embraced in the last ordinance upon the subject of licenses."

As we construe the pleas of the defendant, they are intended to raise the following questions: Whether or not section 40, supra, authorizes the city to impose a special tax for retailing cigars when they are sold as an element of the business of wholesale and retail grocers, for the doing of which grocers' business a general license has been paid for and taken out. There can be no reasonable question of the authority of the common council to pass such an ordinance. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 91; Van Hook v. City of Selma, 70 Ala. 363. The business of a grocer does not necessarily include a dealer in tobacco. Section 40 of the act of incorporation, supra, authorizes the general council to assess and collect a license tax "from all persons or corporations trading or carrying on any business, trade, or profession." When the city ordinance imposed a special tax of $2.50 as a license tax to retail cigars, and by a succeeding ordinance a general license tax of a much larger sum upon wholesale and retail grocers, the license to engage in the latter business did not relieve the party from the special tax for retailing cigars, while the business of the two may be combined, as also a dry goods merchant, the keeper of a restaurant, or a liquor dealer may combine with his business that of retailing cigars; but the fact that no license tax was required of the dry goods merchant, or a different license tax was required of the liquor dealer or restaurant keeper, would not relieve the party of the special license tax upon retailing cigars. The provision that the license tax shall not exceed 75 per centum of the amounts fixed for licenses by the last ordinance on the subject, when applied to the present case, is that the general license tax imposed upon grocers shall not exceed 75 per centum of the license tax imposed upon that business by the last ordinance; but the construction insisted upon, that this provision prohibits the common council from imposing a license tax upon business which had not by a former ordinance been taxed, would be too narrow. Section 40, supra, confers authority to impose a license tax upon any business. Whether the business had been carried on previously without being subjected to a license tax, or whether the business was entirely new, and for the first time engaged in and carried on, could make no difference in the application of the ordinance. The purpose and scope of this provision was simply to provide that the license tax thereafter, as to all business which had been subjected to a license tax by a previous ordinance, should not exceed 75 per centum of the amount fixed by the last ordinance, but as to any business which had not been taxed the general council has authority to assess and collect a license tax. To hold otherwise would restrict the power of the general council to assess and collect a license tax only upon such business as was being carried on when the act was passed, while all new enterprises would be relieved of this burden. We hold the city court erred in overruling the demurrers to defendant's pleas, and in the final judgment rendered, upon the facts. Reversed and remanded.

HODGES et al. v. WINSTON et al., (two cases.)

VENDOR AND VENDEE—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS—NOTICE.

1. Where the only evidence offered to prove notice on the part of a mortgagee that the separate funds of a wife had been used in the purchase of the mortgaged premises, and that she was therefore entitled to reimbursement, was certain remarks alleged to have been made by the mortgagee importing a knowledge merely of the marital rights of the wife, and the mortgagee testified positively that she had no such notice, and the wife herself testified that she had no recollection of anything being said to the mortgagee with reference to the use of her money in that way, the mortgagee must be deemed a bona fide purchaser.

2. Where a person, after purchasing land, resells a part to the vendor upon an independent consideration, the transaction having no relation whatever to the purchaser's rights as vendor in the original sale, the possession of the vendor of the part resold is not notice to a mortgagee of any lien upon the balance.

Appeal from chancery court, Marshall county; S. K. MCSPADDEN, Chancellor.

On the 30th day of January, 1886, John G. Winston, Sr., filed his bill against Edward Winston, his son, seeking the foreclosure of an alleged vendor's lien on certain lands therein described. Decree pro confesso was taken against said Edward Winston on May 10, 1886, and on the 18th of May appellants Hodges and Matheney were, by leave of the court, permitted to come in as parties, and they filed their answers at once, averring that they were judgment creditors with a lien against the land of Edward Winston, and denying on information and belief the existence of complainant's lien. On the 25th of November, 1889, complainant was allowed to amend his bill by making the appellant Martha Sloan a party defendant. She thereupon filed her answer, alleging that she held a mortgage on said lands executed by Edward Winston and wife to secure a loan made to them contemporaneously with the execution of the mortgage, claiming to be a bona fide purchaser without notice, and denying on information and belief the existence of complainant's lien. On the 24th day of March, 1886, Nancy A. Winston, wife of the said Edward Winston, filed her bill in the same court by her next friend, A. R. Hooper, against her husband, John G. Winston, Sr., Martha Sloan, Jesse Sloan, Jasper M. Matheney, James W. Hodges, A. G. Henry, and F. M. Kirby, alleging that moneys belonging to her statutory estate to the amount of $1,980.34 had been used by her husband in the purchase of said lands from John G. Winston, Sr. and praying that they be declared subject to a trust in her favor, and sold for the payment of said $1,980.34. The bill was subsequently dismissed as to Henry and Kirby. Decrees pro confesso were taken against Jesse Sloan, Edward Winston, and John G. Winston, Sr. On the 25th of April, 1886, defendants Hodges and Matheney filed a joint and several answer, averring that they were judgment creditors of said Edward Winston, and had acquired a lien without notice of said Nancy's alleged claim upon said lands, and denying on information and belief that any such claim existed. They prayed that their answers might be taken and held for cross-bills, and the land sold to satisfy their liens. They also embodied in their answers several grounds of demurrer. On the 28th of April, 1886, defendant Martha Sloan filed her answer, averring that she was a mortgage creditor, claiming to be a bona fide purchaser without notice, and denying on information and belief that complainant Nancy A. Winston had any claim whatever in said lands. She prayed that her answer might be taken and held for a cross-bill, and her mortgage foreclosed. She embodied in her answer several grounds of demurrer. No notice of the demurrers of the defendants is made, either in the decree of reference or the final decree; and the failure of the court to pass upon the demurrers, among other things, is assigned as error. To these several cross-bills, John G. Winston, Sr., Edward Winston, and Nancy A. Winston filed answers, denying that Hodges, Matheney, and Mrs. Sloan were creditors and purchasers without notice, and averring that at the time their several liens attached they had notice of the existence of said Nancy's interest in said lands.

Brown & Street, for appellants. Watts & Son, for appellees.

MCCLELLAN, J. These cases were tried as one in the court below, and are so submitted, and will be considered here. "The rule as to proof of bona fide purchase is that the party pleading it must first make satisfactory proof of purchase and payment. This is affirmative, defensive matter in the nature of confession and avoidance, and the burden of proving it rests on him who asserts it. Ei incumbit probatio qui dicit. This done, he need not go further, and prove he made such purchase and payment without notice. The burden here shifts, and, if it be desired to avoid the effect of such purchase and payment, it must be met by counter-proof that before the payment the purchaser had actual or constructive notice of the equity or lien asserted, or of some fact or circumstance sufficient to put him on inquiry, which, if followed up, would discover the equity or incumbrance. Craft v. Russell, 67 Ala. 9, which collects the authorities; Taylor v. Association, 68 Ala. 229; Creswell v. Jones, Id. 420." Barton v. Barton, 75 Ala. 400, 402. In the case at bar, Mrs. Sloan sets up that she became a mortgagee of the land in controversy for value, and without notice of the claim now advanced by John G. Winston, Sr., for purchase money alleged to be due from Edward Winston, the mortgagor, who held the legal title, and also without notice of the claim now advanced of Nancy Winston, the wife of said Edward, which proceeds on the theory that the land was in part paid for with funds belonging to her statutory separate estate, and is sought to be worked out through a declaration of trust in her favor for reimbursement. That Mrs. Sloan did lend Edward Winston the money for which a mortgage was taken, and that the mortgage was duly executed by said Edward and his wife upon this land to secure its repayment, are facts not controverted in the case. The protection she invokes as a bona fide purchaser is sought to be defeated by John G. Winston, Sr., in respect of his claim for unpaid purchase money, by proof of possession by him of a part of the land—a certain 40-acre parcel—embraced in the mortgage at the time of its execution, which possession, he insists, was constructive notice to her of his lien upon the whole tract for the balance of the price at which he sold to Edward, the mortgagor. This proposition will be examined further on. By Mrs. Nancy Winston, Mrs. Sloan's alleged rights as a bona fide purchaser are attempted to be defeated by evidence going to show that, at the time of advancing the money and taking the mortgage, the mortgagee had actual notice that funds belonging to Mrs. Winston's separate estate were used in the purchase of the land by Edward from his father, John G., Sr., and hence of her claim to reimbursement out of the land. On this issue the burden, as we have seen, was with Mrs. Winston. It was upon her to prove to the satisfaction of the chancellor, by such preponderance of evidence as should also suffice on appeal to satisfy this court, that at or before the time of the transaction Mrs. Sloan either knew of the existence of her claim, or had notice of such facts as would have put her on inquiry, which, if properly prosecuted, would have led to a knowledge of the claim now made by Mrs. Winston. In our opinion, this has not been done. The evidence fails to satisfy us that Mrs. Sloan, when she made the loan, and took the mortgage to secure its repayment, had any knowledge or notice of the rights brought forward in Mrs. Winston's bill, seeking to have a resulting trust declared in her favor to the amount of her money used in the purchase. The evidence offered to prove such notice goes only to show alleged remarks made by Mrs. Sloan at the time of the transaction with reference to the execution of the mortgage by Mrs. Winston, as well as her husband; which remarks, making allowance for the improbability of their being accurately reproduced by the witnesses, may well be held to import no more than a knowledge of Mrs. Winston's marital rights in the lands of her husband. On the other hand, Mrs. Sloan testifies positively and explicitly, and without evasion or equivocation, that she had no notice or knowledge whatever of any individual right, claim, or interest of Mrs. Winston; and Mrs. Winston herself swears that she has no recollection whatever of anything being said, at any time, by or in the presence of Mrs. Sloan, with reference to the fact that her money had been used by her husband in part payment for the land. On this state of the testimony we do not think Mrs. Winston has discharged the burden which rested upon her to affirmatively show that Mrs. Sloan had notice of her claim upon the land for reimbursement; and we accordingly hold that, as to that claim, Mrs. Sloan is a bona fide purchaser without notice.

Was Mrs. Sloan chargeable with notice of John G. Winston's lien for purchase money by reason of his possession at the time the mortgage was executed of a 40-acre subdivision of the land? We think not. The uncontroverted facts in that connection are that Edward Winston, some time after he had purchased the lands from his father, and received an absolute conveyance of them in fee, sold back to John G. Winston, Sr., the 40 acres in question, and put him in possession. This transaction was entirely separate and distinct from, and without any reference whatever to, the original sale of the whole tract by John G. to Edward Winston. No fact or circumstance involved in it would have been other than it was had no lien for purchase money existed in favor of

John G. Winston, Sr., under the sale to his son. The consideration agreed to be paid, and actually paid, by John G., Sr., for these 40 acres, did not consist in the satisfaction pro tanto of his claim for unpaid purchase money on the original transaction, but of the satisfaction pro tanto of a mercantile account which had been contracted by Edward with his father after the sale by the latter to the former. The claim or title of John G., Sr., to the 40-acre parcel was not in any degree rested on his claim for unpaid purchase money, or referable to it, but grew out of an entirely independent transaction, no circumstance of which pointed to or indicated the previously existing claim for unpaid purchase money. Nay, more; the fullest inquiry into and completest discovery of all the facts involved in this latter transaction, so far from affording notice of the first one, and Winston's lien under it, would have tended to assure the purchaser from Edward that his father had no lien for purchase money on any of the land, since it would have been reasonable to suppose that, had such been the fact, the parcel sold back to him would have been paid for by satisfaction in part of the debt secured by the lien, and not upon another and distinct consideration. Be this as it may, however, it is certainly the law that possession is notice to a subsequent purchaser only of the right or title in or by which the possession is held; and the possession of the 40-acre tract by John G. Winston, Sr., in this case, being under a repurchase on independent consideration from Edward, the transaction bearing no relation whatever to the purchaser's rights as vendor in the original sale, was notice to Mrs. Sloan that the father had bought the land from the son, paid him for it, and held it as such purchaser. There is, manifestly, nothing in the fullest knowledge of these facts which would tend to excite inquiry as to this purchaser's rights respecting other lands, both the absolute legal title and possession of which were in Edward Winston, the mortgagor. Fassett v. Smith, 23 N. Y. 252, 258, 259; Suiter v. Turner, 10 Iowa, 517, 524, 525; Leach v. Ansbacher, 55 Pa. St. 85. The fact of John G. Winston, Sr.'s, possession of this parcel was notice to Mrs. Sloan that he had bought and paid for it, and she took the mortgage subject to any rights which these facts vested in him, as to that particular tract; but it was no notice to her of his lien for purchase money on the other land covered by the mortgage, since these facts, so far from putting her on inquiry which would have discovered the lien, were, inferentially at least, inconsistent with its existence.

The rulings and decree of the chancellor in all other respects have been carefully considered. We concur with his conclusions on exceptions to the register's report, and in holding that Hodges and Matthews had notice of the claims of John G. Winston, Sr., and Mrs. Nancy Winston, before their rights accrued, and hence that their claims are secondary to those of the respective complainants. That Mrs. Winston is entitled to reimbursement out of the land, and that John G. Winston, Sr., has a valid vendor's lien upon it, except as against Mrs. Sloan, we do not doubt. Mrs. Sloan, however, must be first paid, and in failing to so decree the chancellor erred. The decree is reversed and the cause remanded.

FEAGIN et al. v. JONES.

EJECTMENT—TITLE TO SUPPORT—TAX-TITLE.

1. In an action of ejectment by one claiming under a tax-title against another in possession under a similar title, the fact that defendant failed to duly acquire title will not aid or strengthen the position of the plaintiff, who is similarly situated.

2. Under Code 1886, §§ 566–568, empowering the probate court to order the sale of lands to pay taxes only when the collector makes and subscribes an oath, at the end of entries in his docket in reference to unpaid taxes, that he has been unable to find sufficient personal property out of which to collect the same, a decree by a probate judge for such sale, and a sale thereunder, based upon a tax collector's docket in which the required affidavit is wanting, are nullities.

Appeal from circuit court, Covington county; JOHN P. HUBBARD, Judge.

Action of ejectment by S. A. Jones against Feagin, Kendall & Co. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

The plaintiff founded his right to the possession of the property in controversy upon his being the assignee of the certificate of purchase, made by the tax collector at the tax-sale of said property in said county. To show the foundation of his claim the plaintiff offered in evidence the tax collector's docket showing the delinquent-tax causes of said county, and also the order of the probate judge for the sale of the lands contained therein for the payment of taxes. The defendants objected to the introduction of said tax-book in evidence on the ground that it did not have the oath of the tax collector as required by law, showing that the parties against whom the taxes were assessed had no personal property out of which the taxes could be made. The court overruled this objection, and allowed the book in evidence, and the defendants duly excepted. The lands were assessed against the Mobile & Girard Railroad Company. According to the order of the probate judge, the lands were regularly sold at a tax-sale on May 25, 1886, and one N. H. Hare became the purchaser of the lands in controversy, and he received the tax collector's certificate of purchase, which he afterwards assigned to the plaintiff in this suit. The plaintiff then offered in evidence the tax-deed made to him by the probate judge for said lands upon presentation of the certificate of purchase, which had been transferred to him by said Hare. The defendants objected to the introduction of said deed in evidence, on the ground that the plaintiff had not shown that said lands were liable to taxation, and that no valid tax-sale of said lands had been shown to have been made. The court overruled this objection, and the defendants duly excepted. The defendants claim title to the lands in controversy under the purchase from one J. A. Prestwood, who, it was alleged, purchased said lands at the tax-sale. The defendants offered in evidence the tax-book, and the decree of the probate court showing the sale of said lands to said Prestwood, and also offered in evidence the tax-deed to said Prestwood to said lands. It was shown by said deed that the same lands were purchased by Prestwood at a continuation of the tax-sale from May 25, 1886, to June 8, 1886. Upon the introduction of all the evidence the court, at the request of the plaintiff in writing, instructed the jury that, "if they believed the evidence, they must find for the plaintiff." To this charge the defendants duly excepted. There were verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendants bring this appeal, and assign the rulings of the lower court upon the evidence, and the giving of the general charge for the plaintiff, as error.

Stallworth & Burnett and W. D. Brown, for appellants. John Gamble, for appellee.

WALKER, J. The defendants reserved exceptions to the action of the trial court in overruling their objections to the introduction in evidence of the book containing the tax collector's entry of the land sued for as assessed for taxation, and the decree of the probate court for the sale of the same, and to the introduction of the deed to said land made by the probate judge to the plaintiff. The defendants did not estop themselves from making or insisting upon these objections by setting up title in themselves to the land in dispute under another alleged tax-sale, based upon the same proceedings. The plaintiff and the defendants respectively claimed under separate and distinct sales and deeds made at different dates. The two claims were adverse and inconsistent. There was nothing in the respective positions of the parties to preclude a denial by either of the validity of the other's title. The effort of each party was to show that it had acquired the title of the Mobile & Girard Railroad Company to the land in dispute, and perhaps neither could have required the other to go beyond that common source of title, (Lang v. Wilkinson, 57 Ala. 259; Pollard v. Cocke, 19 Ala. 188;) but, as the parties sought to connect themselves with that title by different means, and there was no relation between them to raise an estoppel in favor of the one as against the other, the burden was on the plaintiff as the actor in the suit to sustain his contention by proving title in himself. His right to recovery depends upon the strength of his own title; and if he is not able to show that he has duly acquired whatever title to the land there was in the railroad company, his position is not strengthened by the fact that the defendants also fail in a similar attempt to show that they have acquired that title. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 325, §§ 38, 39. The positions of the parties are similar to that of two persons claiming the same land under different and conflicting deeds from the same grantor. If both of the deeds are invalid as conveyances, the holder of one of them would not be aided thereby in an attempt to recover possession of the land from the person claiming under the other defective muniment. If the decree of the probate court relied on in this case was void, it does not help the plaintiff that the defendants also claim title through another deed based upon a sale under that same void proceeding.

The defendants objected to the proof introduced to show the alleged tax-sale because of the absence of the required showing that there was no personal property out of which the taxes could have been collected. The probate court is empowered to order the sale of lands for the payment of taxes assessed thereon or against the owner thereof only when the tax collector shall report to the court that he was unable to find sufficient personal property therefor; and, at the end of the entries in reference to unpaid taxes on real estate required to be made in the docket, which it is the duty of the tax collector to deliver to the judge of probate, he must make and subscribe an oath showing that he has made diligent search for personal property of the parties against whom the taxes are respectively assessed, and that, after diligent search, he has been unable to find sufficient personal property out of which to collect the taxes, or any part thereof. Code 1886, §§ 566–568. It is plain from the language of the statute that the inability to find personal property from which to collect the taxes, and the affidavit of the tax collector on his docket to this effect, are jurisdictional facts, which are essential to the validity of any decree for the sale of land for the non-payment of taxes; and, under the established construction of the statute, the docket required to be returned by the tax collector must affirmatively show these jurisdictional facts. If it does not, the decree and sale thereunder are nullities. Wartensleben v. Haithcock, 80 Ala. 565, 1 South. Rep. 38; Fleming v. McGee, 81 Ala. 409, 1 South. Rep. 106; Carlisle v. Watts, 78 Ala. 486. In the tax collector's docket, introduced in this case as the foundation of the plaintiff's title, there was not the required affidavit; nor, indeed, any showing at all that a search had been made for personal property, or that a sufficiency thereof could not be found. The court erred in overruling the defendants' objections to the admission of the docket and of the tax-deed. They were mere nullities, the jurisdiction of the probate court not being shown, and they furnished no evidence of title in the plaintiff. The affirmative charge to find for the plaintiff cannot be supported on the proof of his prior possession of the land sued for, as the proof on that subject was conflicting; a witness for the defendant stating that the plaintiff had never been in possession of the land. The charge should have been refused. There was no ruling of the court involving the question as to whether, on the aspect of the evidence most favorable to the plaintiff, such prior possession of the land by him was shown as is requisite to the maintenance of ejectment. It is not plain that the proof on this subject was sufficient to support a finding for the plaintiff against these defendants on prior possession alone. Alexander v. Savage, 90 Ala. 383, 8 South. Rep. 93; Rivers v. Thompson, 46 Ala. 335; Childress v. Calloway, 76 Ala. 128.

SAINT et al. v. WHEELER & WILSON MANUF'G CO.

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—DISCHARGE OF SURETY—BOND FOR PERFORMANCE OF DUTIES OF EMPLOYMENT.

1. A bond by a principal and sureties, conditioned on the faithful performance by the principal of his duties under a contract of employment, is a contract of suretyship, and not of guaranty; and a request by one surety to withdraw his name, made after delivery of the bond and after notice by the employer to the employe to enter upon the discharge of his duties, which request is not assented to by the employer, will not operate as a release of the surety making the request, or of the others, who became sureties on condition that he should join with them.

2. Sureties for the faithful performance of a written contract of employment of their principal as collector are not relieved from liability by a subsequent parol agreement between the employe and the employer's agent, imposing additional duties, not hindering the employe's performance of the duties originally undertaken, nor by a reduction of his compensation,—there being no new consideration therefor, nor evidence of the employer's approval; nor by allowing him to retain his compensation out of collections,—the contract being silent as to the manner of payment.

3. Such sureties are not discharged by mere indulgence by the employer, or by his forbearance in enforcing the liability of the employe for an embezzlement, or by an agreement, made without their knowledge, without consideration, whereby the employer agrees to wait for payment. But where, after knowledge of such dishonesty, the employer's agent, having supervision of the employe and of all matters embraced in the contract, which contains a provision for its determination at pleasure, continues the employment, without notice to the sureties, and commits other funds to the employe, which are likewise converted, such sureties are not liable for the employe's default during the subsequent service.

Appeal from circuit court, Colbert county; H. C. SPEAKE, Judge.

Action by the Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Company against R. F. Saint, as principal, and C. M. Wright, A. J. Crosthwait, and J. R. Spragins, sureties, upon a bond for the performance of a contract of employment by defendant Saint with plaintiff. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

The contract between these parties, of which the other defendants guarantied the faithful performance, is divided into seven sections, which are as follows: "Section 1. The party of the first part [Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Company] agree to employ the party of the second part as a collector. Sec. 2. The party of the second part is to engage in no other business, but to devote his time exclusively to collecting claims given him from time to time by the party of the first part. Sec. 3. The party of the second part agrees to remit to the party of the first part, on Saturday of each week, the full amount of all collections made by him. Sec. 4. All notes, leases, and cash received by the party of the second part on account of the party of the first part shall be held and rendered strictly as the property of the said party of the first part, subject to their order and under their control. Sec. 5. In any matters where the duties of the party of the second part are not herein clearly defined, he shall obey any and all directions or instructions in relation thereto which shall from time to time be given him by the party of the first part. Sec. 6. The party of the second part is to receive as full compensation for his services under this agreement a salary of $50.00 per month, and necessary traveling expenses; said salary and expenses to commence when the party of the second part reaches his territory and work commences,—said party of the second part to furnish his own horse, and to go wherever ordered. All loss of time to be deducted. Sec. 7. This agreement may be terminated at the option of either party, in which case the party of the second part agrees to deliver to the party of the first part, at their office in Nashville, all of their property remaining in his possession or under his control, unless otherwise ordered by them in writing." The bond on which this suit was instituted was written on the back of this contract. All the defendants filed the plea of general issue, in short, by consent, on the 11th day of March, 1889. The other sureties on the bond filed separate pleas, 22 in number, including those to which demurrers were sustained. A. J. Crosthwait separately pleaded that, before Saint had entered on the discharge of his duties as collector, he notified plaintiff to take his name off of the bond,—that he would not become a surety on the bond; that the plaintiff made no objection, and he was thereby released from any obligation on the bond. The other sureties on the bond filed a separate plea, that they signed the bond with the understanding that Crosthwait was also jointly liable with them on the bond, and that a release of Crosthwait from the bond, without their consent, released them. The sureties filed a number of other pleas, on which they based a valid defense to this suit: (1) They pleaded that the contract under which Saint worked for the plaintiff was changed after the bond was executed by them, without their knowledge or consent; (2) that plaintiff and Saint so changed the original contract, after the bond was executed, as to constitute Saint a salesman, and required him to sell sewing-machines; (3) that plaintiff required Saint to sell and discount the notes which were put in his hands for collection under the contract; (4) that different duties were imposed on Saint by plaintiff than was stipulated for in the contract, and which increased defendants' risk; (5) that plaintiff knowingly suffered Saint to retain in his possession money which it knew he had collected; (6) that plaintiff and Saint changed that clause of the contract requiring him to remit to the plaintiff at the end of each week the full amount of all collections, and permitted Saint to retain from his weekly collections his salary and traveling expenses; (7) that plaintiff, knowing Saint had defaulted for a large amount of its money, gave him other notes and accounts for collection, and suffered him to collect other money, without notifying the sureties; (8) that the contract was changed, and Saint required to work at $9 per week instead of $50 per month; (9) that, after the plaintiff discovered that Saint had used money collected under the contract that ought to have been paid at the time, it agreed to extend the time of payment; (10) that the plaintiff was a foreign corporation, and had not complied with the laws of this state by filing its declarations with the secretary of state. The plaintiff filed demurrers to some of the pleas; but it is not deemed necessary to set out the grounds of the several demurrers, nor to specify the pleas to which they were interposed, since the pleas on which issue was joined, as stated above, sufficiently present the questions discussed in the opinion.

The evidence introduced on the trial of the case established the following facts. That the above contract was executed by the plaintiff and R. F. Saint; and the bond was executed by the defendants, Wright, Crosthwait, Hall, and Spragins, as sureties on the bond. That Saint received from the plaintiff a large list of notes and accounts for collection. That he collected a considerable amount of money for it, paid over a portion of it, and retained or embezzled the balance of it. After the bond was executed, Saint carried it or sent it to Nashville, to the plaintiff. That when he (Saint) went to Nashville to begin work under the contract, and before he had reached that place or had received any notes or accounts from the plaintiff, Crosthwait notified plaintiff to take his name off the bond, which was a revocation of his guaranty, and, plaintiff not having refused, he regarded himself released. Plaintiff did not decline to release him, but simply asked his reasons; and after that plaintiff gave Saint the notes and accounts to collect. That when Saint went to Nashville to take charge of the work assigned to him under the contract, the original contract was changed, and Saint was permitted to retain from his weekly collections all his expenses and a salary of $50 per month, instead of remitting to plaintiff the full amount of all collections. That in February, 1888, the plaintiff, through W. W. Walls, made another change in the contract, whereby Saint was to get only $9 per week instead of $50 per month for his services as collector, and that Saint worked under this last contract until he quit, but, on a settlement he made with the company through Walls, he was allowed $50 per month. That Saint was required to sell and discount notes and accounts which had been put in his hands for collection under the contract. That he was required to take up the sewing-machines, and sell them again for such prices as he could get for them, and that he did take up some machines for the plaintiff, but did not know how many, and sold some of them under instructions from the plaintiff. That Wright, Hall, and Spragins knew nothing about Crosthwait revoking his guaranty on the bond. That they signed it with the understanding and agreement that Crosthwait was jointly liable with them. It was also proved that in February, 1888, the plaintiff, through its agent, had notice of Saint's defalcation, and that after such notice said company continued Saint in its employment. The defendants knew nothing about the changes made in the contract between Saint and the plaintiff after the bond was signed. They never consented to any of the changes. The plaintiff never notified either of them of Saint's dishonest act in appropriating the plaintiff's money. Defendants then offered to prove by each of the defendants that they had not consented to a change in the contract, and had no knowledge of such change. To this ruling of the court, defendants reserved an exception. Defendants then offered to prove that neither the plaintiff nor Saint had obtained license to sell sewing-machines. The court, on objection made by the plaintiff, refused to permit the defendants to introduce that evidence. Defendants introduced as evidence a number of letters written by plaintiff to the defendant R. F. Saint, in which they authorize him to discount notes and to use his discretion. All the letters show that Saint was required to do other work than that required under the written contract, all of which increased the risk which the sureties had incurred.

In addition to the other charges requested by the defendant in writing were the following: (5) "If the jury believe from the evidence that in February, 1888, Saint had only used fifty or sixty dollars of the plaintiff's money, and that Saint notified the plaintiff that he was short that amount, then it was the duty of the plaintiff to notify the sureties, Wright, Crosthwait, Hall, and Spragins, and, if the plaintiff failed to notify them of such fact, they cannot recover against these sureties for any defalcation of Saint after that time." (7) "If the jury believe from the evidence that A. J. Crosthwait was released from the bond as guaranty after the other sureties, Wright, Crosthwait, Hall, and Spragins, had signed it, then I charge you that such release was a material change in the contract. And if you further believe from the evidence that such change was made without the knowledge and consent of Wright, Hall, and Spragin, and Crosthwait, then the plaintiff cannot recover against them." (9) "If the jury believe from the evidence that in February, 1888, the plaintiff had notice that defendant Saint had collected money for it which he had converted to his own use, then it was the duty of the plaintiff to notify Wright, Hall, Crosthwait, and Spragins, his securities, and if it failed to notify them the plaintiff cannot recover against said sureties for the money collected and appropriated to his own use after the time." The defendants separately excepted to the court's refusal to give the several charges requested by them, and also excepted to the court's giving the several charges requested by the plaintiff, but it is deemed unnecessary to copy these charges in full. There were verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendants appeal.

Kirk & Almon, for appellants. Roulhac & Natham, for appellee.

McCLELLAN, J. The contract sued is not a guaranty, but one of suretyship. Crosthwait and the other defendants, who undertake that Saint shall faithfully perform his contract with the company, are sureties of Saint, and not guarantors. The distinction between the two classes of undertakings is often shadowy, and often not observed by judges and text-writers; but that there is a substantive distinction, involving not infrequently important consequences, is, of course, not to be doubted. It seems to lie in this: that when the sponsors for another assume a primary and direct liability, whether conditional or not, in the sense of being immediate or postponed till some subsequent occurrence, to the creditor, they are sureties; but when this responsibility is secondary, and collateral to that of the principal, they are guarantors. Or, as otherwise stated, if they undertake to pay money or do any other act in the event their principal fails therein, they are sureties; but, if they assume the performance only in the event the principal is unable to perform, they are guarantors. Or, yet another and more concise statement, a surety is one who undertakes to pay if the debtor do not; a guarantor, if the debtor cannot. The first is sponsor absolutely and directly for the principal's acts; the latter, only for the principal's ability to do the act. "The one is the insurer of the debt; the other, an insurer of the solvency of the debtor." This is the essential distinction. There is another, going as well to its form. The contract of suretyship is the joint and several contract of the principal and surety. "The contract of the guarantor is his own separate undertaking, in which the principal does not join." Indeed, it has been held, pretermitting all other considerations, that no contract joined in by the debtor and another can be one of guaranty on the part of the latter, (McMillan v. Bank, 32 Ind. 11, 10 Amer. Law Reg., N. S., 435, and notes,) though we apprehend that a case might be put, involving only secondary liability on the sponsors, though the undertaking be signed also by the principal. However that may be, it is certain that in most cases the joint execution of a contract by the principal and another operates to exclude the idea of a guaranty, and that in all cases such fact is an index pointing to suretyship. See Brandt, Sur. §§ 1, 2; 9 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 68; Marberger v. Pott, 16 Pa. St. 9; Allen v. Hubert, 49 Pa. St. 259; Reigart v. White, 52 Pa. St. 438; Kramph's Ex'r v. Hatz's Ex'r, Id. 525; Birdsall v. Heacock, 18 Amer. Law Reg. (N. S.) 751, and notes; Hartman v. Bank, 103 Pa. St. 581; Courtis v. Dennis, 7 Metc. (Mass.) 510; Kearnes v. Montgomery, 4 W. Va. 29; Walker v. Forbes, 25 Ala. 139.

Applying these principles to the bond sued on, the conclusion must be that it is not a guaranty, but a contract of suretyship, on the part of Crosthwaite, Wright, Hall, and Spragins. It is not their separate undertaking, but the principal also executes it. While they employ the word "guaranty," they directly obligate themselves, along with Saint to pay—absolutely and wholly, irrespective of Saint's solvency or insolvency—all damages which may result to the obligee from his default. Not only so, but they expressly stipulate that the company need not exhaust its remedies against Saint before proceeding against them. It is, in other words, and in short, a primary undertaking on their part—not secondary and collateral—to pay to the company in the event of Saint's failure, and not an undertaking to pay only in the event of Saint's default and inability to pay. They are sureties of Saint, and not his guarantors; and their rights depend upon the law applicable to the former relation, and not upon the law controlling the latter. One of the important differences in the operation, effect, and discharge of the two contracts finds illustration in this case. The undertaking of guaranty, in a case like this, is primarily an offer, and does not become a binding obligation until it is accepted and notice of acceptance has been given to the guarantor. Till this has been done, it cannot be said that there has been that meeting of the minds of the parties which is essential to all contracts. Machine Co. v. Richards, 115 U. S. 524, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 178; Walker v. Forbes, 25 Ala. 139. Being thus a mere offer, it may be recalled, as of course, at any time before notice of acceptance. Indeed, there are authorities which hold that even after acceptance, and notice thereof, the guarantor may revoke it by notice that he will be no longer bound, unless he has received a continuing or independent consideration which he does not renounce, or unless the guarantee has acted upon it in such way as that revocation would be inequitable and to his detriment; and, in cases of continuing guaranty, the effect of such revocation is to confine the guarantor's liability to past transactions. 2 Pars. Cont. 30; Allan v. Kenning, 9 Bing. 618; Offord v. Davies, 12 C. B. (N. S.) 748; Tischler v. Hofheimer, (Va.) 4 S. E. Rep. 370. All this is otherwise with respect to the contract of a surety. He is bound originally, in all respects, upon the same footing as the principal. His is not an offer depending for efficacy upon acceptance, but an absolute contract, depending for efficacy upon complete execution; and its execution is completed by delivery. From that moment his liability continues until discharged in accordance with stipulations of the instrument, or by some unauthorized act or omission of the obligee violative of his rights under the instrument, or by a valid release. Nothing that he can do outside of the letter of the bond can free him from the duties and liabilities it imposes. He cannot assert the right to revoke unless the right is therein nominated. As was said by the English court, if he desired to have the right to terminate his suretyship on notice, he should have so specified in his contract. Calvert v. Gordon, 8 Man. & R. 124; Brandt, Sur. §§ 113, 114.

The evidence here as to the release of Crosthwaite tends to show no more than this: That after the bond had been delivered to plaintiff, and after its officers had advised Saint that they were ready for him to enter on the discharge of his duties under the contract secured by the bond, he (Crosthwait) requested plaintiff to take his name off the paper. No assent to this request is shown, but only an inquiry on the part of plaintiff as to Crosthwaite's reasons for desiring to be released. It would seem that the court itself should have decided that these facts did not release Crosthwaite, but the question appears to have been submitted to the jury. If this submission, or any of the instructions accompanying it, was erroneous, no injury resulted to defendants, since the jury determined the point against the alleged release, as the court should have done, assuming it to have been a question of law. On the other hand, if it were a question for the jury, it is to be presumed they were properly instructed as to the rules of law which should guide them to its solution, as no exceptions were reserved in that regard. The exceptions which were reserved on this part of the case are to charges given, and to the refusal to give charges asked by defendants declaratory of the effect which the discharge of Crosthwaite, if the jury found he had been discharged, would have upon the liability of his co-sureties. As the jury found expressly that he had not been discharged, these exceptions present mere abstractions not necessary to be decided. We have no doubt, however, but that the law in this respect was correctly declared by the court to be that the release of Crosthwaite operated to release the other sureties only to the extent of his aliquot share of the liability. Brandt, Sur. § 383; Burge, Sur. 386; Klingensmith v. Klingensmith, 31 Pa. St. 460; Ex parte Gifford, 6 Ves. 805; Shock v. Miller, 10 Pa. St. 401; Currier v. Baker, 51 N. H. 613; Governor v. Jemison, 47 Ala. 390.

The sureties of Saint insisted on the trial below that they were discharged from all liability on the bond by reason of certain alleged changes made in the original contract between their principal and the company, by the parties thereto, after they became sureties for its faithful performance, and without their knowledge, consent, or ratification. It is not pretended that the paper writing evidencing this contract was ever altered in any respect, but that its terms were changed by subsequent parol agreements, in the following respects, among others to be presently considered: First, that under this contract, which constituted Saint a collector only for the company, he was instructed and required to take up and resell sewing-machines when he found the notes for the purchase money of the same, and which were in his hands for collection, could not be collected; and, second, that he was authorized to discount or sell the notes placed in his hands for collection, when the same could not be otherwise realized upon. Nothing is claimed in this action on account of Saint's misconduct in respect of any property thus taken up or resold, or of any note discounted by him, or with respect to the proceeds of any such sale or discount. If these duties were such as usually devolved upon a collector for a sewing-machine company,—as to which there is no evidence in this record, and no necessity for any, under the present complaint,—it may be that Saint's sureties would be responsible for their faithful performance on his part to the same extent as for money collected on notes in his hands. Bank v. Ziegler, 49 Mich. 157.[1] However that may be, the fact that they were imposed upon him, assuming they were not covered by his contract, and hence were in addition to those assured by the other defendants, cannot relieve his sureties from liability with respect to those which were imposed by the contract, unless the imposition of these new duties and their performance by Saint rendered impossible, or materially hindered or impeded, the proper and faithful performance of the service originally undertaken. There is no evidence here that these new and additional duties interfered with the collection of notes placed in his hands for that purpose, nor is any claim made against his sureties on account of any failure to collect such notes. But the gravamen of the action is that he (1) did collect these notes, and converted the proceeds to his own use; or (2) that he failed to deliver such notes to the company on the termination of his employment. We are unable to conceive how the fact that he had other property and funds—machines and the proceeds of discounted notes—in his possession, could have hindered or impeded him in the accounting for funds collected or notes remaining in his hands, or could in any degree have conduced to his conversion of such funds or notes. To the contrary, it would seem, in all reason, that the possession of this other property and these other funds, out of which he might have met the necessities which presumably induced his malversations, would have lessened the chances of misappropriation of the funds and property for which his sureties were responsible, and thus have lessened, instead of increased, their exposure to liability. We are very clear to the conclusion that the imposition of these new duties, not covered by the contract, did not discharge the sureties with respect to those embraced in the contract, and as to which no change in the particulars we are considering was attempted. City of New York v. Kelly, 98 N. Y. 467; State v. Vilas, 36 N. Y. 459; Insurance Co. v. Potter, 4 Mo. App. 594; Com. v. Holmes, 25 Grat. 771; Bank v. Traube, 75 Mo. 199; Gaussen v. U. S., 97 U. S. 584; Jones v. U. S., 18 Wall. 662; Ryan v. Morton, 65 Tex. 258; Bank v. Gerke, (Md.) 13 Atl. Rep. 359, 6 Amer. St. Rep. 453, and note, 458; Bank v. Ziegler, 49 Mich. 157, 13 N. W. Rep. 496.

The sureties further defended on the ground that the contract between Saint and the company was changed without their knowledge or assent by a subsequent parol agreement entered into by their principal and Walls, representing the company, whereby Saint's compensation was to be reduced from $50 per month to $9 per week. There was evidence of such agreement, but none that it was supported by a consideration or that it was approved by plaintiff; and it appears from other evidence that all of Wall's contracts were subject to approval or rejection by other officers of the corporation, and that plaintiff settled with Saint on a basis as to compensation of $50 per month. We think, on these facts, this defense is without merit. Steele v. Mills, 68 Iowa, 460, 27 N. W. Rep. 294. Equally untenable, in our opinion, is the defense which proceeds on the ground that the instruction of plaintiff to Saint to retain his salary and expenses out of collections made by him was a material change of that provision of the contract which required him to remit to the company on the last day of each week the amount collected up to that day. The contract provided for Saint's compensation and expenses, but was silent as to the manner of payment. Method of payment thus adopted tended to decrease the risks of the sureties, as affording less occasion for conversion by Saint than had payments to him been made only at the end of each month.

It is well settled that mere indulgence of the creditor to the principal, the mere forbearance to take steps to enforce a liability upon default, or even an understanding between them looking to payment of the deficit presently due at some time in the future, which does not, for the want of a consideration to support it, or other infirmity, prevent the creditor from immediately demanding payment, will not discharge the surety. Hence what took place between Walls and Saint in February, 1888, in regard to allowing the latter further time to make good the sum he had theretofore converted, afforded no defense to the sureties with respect to the sum then due. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 715, §§ 36-43; 9 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 83, note 4; Canal, etc., Co. v. Van Vorst, 21 N. J. Law, 100.

The sureties, however, on another aspect of the transaction last above referred to between Saint and Walls, predicate a defense going to the amount of their liability. They insist that Saint was at that time a defaulter by embezzlement; that Walls knew this fact, and, without giving any notice of it to them, he, acting for the company, continued Saint in its employment, and committed other funds to him, which were also converted; and that this action of Walls discharged them from all liability for funds thus converted after he knew of Saint's dishonesty. The general principle here relied on finds abundant support in the authorities. In the leading case of Phillips v. Foxall, L. R. 7 Q. B. 666, the proposition is thus stated by QUAIN, J.: "We think that in a case of continuing guaranty for the honesty of a servant, if the master discovers that the servant has been guilty of acts of dishonesty in the course of the service to which the guaranty relates, and if, instead of dismissing the servant, as he may do at once and without notice, he chooses to continue in his employ a dishonest servant, without the knowledge and consent of the surety, express or implied, he cannot afterwards have recourse to the surety to make good any loss which may arise from the dishonesty of the servant during the subsequent service." And this proposition is rested upon considerations which, to our minds, are eminently satisfactory. Premising that had a default involving dishonesty, and occurring before the surety became bound, been known to the creditor, and concealed by him from the surety, the effect would have been to discharge the surety,—a doctrine which appears to be well established,—the court proceeds to declare the same result from a concealment of dishonesty pending a continuing guaranty, as follows: "One of the reasons usually given for the holding that such a concealment [at the time the surety enters into the obligation] would discharge the surety is that it is only reasonable to suppose that such a fact, if known to him, would necessarily have influenced his judgment as to whether he would enter into the contract or not; and, in the same manner, it seems to us equally reasonable to suppose that it never could have entered into the contemplation of the parties that after the servant's dishonesty in the service had been discovered the guaranty * * * should continue to apply to his future conduct, when the master chose, for his own purposes, to continue the servant in his employ, without the knowledge or assent of the surety. If the obligation of the surety is continuing, we think the obligation of the creditor is equally so, and that the representation and understanding on which the contract was originally founded continue to apply to it during its continuance and until its termination." The citations directly supporting this conclusion are quasi dicta of Lord REDESDALE in Smith v. Bank, 1 Dow. 287, and of MALINS, V. C., in Burgess v. Eve, L. R. 13 Eq. 450; but the case was subsequently followed in England and the United States, and nowhere abstractly doubted. We follow these authorities, and adopt their conclusions as sound in principle. Sanderson v. Aston, L. R. 8 Exch. 73; Brandt, Sur. § 368; Roberts v. Donovan, 70 Cal. 108, 11 Pac. Rep. 599; Railroad Co. v. Gow, 59 Ga. 685; Telegraph Co. v. Barnes, 64 N. Y. 385; Newark v. Stout, 52 N. J. Law, 35, 18 Atl. Rep. 943.

Indeed, the foregoing doctrine is not controverted in this case, but it is contended that it has no application as between a corporation, being the creditor, and the surety of one of its officers or employes; and there are not a few adjudged cases which support this view. The argument upon which this conclusion is reached is that "corporations can act only by officers and agents. They do not guaranty to the sureties of one officer the fidelity of the others. The fact that there were other unfaithful officers and agents of the corporation, who knew and connived at his [the principal's] infidelity, ought not in reason, and does not in law or equity, relieve the sureties from their responsibility for him. They undertake that he shall be honest, though all around him be rogues. Were the rule different, by a conspiracy between the officers of a bank or other moneyed institution all their sureties might be discharged. It is impossible that a doctrine leading to such consequences can be sound." Railway Co. v. Shaeffer, 59 Pa. St. 356; Taylor v. Bank, 2 J. J. Marsh. 565; McShane v. Bank, (Md.) 20 Atl. Rep. 776; Brandt, Sur. § 369. It is to be noted that these cases—and there may be others which follow them—hold, not only that, where there is a conspiracy between officers of a corporation to embezzle its funds, the dereliction of neither officer will discharge the sureties of the other, but also where there is a negligent failure on the part of one such officer to give notice to the sureties of another of his dishonesty, and a continuance of the dishonest servant in the corporate service without the assent of his sureties, given with a knowledge of the default, the sureties are not discharged from liability for subsequent deficits, though confessedly they would be were the creditor an individual or copartnership. It may be that the first position stated is sound. It would seem to be immaterial whether an original default results from the dishonesty of the principal alone, or conjointly from his and the dereliction of another corporate employe. The sureties are bound to answer for the results of any form of original dishonesty That is what they insure against. It may be, too,—doubtless would be,—that no concealment by a conspirator of the fact of the principal's original default, no continuance in the service by an officer of the corporation in pari delicto with the principal, would suffice to discharge the surety, since all of this is malversation participated in by the principal, and violative of the contract which the sureties have undertaken to see faithfully performed. Moreover, the acts and omissions of one agent of a corporation, in conspiracy with another to filch their common master, in furtherance of their nefarious purposes, are, in the nature of things, without authorization, by implication or otherwise, and can in no just sense be said to be acts or omissions of the corporation. Upon this idea, it may be that where one officer, though not originally participating in the default of another, conceals that default from the sureties of his fellow-officer and from the company for sinister purposes of his own, and not as representing his employer or in its interest, and continues the defaulting officer in the service, the sureties would not be discharged as to subsequent deficits. This far we may go with the learned courts in which the cases we have cited were decided. But even our conservatism in following adjudications of courts of acknowledged ability and learning can in no degree constrain us to adopt the second proposition stated above. We cannot subscribe to the doctrine that there is the radical difference insisted on, or any material difference in fact, between the efficacy of acts and omissions of an agent of a creditor corporation, having authority in the premises, on the one hand, and the acts and omissions of the agent of an individual creditor, or of the individual himself, on the other, in respect of condoning the defalcation of an employe, omitting notice to the employe's sureties, and continuing him in the service, to operate a release of the sureties as to subsequent deficits of the dishonest employe. No doctrine of the law is more familiar than that notice to an agent, within the scope of his agency, is notice to the principal; and the doctrine has in no connection been applied more frequently and uniformly than to corporations and their agents. Indeed, there is an absolute necessity in all cases for its application to corporations, since they act and can be dealt with only through agents. Notice to one agent of a corporation with respect to a matter covered by his agency must be as efficacious as to its directors or to its president, since these also are only agents, with larger powers and duties, it is true, but not more fully charged with respect to the particular thing than he whose authority is confined to that one thing. In the case at bar, Walls had authority to make the contract with Saint, subject to the approval of another agent of the corporation. He did in fact make it. This contract contained a provision for its termination by either party at pleasure. The evidence was that Walls had full supervision over Saint, and over all matters embraced in the contract made by Saint. It was at least a fair inference to be drawn by the jury that he could terminate the employment, either under the stipulation in the instrument, or for a violation of it by Saint, subject to the approval of the other officer or agent referred to. There is no ground to doubt but that to have given the sureties notice of Saint's default would have been in the line of his duty and authority. Equally clear it must be that their assent to him to a continuance of Saint's employment would have bound them for the subsequent defalcation; and, on the other hand, it must be that their dissent from such continuance, communicated to him, would have had the same effect as had it been given to any other officer of the creditor company. He had notice of the default. He received it as representing the company. In that capacity, he condoned it, made arrangements with Saint to make it good, continued the employment, and thereby continued Saint's opportunities to embezzle the company's funds, on the supposed security for its reimbursement afforded by the obligation of the sureties, who had contracted on the assumption of Saint's honesty, and were entitled to know of his dishonesty, when it should develop, as a condition to their subsequent liability. There is no intimation of connivance or conspiracy on the part of Walls with Saint to defraud either the creditor or the sureties. What he did was doubtless done in good faith, and for the interest, as he supposed, of his employer. It was in the line of his employment. If his further duty was to report his action to another officer of the company, the presumption is that he made such report. There is nothing in the record to rebut such presumption. We cannot hesitate to affirm, on this state of the case, that what he did which ought not to have been done, and what he failed to do which ought to have been done, were the acts and omissions of the corporation, involving the same consequences, in all respects, as if the corporate entity had been capable of direct personal action, so to speak, and had acted as he did, or as if he himself, and not the Wheeeler & Wilson Manufacturing Company, had been the creditor. We suppose it would not be contended in any quarter that if these sureties had in terms stipulated that, in case of Saint's default, notice to them, and assent on their part, should be a condition precedent to their liability for further defaults, they could be held, without such notice and assent; and yet, under the doctrine announced in the cases cited, such a stipulation would be entirely nugatory, and the failure of every agent and officer, all with knowledge of the stipulation and of the default, to notify the sureties thereof, would avail them nothing. Yet it would manifestly be no more the duty of the corporation to give a notice so stipulated for than to give a notice made a part of the contract by the law of the land. And such doctrine, carried to its legitimate results, would defeat all corporate liability growing out of the contracts, acts, and omissions of agents clothed with power and authority in the premises. That it is unsound is demonstrated, not only in logic, but upon analogous authority. As we have seen, the English court, in the leading case of Phillips v. Foxall, supra,—which has never been called in question there or in this country, either as to the result or the reasoning upon which it was reached,—supported the principle declared upon the same considerations which underlie the doctrine that if an employer have knowledge of the previous dishonesty of a servant, and accept a guaranty for his future honesty without disclosing such knowledge to the surety, this is a fraud upon the latter, and he is not bound. Now, suppose an officer of a corporation, charged with the duty of finding surety for another officer, knowing of such previous dishonesty on the part of such other officer, takes bond for his faithful and honest performance of the services contracted for, without giving the surety notice of the prior dereliction. Would not that omission of duty on his part stand upon the same plane before the law, and involve precisely the same consequences, as if the default had occurred after the surety has bound himself, and the officer had then failed to give him notice of it? If the corporation is not prejudiced by the omission in one instance, can it be in the other. If the corporation is responsible for the dereliction of its agent with respect to notice of a previous default, would it not also be responsible for its agent's failure to give notice of the subsequent default? There can, in our opinion, be but one answer to these questions. There can be no possible difference in the duty of the agent and the corporation's liability for its non-performance in the two cases; and the law is well settled that the failure of the agent of a corporation to give notice of such previous dishonesty avoids the obligation of the sureties for future misconduct. Singularly enough, too, some of the cases holding this doctrine distinctly and broadly were decided by courts—those of Pennsylvania and Kentucky—which hold the contrary view as to notice of after-occurring embezzlement. Brandt, Sur. §§ 365–368; Wayne v. Bank, 52 Pa. St. 344; Graves v. Bank, 10 Bush, 23; Bank v. Cooper, 36 Me. 179, 39 Me. 542.

Our conclusion on this point is further supported by the cases of Railroad Co. v. Gow, and Telegraph Co. v. Barnes, supra, which, without discussing this point, in effect hold that the omission of an officer of a corporation to notify a surety of the default of his principal in a case like this, and the continuance by such officer of the employment of the principal, will discharge the surety as to all defaults arising during the subsequent service. And in Newark v. Stout, 52 N. J. Law, 35, 18 Atl. Rep. 943, the New Jersey court, while adhering generally to the doctrine we have been criticising, yet held that if the default and dishonesty of a municipal officer be brought to the attention of the city council, which is clothed with the power to remove him, and he is allowed to continue in the service without notice to and assent on the part of the surety, the latter will be discharged from liability as to all subsequent defaults. It does not appear to have been so considered by that court; but it is manifest that this is a radical departure from the doctrine held by the Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Maryland, and other courts, and relied on by appellee here, and goes strongly in support of the contrary rule, which we believe to be the sound one. It is also to be noticed that much reliance is had by the courts holding that a surety of one officer of a corporation is not discharged by the acts or omissions of another, in the particulars under consideration, on cases decided by the supreme court of the United States in respect of sureties of public officers. Indeed, it would seem that this whole doctrine had its inception in this class of cases. This can but be considered an infirmative circumstance, going to the soundness as authority of those cases which involve sureties of corporation officers. There is a palpable and manifest distinction between the two classes of cases bearing directly upon this question, which, while requiring the application of this rule to public officers on the grounds of public policy, and that laches should not be imputed to the government, does not require its application to officers of corporations.

We hold that if Walls, while acting for the corporation and in the capacity of its agent, with respect to the matters and things involved in Saint's contract, received notice of such a conversion of its funds by Saint as amounted to embezzlement or involved dishonesty, and, without imparting this knowledge to the sureties and receiving their assent thereto, continued him in the service, the sureties are not liable for Saint's subsequent defaults. Charges 5, 9, and 7, requested for defendants, when referred to the evidence, were correct expositions of the law, as we understand, in this connection. The refusal of the court to give them involved error which must work a reversal of the case. Most of the other assignments of error are covered by the points considered in the first part of this opinion. Such of the assignments as are not discussed have been considered, and found to be without merit. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

SAYRE et al. v. WEIL.

(Supreme Court of Alabama. Jan. 27, 1892.)

TRUST—POWER TO REVOKE—DEPOSIT IN NAME OF WIFE—CHECKS BY HUSBAND—ASSIGNMENT BY BANK—RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEE.

1. Defendant deposited money in a bank to the credit of himself as "trustee for G. children." He testified that he deposited the money from time to time for the last 10 or 15 years as a gift to those children. Held, that the trust was irrevocable, nothing remaining in defendant but the naked legal title.

2. Defendant owed the bankers on his note, and directed them to apply such trust fund towards the payment of the note. They agreed to do that, and to deliver the note as soon as their cashier could make the proper entries. Before the note was delivered, they assigned for the benefit of creditors. Defendant knew nothing of their financial embarrassment, or that they intended to assign. Held, in an action on such note by the assignees, that the agreement to apply such trust fund bound the bankers.

3. Defendant had made another deposit in the name of his wife, and it was understood by the bank that he could check against this deposit. He subsequently checked against the deposit, but his wife had not drawn on it. At the time defendant directed the application of the trust fund towards the payment of his note, he directed, also, that enough be taken from the deposit in the name of his wife to pay the balance due on the note. The bankers agreed to this, and the wife ratified the act of defendant. Held, that this agreement bound the bankers.

4. The assignees were invested with no higher or more extensive authority than the bankers, but were bound by those agreements equally with the bankers.

5. Code, § 1580, which provides that deposits by married women of their earnings shall be paid only to such married women, does not apply to a deposit made by defendant in the name of his wife.

Appeal from city court of Montgomery; THOMAS M. ARRINGTON, Judge.

Action by H. A. Sayre and others, assignees of Moses Bros., against David Weil, to recover on a note. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

The evidence introduced showed, among other things, that prior to July 3, 1891, the defendant deposited in the banking-house of Moses Bros., of which firm the plaintiffs are the assignees, to the credit of "D. Weil, trustee for Goldman children," the sum of $1,038.42, which money was still on deposit on said 3d day of July, 1891; that there was also on deposit with the said firm on July 3, 1891, to the credit of Rosina Weil, who was the wife of the defendant, the sum of $1,668.78, which had been placed in the said bank by the defendant; that no one drew checks on the account of Rosina Weil except the defendant, and he had frequently drawn on this account in the name of Rosina Weil, or in his name for her, with her knowledge and consent, and with the consent of Moses Bros. It was further shown that on February 7, 1891, the defendant was indebted to Moses Bros. in the sum of $2,000; that on that day he paid the said indebtedness by executing the note here sued on, and transferring from the account of Rosina Weil enough money to pay the balance of the said debt; that on the 3d day of July, 1891, the defendant and Moses Bros., through H. C. Moses, a member of said firm, agreed that the note here sued on, which was payable four months after date, should be paid by applying to its payment the $1,038.42 deposited to the credit of "D. Weil, trustee for Goldman children," and that the balance on said note, after deducting said amount, should be charged to the account of Rosina Weil, and the whole note thus be paid. It was also further proved that Rosina Weil afterwards ratified this agreement. All the other necessary facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion. The cause was tried, by agreement, by the judge of the city court without the intervention of a jury, and, upon the introduction of all the evidence, he held that the said agreement between defendant and Moses Bros. was valid and binding, and rendered judgment for defendant.

Tompkins & Troy and Horace Stringfellow, for appellants. Watts & Son, for appellee.

COLEMAN, J. By written agreement of the parties, filed as provided in section 2743 of the Code, the case was tried and determined by the court without the intervention of a jury. Under the following section, (2744,) the finding of the court may be general or special, unless the parties, or either of them, in writing, request a special finding of the facts; and, if a special finding is requested, the court must state, in writing, the facts as it finds them; and such statement, with the judgment of the court, must be entered on the minutes. Construing sections 2744 and 2745 together, we hold that whenever there is a special finding by the court, whether performed in the exercise of its discretion, or upon written request of the parties, or either of them, on appeal it is the duty of this court to examine and determine whether the facts are sufficient to support the judgment. Quilliman v. Gurley, 85 Ala. 594, 5 South. Rep. 345; Betancourt v. Eberlin, 71 Ala. 464. The first legal proposition for consideration is the one which arises in regard to the deposit for the Goldman children. The defendant Weil testifies as follows: "I had another account with Moses Bros.: 'D. Weil, trustee for the Goldman children.' There was $1,038.42 to the credit of that account on the 3d day of July, 1891. I had deposited the money there, from time to time, for my grandchildren, the Goldman children, ever since they were born,—for the last ten or fifteen years. I put it there as a gift to them every week, so when they grew up they would have something to fall back upon." The same principles of law as to gifts inter vivos apply in cases of gifts of money deposited in bank as to other personal property. The donor must part with all dominion over the thing given. There must be a delivery, or something equivalent thereto. If anything remains to be done to perfect the gift, if there be a reservation of the use or enjoyment of the thing, it is not a valid, executed gift. Walker v. Crews, 73 Ala. 417. A donor may constitute himself a trustee for the donee upon a mere voluntary consideration, and, in case of personal property, this may be done by parol. If by language clear and unmistakable, whatever may be the form of expression, a trust is created, as distinguished from a mere intention to create; if nothing remains to be done to perfect the trust, although there is no valuable consideration,—courts of equity will uphold and enforce the trust in the interest of the beneficiary. 1 Perry, Trusts, §§ 96–98; 8 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1323; Gerrish v. Institution, 128 Mass. 160. These general principles are almost universally conceded. The difficulty arises in their application to the varying facts of particular cases, in determining whether, in the case of a gift, it has been perfected, and, in the case of a trust, whether it has been perfectly created. We have examined many authorities upon the question at issue, and it would seem, in some of the authorities, that the same rule has been differently applied to a similar state of facts; but in each case the general rule as we have stated it has been recognized as the correct rule. In Nutt v. Morse, 142 Mass. 1, 6 N. E. Rep. 763, Calvin Morse made deposits as follows: "Book 3,006, $1,000, Calvin Morse, in trust for Rus Morse. Book 3,007, $1,000. Calvin Morse, in trust for Edgar S. Hays;" and similar deposits were made for other persons, brothers and sisters of the depositor. The court held that upon the facts it was clear that there was no perfected gift to either of the claimants. The court uses the following language: "Calvin Morse retained the entire dominion and control of the funds, both principal and interest, during his life, and the facts show conclusively that he intended no title to or interest in the funds should pass to the several claimants until after his death. The transaction was intended to be in the nature of a testamentary disposition, and was an attempted evasion of the statute of wills,"—citing Sherman v. Bank, 138 Mass. 581. The statement of the evidence in the case cited shows that the depositor informed the claimants that he controlled the fund while he lived, but it was theirs after he died; that, in fact, he did draw and use the accumulations of interest, and, the night before he died, said to them, "When I am gone, you take these books, and transfer the money to your names, and say nothing to nobody about it." It further appears that Calvin Morse, the depositor, knew, at the time he made the deposits, that he could not draw interest on any sum deposited in his own name over $1,000; and we infer the court found in this case, as is declared in other cases of the same state, that to avoid the effect of the statute, which forbade the payment of interest on sums exceeding $1,000, the depositor deposited money in the name of other persons.

It will be further seen, by an examination of the facts in the case in 138 Mass. 581, supra, that by a by-law of the bank money deposited "should be drawn out only by the depositor, or some person by him legally authorized, and that no payment should be made to any person without the production of the pass-book." In the case cited from 142 Mass., 6 N. E. Rep., supra, the depositor retained control of the pass-book; and this fact is referred to in the opinion. There are quite a number of authorities in the Massachusetts Reports, where deposits were made in the name of other persons, the depositor retaining the pass-book, and the deposits were claimed by the persons in whose names they were made, as gifts, in which it was held that the gifts were not absolute, and the money did not pass to the claimants. The fact that the depositor retained control of the pass-book, and that by virtue of the by-law no payment should be made without the production of the pass-book, was considered as evidence to show the depositor did not intend to part with dominion over the money. The question of the intention of the depositor is a question of fact open to inquiry; and his acts and declarations at the time of the deposit, or to the person in whose name it was made, could be considered. Sherman v. Bank, 138 Mass. 581; Brabrook v. Bank, 104 Mass. 228; Scott v. Bank, 140 Mass. 165, 2 N. E. Rep. 925; Broderick v. Bank, 109 Mass. 150. In the case of Gerrish v. Institution, 128 Mass. 159, A. made a deposit in trust for his son by name, and also a deposit for his grandchildren by name. The court recognized the rule that it was not enough that the testator manifested an intention to create the trust and make the gift at some future time, but that the act of transfer must be fully and completely executed. The court further held that it was a question of fact whether the trust has been perfectly created; that, when the trust is thus created, it is effectual to transfer the beneficial interest, and operates as a gift perfected by delivery. The son and grandchildren offered to prove the declarations of the depositor "that he had put the money in the bank for them, that he wanted to draw the interest during his life-time, and that after he was gone they were to have the money." This evidence was excluded. On appeal it was held that this evidence should have been admitted; a majority of the court holding that, upon the evidence admitted, a jury would be justified in finding that the testator had fully constituted himself a trustee for these claimants. The rule has been much more liberally applied in favor of a donee in the state of New York. In the case of Macy v. Williams, 8 N. Y. Supp. 658, a deposit was made in a savings bank; the depositor receiving a pass-book containing an account opened with him as trustee for Eleanor Hildich. The pass-book for a considerable time was left with the mother of Eleanor Hildich, but subsequently obtained by the depositor. He drew out all the money, and died. It was held that the trust and the trust relations were fully established, and that when he drew the money out he held it as her trustee, and was liable to account to her for it. The case of Orr v. McGregor, 43 Hun, 529, was one in which the deposit was made in the name of another than the depositor. The question was one of gift vel non. The court held that a deposit of one's own money in a savings bank to the credit of another, without any qualification expressed at the time, is of itself prima facie evidence of a gift; yet an intent to the contrary may be shown; that the retention of the pass-book by the depositor was a fact to be considered, with other attending circumtances, in ascertaining the intent. The court states the proposition broadly that if the depositor intended, by the act of deposit, to give him the money, his right to it became complete, although she retained the pass-book; that she would be deemed to have held it in trust for him; but if her intention was not to consummate the gift, and that with that view she retained the pass-book, the act of donation was not accomplished, but rested in intention to complete the gift at some future time. In the case of Martin v. Funk, 75 N. Y. 136, in a well-considered opinion delivered by CHURCH, C. J., it was held that "the rule does not require that the gift shall be made in any particular way. It only requires that enough shall be done to transfer the title to the property; and one of the modes of doing this is by an unequivocal declaration of trust. * * * As notice to the cestui que trust was not necessary, and as the retention of the pass-book was not inconsistent with the completeness of the act, the case is peculiarly one to be determined by this test: Did the intestate constitute herself a trustee? I think [says the chief justice] the question must be answered in the affirmative. It was not done in express terms, but such is the fair legal import of the transaction." The entry in the pass-book in this case was as follows: "The Citizens' Savings Bank, in account with Susan Boone, in trust for Lillie Willard. 1866, March 23, $500.00." In Minor v. Rogers, 40 Conn. 512, the deposit was as follows: "Mary Daniels, as trustee of William A. Minor." It was held that the deposit was a complete gift; that the depositor could not revoke it. This case is cited by our own court in the case of Walker v. Crews, 73 Ala. 418, in support of the proposition that "a donor may, by an apt declaration to that effect, convert himself into a trustee for the donee, and thereby make a valid, irrevocable gift of the property." To the same effect may be cited Boone v. Bank, 84 N. Y. 86; Gadsden v. Whaley, 14 S. C. 216. In the case under consideration the deposit, as shown by the testimony, was: "D. Weil, trustee for the Goldman children." Says the depositor: "I put it there as a gift to them every week, so when they grew up they would have something to fall back on." He had continued making these deposits for 10 or 15 years, and had never drawn against this deposit. Under all the authorities, we hold that the trust was completed and irrevocable, and that nothing remained in the trustee but a mere naked legal title.

We hold the law to be that a deposit is a matter of contract between the depositor and bank, and the depositor may stipulate at the time as to the manner, or by whom, (there being no statute or by-law to the contrary,) the money may be drawn out; and when payment is thus made the bank is discharged from further liability. We further hold that if D. Weil, as trustee, had drawn against this fund in his trust character, Moses Bros. were under no legal duty to inquire into the purposes intended, or the use to be made by the trustee of the money, and, if his drafts were paid in ignorance of any improper use intended by the trustee, they would not be responsible; that payment of such drafts would be in due course of banking business, and discharge them from liability. When, however, D. Weil proposed to apply this trust money in satisfaction of his own individual indebtedness, Moses Bros. knew that the funds were trust funds, and that the proposition involved a violation of his trust. Such an agreement cannot be upheld against the cestui que trust. The cestui que trust may afterwards ratify such unauthorized application of the trust fund, and hold Weil responsible; or he may repudiate the payment in toto, and hold Moses Bros. as his debtors. These principles are fully sustained by reason and authority. National Bank v. Insurance Co., 104 U. S. 61; Wolfe v. State, 79 Ala. 206; Duncan v. Jaudon, 15 Wall. 165. As between the trustee, Weil, and Moses Bros., however, a different rule applies. The trustee, Weil, cannot sue Moses Bros. for this deposit. He held the legal title to the money, and by his own act has applied the money in payment of his own indebtedness. Neither can Moses Bros. sue Weil upon his debt, for they have accepted the funds, and applied them in payment of their claim against Weil. Such an agreement is binding upon the parties to it. It may be avoided at the election of the cestui que trust. It rests upon the principle which applies where an administrator or executor makes an unauthorized disposition of personal property. Woods v. Legg, 91 Ala. 513, 8 South. Rep. 342; Swink's Adm'r v. Snodgrass, 17 Ala. 657. We do not doubt that the agreement between D. Weil and Moses Bros. operated to destroy the relation of debtor and creditor as between them. Weil directed the application of the trust money to his individual debt. This was agreed to by Moses Bros. The cashier was at that time absent. Moses Bros. agreed to have the proper entries made as soon as the cashier returned, and deliver Weil his note. The entry of the credits by the cashier would only have furnished written evidence of the fact of payment. The payment, however, was completed by the agreement of the parties. We do not think there is any difficulty in regard to the deposit by Weil in the name of his wife, Rosina Weil. The uncontradicted evidence shows that D. Weil had the right to draw on this fund. We have stated that any person making a deposit of his own money could prescribe the term and manner upon which it could be drawn out. The testimony shows that "it was understood between the depositor and Moses Bros. that he could check on that fund;" referring to the fund to the credit of Rosina Weil. It seems that D. Weil had been accustomed to check on that fund, but that the wife had never checked against it. She knew her husband controlled it, and never dissented from the exercise of such authority. In fact, when informed by her husband of his disposition of the fund, she assented to and ratified it. She is the only person who can complain, and until she dissents no other person has the right to interpose an objection. It appears from the testimony in the record that when Weil made the arrangement with Moses Bros. he did not know, and had no reasonable grounds for believing, that Moses Bros. were financially embarrassed, or contemplated an assignment for the benefit of their creditors.

The deposits in this case to the credit of the wife are not governed by section 1530 of the Code, in which special provision is made that deposits by a married woman or minor of her or his earnings shall be paid only to such married woman or minor; nor does the rule of law arise which was declared in Stout v. Kinsey, 90 Ala. 546, 8 South. Rep. 685, when the wife sued in detinue to recover a mule which the husband had sold in payment of his individual debt.

The authorities in this state uniformly hold that an assignee is invested with no higher or more extensive authority and powers than the assignor. In all cases of assignment for the benefit of creditors, whenever it is shown that the assignor could not maintain a suit his assignee is equally concluded. We are very clear that Moses Bros. could not maintain the present suit against D. Weil upon his note; and his assignees are equally concluded. Walker v. Miller, 11 Ala. 1067; Insurance Co. v. Kamper, 73 Ala. 346. We have considered all the issues presented in argument and brief of counsel. Our conclusion leads to an affirmance of the case.

CRIMINAL LAW — SENTENCE — FINE OR IMPRISONMENT — APPEAL-BOND.

1. Where a judgment of conviction and for fine and costs was rendered against defendant on trial for crime, and an appeal taken to the supreme court, where the judgment was affirmed, the trial judge cannot sentence defendant to hard labor at its next succeeding term; such alternative sentence being available only during the term at which conviction was had, under sections 4503, 4504, providing that, if the fine and costs are not paid, an alternative sentence of imprisonment at hard labor may be imposed.

2. The appeal, and the giving of a bond by defendant to abide the judgment thereof, did not prevent the trial court from imposing the alternative punishment before the case was removed, an appeal not lying until after a final judgment.

Application by the state, on the relation of the solicitor of Montgomery county, for a certiorari, mandamus, or other remedial writ. Denied.

Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., and Tennent Lomax, for relator. Sayre & Pearson, contra.

CLOPTON, J. This proceeding is an application by the state, on the relation of the solicitor of Montgomery county, for a certiorari, mandamus, or other remedial writ, requiring the judge of the city court of Birmingham to certify and return for revision, by this court, the proceedings under a writ of habeas corpus, applied for and obtained by Nancy E. H. Newton, on the hearing of which she was released, and discharged from the performance of hard labor, to which she had been sentenced by the city court of Montgomery. The judge having returned the proceedings in his answer to the rule nisi, the case comes before the court for decision on the merits. At the February term, 1891, of the city court of Montgomery, Mrs. Newton was indicted for assault with intent to murder; and on March 27, 1891, was convicted of assault and battery, and a fine for $500 assessed by the jury. Immediately after the rendition of judgment for the fine, she took an appeal therefrom, and entered into bond, with sureties, for her appearance to abide the judgment of this court. The judgment of conviction having been affirmed, Mrs. Newton appeared in the city court of Montgomery, July 27, 1891, when a judgment, reciting the conviction, assessment of the fine, the appeal, and affirmance, was rendered as follows: "And the said fine and costs of this prosecution not being presently paid or otherwise secured, and the said defendant, being asked by the court if she had anything to say why sentence of the law should not now be pronounced against her, says nothing, it is therefore considered by the court, and it is the judgment and sentence of the court, that the said defendant perform one hundred and forty days' hard labor for the county of Montgomery in payment of said fine, and, the costs of the prosecution being now ascertained and amounting to seventy-three dollars and seventy cents, it is further considered by the court that the said defendant perform an additional term of eight months' hard labor for Montgomery county in payment of said costs, at the rate of thirty cents per diem." The sentence to hard labor was imposed under sections 4503 and 4504 of the Code. The first provides that, if the fine and costs are not paid or a judgment confessed according to the provisions of section 4502, the defendant must either be imprisoned in the county jail, or, at the discretion of the court, sentenced to hard labor for the county for a specified number of days, proportioned to the amount of the fine; and the second authorizes the imposition of an additional term of hard labor as may be sufficient to pay the costs, at a rate of not less than 30 cents for each day, but not to exceed 8 months in cases of misdemeanor. The question is whether the sentence to hard labor for payment of the fine and costs, having been imposed at a term of the court subsequent to the term at which the conviction was had and judgment for the fine rendered, and after the judgment of conviction had been affirmed by this court, is authorized and legal. The general power of the court to set aside or modify its unexecuted judgments during the term at which they were made in criminal cases is not and cannot be denied. When a fine is assessed, and the fine and costs are not paid, nor judgment confessed therefor, as provided by section 4502, it is made the duty of the court to imprison the defendant, or sentence to hard labor, as required by the statute. Under the statute, the court may impose the alternative punishment as a part, and in continuation of the entry of the judgment of conviction; or, if deemed proper, the court may have the judgment of conviction entered, and allow defendant a reasonable time to pay the fine and costs or confess judgment therefor, and, on failure, may impose the alternative punishment at any time during the term. Either course is in pursuance of the statute. It may be that when the court adjourns, without rendering judgment on a verdict of guilty, the suspension being at the instance of the defendant, it may pronounce, at the next term, the judgment which should have been pronounced at the previous term, as was held in Charles v. State, 4 Port. (Ala.) 107. The power of the court to modify its judgments, except for the correction of clerical misprisions, or to amend nunc pro tunc, for the purpose of making the record speak the truth, ceases at the expiration of the term. A judgment imposing punishment cannot be pronounced by piece-meal at different terms, and, after the expiration of the term, the court is without power to substitute another kind of punishment for that first imposed. People v. Felker, 61 Mich. 110. The judgment or sentence pronounced during the term must embrace the entire punishment imposed.

Furthermore, when the judgment of the city court was affirmed in this court, it became so merged in the judgment of this court as to place it beyond the power of the city court to alter or modify it, so as to impose the alternative punishment. Werborn v. Pinney, 76 Ala. 291. It is insisted that by the interposition of the appeal, and giving the bond to abide the judgment of the appellate court, Mrs. Newton, by her own act, compelled the postponement of ascertaining whether she would pay the fine and costs or confess judgment therefor, and that these facts could not be ascertained until the decision of the case by this court. It may be conceded that the operation of the appeal was to remove the case to this court, and that the city court could not thereafter make any order in the case until decided by this court; but the appeal did not prevent the city court from imposing the alternative punishment, under section 4503, before the case was thereby removed. An appeal does not lie until there is a final judgment. When questions of law are reserved in such cases, the court may proceed to impose the alternative sentence to hard labor before making an order suspending the execution of the sentence until the appeal is decided. This operates no hardship on the defendant. The imposition of the sentence to hard labor may be avoided by a confession of judgment for the fine and costs, and, if the judgment of conviction is reversed, the judgment confessed falls with it. Burke v. State, 71 Ala. 377. Our conclusion is that the judgment of conviction and for the fine and costs having been rendered at the February term, 1891, and an appeal taken therefrom, the city court had no power to impose the alternative sentence to hard labor at the next term of the court, and after the affirmance of the judgment by this court. The application must be denied.

ALABAMA MINERAL LAND CO. v. COMMISSIONERS' COURT OF PERRY COUNTY.

TAXATION—ASSESSMENT—VALUATION.

The provision of Acts 1886-87, pp. 11, 12, that in hearing objections to assessments of taxes on land the commissioners' court "shall take into consideration its character, whether improved or not, its surroundings," etc., does not render evidence of the valuation of other land, of a similar character, within the county, by the owner thereof, or the county assessor, admissible, on trial in the circuit court of an appeal from the valuation of the commissioners' court.

Appeal from circuit court, Perry county; JOHN MOORE, Judge.

Proceedings upon objections to the return made by the Alabama Mineral Land Company of its land for taxation. The company appeals from a judgment of the circuit court confirming, on a trial de novo, the valuation made by the commissioners' court. Affirmed.

John M. McKleroy, for appellant. J. H. Stewart, for appellee.

WALKER, J. The appellant was notified that objection was made to its return of its property in Perry county for taxation on the ground of the under-valuation of its lands. It appeared at the August, 1890, term of the commissioners' court of that county, and contested the objections. The commissioners' court raised the valuation from $1.25 per acre to $3 per acre, and the lands were assessed accordingly. The cause was tried anew in the circuit court, an appeal having been taken pursuant to the provision of section 13 of the act approved February 28, 1887, (Acts Ala. 1886-87, p. 11.) The valuation, as made by the commissioners' court, was confirmed by the judgment of the circuit court. This appeal is from that judgment, and the errors assigned are upon rulings of the circuit court in rejecting evidence offered by the appellant. The appellant offered to prove (1) by the agent of the Selma Land & Improvement Company that that company owned a considerable quantity of land in said county, of a similar character to the lands owned by the appellant, and that said lands were in the same part of the county as are appellant's lands, and that said lands were listed for assessment for state and county taxes for the year 1890 at $1.25 per acre; and (2) by the tax assessor of said county that, after the return of said Selma Land & Improvement Company had been made, the commissioners' court duly reviewed said assessment, and on such review placed the valuation of the lands of said company at $2 per acre. The record does not show that any exception was reserved to the action of the court in refusing to admit other evidence which was offered by the appellant.

In hearing objections to assessments, the commissioners' court "shall receive only evidence touching the fair market or real value of the property, and shall take into consideration its character, whether improved or not, its surroundings, and, if it is productive, the amount of its average annual yield;" it being the true intent and purpose of the statutory provisions on the subject as therein expressed "to have all property and subjects of taxation fairly assessed, at the value which would be realized therefrom by a cash sale, but not a forced sale thereof, in such manner as such property and subjects are usually sold; and for this purpose the power and authority hereby conferred upon such court of county commissioners shall be liberally construed, but said court is expressly prohibited from reducing the valuation of any property below the fair cash market value of the property, or what the property would sell for." Acts Ala. 1886-87, pp. 11, 12; State v. Water Supply Co., 89 Ala. 325, 8 South. Rep. 54. In fixing the taxable value of lands, it would perhaps be proper to receive evidence of the value of similar property, under similar conditions, as a feature of the "surroundings," within the meaning of that expression as used in the statute, and as affording a criterion from which the value of the property in question could be deduced. Johnson v. West, 43 Ala. 689; 7 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 60. The assumption that such proof would be admissible brings us to the question raised by the assignments of error in this case as to whether the valuations at which such other lands have been returned or assessed for taxation would be competent, as evidence of their real value. The valuation of property, as found upon the tax-books, represents either the ex parte statement of the owner thereof in his return, or the conclusion of the assessor or of the commissioners' court from information, inspection, or otherwise. The declaration of the owner would not be admissible against any person other than himself or some one in privity with him. The decision of the assessor or of the commissioners' court would not be admissible against a stranger to the proceeding in which the decision was rendered. Such stranger, in offering proof of such valuation of the property of others, claims the benefit of evidence which would not be available against him. A valuation of his own property, in which he does not participate, is inadmissible, if objected to by him. Railroad Co. v. Smith, 89 Ala. 305, 7 South. Rep. 634. It is not permissible to prove a fact pertinent to the issue in a case by showing that some one not a party to the suit has made an oral or written statement in reference to such fact, or by producing evidence of the conclusion reached in another proceeding, which involved the same question, but was between parties who are strangers to the pending suit. The returns of the owners, and the valuations as made on a review of the assessments, are equally incompetent as evidence of the value of lands belonging to other persons. The inquiry as to what was the fair cash market value of the lands of the appellant should be determined upon evidence pertinent to that question. It would but tend to draw away the minds of the jury from the matter in issue to admit evidence to show the results of similar inquiries as to other property of like character. The question as to what conclusions were reached in other cases could have no legitimate bearing upon the result in this case. In determining the valuation at which the appellant's property should be assessed for taxation, it is immaterial to inquire whether or not other property has been fairly valued, for the fact that under-valuations have been permitted in many instances would afford no excuse for the assessment of the appellant's property at less than its "fair market or real value." A neglect of the requirements of the law in this case could not be excused by showing a similar breach of duty in other cases. There may be a remedy to prevent unjust discriminations in the valuation of property for taxation, but the fact that the property of others has been undervalued could not justify a corresponding undervaluation of the property of the appellant. The foregoing considerations suffice to show that there was no error in excluding the evidence above referred to.

MARX v. NELMS.

(Supreme Court of Alabama. Feb. 2, 1892.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—ASSETS—GROWING CROPS.

An administrator is entitled to a crop of cotton, the cultivation of which was practically completed at the intestate's death, but which was harvested and sold by the heirs. Blair v. Murphree, 2 South. Rep. 18, 81 Ala. 459, distinguished.

Appeal from circuit court, Perry county; JOHN MOORE, Judge.

Action by Samuel A. Nelms, administrator of M. F. C. Weaver, against F. M. Marx, for conversion. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Pitts & Harwood, G. B. Johnston, and E. W. Pettus, for appellant. John F. Vary and J. H. Stewart, for appellee.

STONE, C. J. M. F. C. Weaver lived on a plantation, and cultivated a crop of cotton thereon, in 1889. He died intestate August 17, 1889. At that time the cultivation of the crop was practically completed, but its growth had not ceased. It was in the fields, and ungathered. Most of these facts are shown in the testimony. The others are common knowledge. Two sons of deceased—one of them residing on the plantation, but on another part of it—then gathered the cotton, and sold it to the appellant, Marx. This sale was in August, 1889. The bales of cotton were branded in the name of the deceased, and at the time of the purchase appellant knew M. F. C. Weaver was dead, and that no administration had been granted on his estate. Appellant resold the cotton in September, 1889. This is the alleged conversion for which this action was brought. No proof was made of the expense or value of the labor incurred or employed in gathering the cotton and preparing it for market, and no ruling was invoked bearing on this question. If there be anything in it, (upon which we decide nothing,) the record fails to bring it before us for consideration. On November 4, 1889, Nelms was appointed administrator of the estate of M. F. C. Weaver, deceased, and brought this action against appellant for the conversion of the cotton. The court, on written request, gave the general charge that, "if the jury believe the evidence, they must find the issue in favor of plaintiff." This ruling furnishes the subject of the chief assignment of error. The case of Blair v. Murphree, 81 Ala. 454, 2 South. Rep. 18, is relied on by appellant in support of the chief assignment of error stated above. The facts of that case were materially different from those found in the record before us, and that case was decided mainly on the exceptional facts it presented. Even with this explanation, the contention is plausible that some of the expressions found in that opinion tend to mislead, if they do not invade the domain of a well-recognized principle, which is essential to the maintenance of creditors' rights in estates of decedents. We there decided that the word "may," in section 2098 of the Code of 1886, does not impose on the personal representative the imperative duty of completing every crop the decedent may leave growing at the time of his death, irrespective of any prospect of profit to be derived from its completion. We held that the statute left him a discretion, to be exercised in the interest of the estate. We adhere to that conclusion, but hold it has no proper application to the case in hand. When Mr. Weaver died—August 17th—the cultivation of the crop was practically completed. There remained to be bestowed only the labor of gathering and preparing it for market. If an administrator previously appointed had neglected this duty, and had permitted a crop thus circumstanced to perish in the field, he would have been guilty of a devastavit, and would have been chargeable therefor. The presumption is that he would have done his duty, and would have harvested the crop for the benefit of the estate. Coming later into the trust, and his right of property dating from the death of his intestate, we must accord to him all the legal rights a performance of these plain duties would have secured to him. Possibly, in claiming the crop after it was harvested, the duty would be assumed by him to compensate any labor and expense that had been incurred in gathering it. This question, as we have said, is not before us, and we do not decide it. The case in hand is not distinguishable in principle or material facts from many heretofore decided in this court, in which we held the plaintiff was entitled to recover. The circuit court did not err in the charge given. Upchurch v. Norsworthy, 15 Ala. 705; Carpenter v. Going, 20 Ala. 587; Abernathy v. Bankhead, 71 Ala. 190; Mitcham v. Moore, 73 Ala. 542; Loeb v. Richardson, 74 Ala. 311; Tayloe v. Bush, 75 Ala. 432. There is nothing in the other exceptions reserved. Affirmed.

SWEETZER et al. v. BUCHANAN.

DISCOVERY—STATUTORY PROCEEDINGS—PROPERTY SUBJECT TO PAYMENT OF DEBT.

1. Under Code, §§ 3544–3547, as amended by Laws 1888–89, p. 96, allowing a simple contract creditor to maintain a bill for discovery of property within or without the state, etc., a bill averring that defendant has property subject to the payment of his debt, but that its kind, description, and manner of holding is concealed from and unknown to complainants, and praying a discovery, is sufficient upon demurrer.

2. Such a bill should be sworn to. Lawson v. Warren, 8 South. Rep. 141, 89 Ala. 584, followed.

Appeal from chancery court, Madison county; THOMAS COBBS, Chancellor.

Bill of discovery by Sweetzer, Pembrook & Co. against Thomas G. Buchanan. Complainants appeal from a decree of the chancellor sustaining a demurrer to the bill. Reversed.

The bill in this case was filed by the appellants against the appellee, and prayed the discovery of assets in the hands of the defendant, which should be subjected to the claim of the complainants, and that said assets be subjected to the payment of the indebtedness of said defendant to the complainants. The defendant demurred to the bill on the grounds that the complainants by said bill seek to place a legal cause under equitable cognizance, and because the bill does not contain equity. On the submission of the cause upon the demurrer to the bill the chancellor sustained the demurrer. Complainants bring this appeal, and the chancellor's decree upon the demurrer is assigned as error.

Watts & Son and Bush & Brown, for appellants. D. D. Shelby, for appellee.

COLEMAN, J. Complainants' bill was filed under sections 3544–3547 of the Code, inclusive, as amended by act of the legislature of 1888–89, p. 96. These sections enlarge the remedy of a simple contract creditor, and under their provisions he may maintain a bill for discovery and relief in certain cases, for which the general principles of courts of equity, without the statutory aid, would be wholly inefficient. The scope and effect of these remedial statutes, to some extent, have been ascertained and declared by former decisions of this court, and we are satisfied with the correctness of the conclusions reached in those adjudications upon the questions involved. Railroad Co. v. McKenzie, 85 Ala. 548, 5 South. Rep. 322; Lawson v. Warren, 89 Ala. 585, 8 South. Rep. 141; McCullough v. Jones, (Ala.) 8 South. Rep. 696. The present bill avers and describes the indebtedness of the defendant, Thomas G. Buchanan, to complainants, and further avers that he has no visible property or other means accessible to legal process from a court of law to satisfy plaintiffs' demand. The bill further avers substantially that he "has property, or an interest in property, real or personal, or money, or effects, or choses in action, subject to the payment of his debt;" but that the kind and description of property, and how held, is kept concealed and hidden from, and is unknown to complainants, and that a discovery by the defendant is necessary to enable complainants to reach and subject it to the satisfaction of their demand. The bill further avers that this property or interest was conveyed away and is kept concealed by the defendant debtor for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding his creditors. The bill is not liable to the objection that it is a mere fishing process to discover as by chance whether the defendant has such property. The averments are that he has property liable to the debt, but that defendant has so manipulated and concealed it that it cannot be reached by the ordinary process from courts of law; that its kind and character and whereabouts is unknown, and cannot be discovered without the aid of a court of chancery. An accurate or any description of the property, further than to show that it is liable to the payment of defendant's debt, is not required in such cases. Neither is the objection available that the property is beyond the limits of the state. The defendant debtor is in court in person, subject to its jurisdiction, and the statute itself makes express provision for such cases, whether the property be "within or without" the state. Code, § 3547. The court may require the debtor to make all conveyances to a receiver which may be necessary to enable him to receive, sue for, and recover such property. The chancery court erred in sustaining defendant's demurrer to the bill. In the case of Lawson v. Warren, 89 Ala. 584, 8 South. Rep. 141, it was declared that bills like the present one should be sworn to. Reversed and remanded.

FRENCH v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Alabama. Feb. 3, 1892.)

CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—SEARCHING PERSON UNDER ARREST.

In a criminal prosecution for carrying a concealed pistol, evidence that defendant, having been lawfully arrested while in the act of violating a municipal ordinance, was searched, and the weapon found upon him, is admissible. Chastang v. State, 8 South. Rep. 304, 88 Ala. 29, followed.

Appeal from criminal court, Pike county; WILLIAM H. PARKS, Judge.

Indictment against W. E. French for carrying a concealed weapon. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction. Affirmed.

The appellant in this case was indicted, tried, and convicted for carrying a pistol concealed about his person. The evidence introduced by the state showed that upon the defendant's being arrested, and his person searched, as is stated in the opinion, a pistol was found concealed in his coat-pocket. The defendant duly excepted to the court's allowing the state to introduce evidence concerning the search of the defendant, and the discovery of said pistol concealed about his person. Upon the introduction of all the evidence the court gave the jury the following charge: "If you believe the evidence in the case, you must find the defendant guilty;" to which charge the defendant duly excepted.

M. N. Carlisle, for appellant. Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

MCCLELLAN, J. It was admitted on the trial below that the arrest of French by the police officers of the city of Troy was a lawful arrest, the said French being in the act of violating an ordinance of the municipality, and, of consequence, that his imprisonment was legal. Under these circumstances, it was not only the right, but the duty, of the officers to search the prisoner for weapons which might be used by him to effect an escape, and this wholly regardless of his resistance or peaceable submission to the arrest and confinement in the first instance. The fact that one lawfully arrested makes no attempt to use weapons he has about his person, or to otherwise resist the officers of the law, is no reason whatever for allowing him to retain such weapons, which he may afterwards, and under more favorable conditions, it may be, resort to to make good his escape. Ex parte Hurn, 92 Ala. 102, 9 South. Rep. 515. The right to arrest and confine French being thus admitted, and the additional right arising from such arrest and confinement to search him and take away any arms found upon his person being, in our opinion, unquestionable, this case, in respect of the matter reserved for our consideration, is upon all fours in principle with that of Chastang v. State, 83 Ala. 29, 3 South. Rep. 304, where it is held that the fact disclosed by such a search that the person arrested had a pistol concealed about his person may be given in evidence against him on a subsequent prosecution for carrying concealed weapons. Adhering to the principle declared in that case, and applying it to the case at bar, we hold that the criminal court did not err in admitting the testimony excepted to, or in giving the general affirmative charge for the state. The question whether, had the arrest, confinement, and search of the defendant been unauthorized and illegal, testimony of the facts disclosed thereby would have been admissible against him on this trial, is not presented by this record, and its decision is therefore, as in the case of Terry v. State, 90 Ala. 635, 8 South. Rep. 664, pretermitted.

BOLLING et al. v. ROMAN.

(Supreme Court of Alabama. Feb. 3, 1892.)

CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—WAIVER OF LIEN BY MORTGAGEE—MOTION TO DISSOLVE INJUNCTION—GROUNDS.

1. A senior mortgagee promised a junior mortgagee, if the latter would advance $2,500 to the mortgagors, "so as to make their indebtedness to you, including the above $2,500, in all $10,500," to waive his mortgage lien to the extent of "said indebtedness." Held, that "said indebtedness" referred to the proposed debt of $10,500.

2. Where, in an action by a junior mortgagee to foreclose the mortgage, and restrain the senior mortgagee from foreclosing, on the ground that the latter waived his lien, an injunction is granted, an averment of the answer that there was a mistake in the written agreement of waiver, though a ground of defense, is not available on motion to dissolve the injunction on the denials in the answer.

3. An issue, raised by the answer, as to whether the original debt remains unsatisfied, can be determined only by evidence, and is not available on motion to dissolve the injunction on the denials in the answer.

Appeal from chancery court, Montgomery county; JOHN A. FOSTER, Chancellor.

Bill to foreclose a mortgage, and enjoin the foreclosure of another mortgage, by S. Roman against R. E. Bolling and others. Defendants' motion to dissolve the injunction denied. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The bill in this case sought to enjoin defendants from foreclosing a mortgage which had been executed to them by Giddens & Co., and also prayed the foreclosure of a mortgage which had been executed by Giddens & Co. to complainant. The ground upon which the complainant based his relief was that the said R. E. Bolling & Co. had waived all priority of lien which they held over Roman under the mortgage executed to them by said Giddens & Co. This was alleged to have been waived by the following agreement, which was addressed to Messrs. Lehman, Durr & Co., and signed by R. E. Bolling: "If you will advance Giddens & Co. an additional amount of twenty-five hundred dollars, for the purpose of making his arrangements to carry on their mercantile business and to make their crops, so as to make their indebtedness to you, including the above $2,500.00, in all, ten thousand five hundred dollars, I will and do hereby waive my mortgage lien on the land and personal property of said Giddens & Co., to the extent of said indebtedness and interest, for and on account of Lehman, Durr & Co., only." The mortgage and notes which were held by Lehman, Durr & Co. were alleged in the bill to have been duly and properly transferred to the complainant. The defendants filed their answer and demurrer to the bill, and also moved to dissolve the injunction for the want of equity in the bill, and upon the sworn denials of the answer.

E. P. Morrisett, for appellants. Tompkins & Troy, for appellee.

STONE, C. J. We cannot agree with appellants in the construction of the written agreement of R. E. Bolling, bearing date February 5, 1887. The first employment of the word "indebtedness," in the agreement, refers unmistakably to the aggregated sum,—the past indebtedness of $8,000, supplemented with the additional $2,500 to be advanced. The language of the writing is, "so as to make their indebtedness to you, including the above twenty-five hundred dollars, in all, ten thousand five hundred dollars." We think and hold that the proper interpretation of the instrument is that Bolling's offer was to permit the entire $10,500 to take precedence over his (Bolling's) mortgage on the lands in Crenshaw county.

The answer sets up, in avoidance of the injunction and of the suit—First. That there is a mistake in the writing, and that it does not truly express the agreement of the parties. This is affirmative matter set up, and, if proved, may be a defense to the claim, in whole or in part. It furnishes no ground for dissolving the injunction. Second. While the answer does not, and probably could not, deny the complainants' claim, as matter of knowledge, it nevertheless fails to admit its justness, as claimed, and so questions it as to render it necessary to take the account, and to ascertain to what extent, if any, the original debt remains unpaid. The waiver was as to that debt, and none other. Only to the extent that debt, with its accruing interest, remains unsatisfied, is Bolling's mortgage to be postponed. This is a question for proof, and does not arise on the motion to dissolve the injunction on the denials in the answer.

CAMERON et al. v. LOUISVILLE, N. O. & T. RY. CO.

QUIETING TITLE — LIMITATIONS — PLEADING — CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Under Acts 1888, c. 23, § 4, providing that 12 months' occupation of levee lands under a deed from the auditor of public accounts or the levee commissioners shall bar any action for the same, the averment in a bill that defendants have been in actual possession, claiming title, under such deed, for 12 months prior to the date of the filing of the bill, is fatal to it.

2. While what is reasonable time within which to bring actions for existing rights is not a question for final determination by the legislature beyond the reach of the courts, yet it was within its power to limit the time to 12 months, and such limitation was not unreasonably short.

The averment of the bill "that said defendants have been in actual possession of said land, claiming title to the same, under said deed from Gwin & Hemingway, and said deed from the auditor, twelve months prior to the date of the filing of this bill," is fatal to it; for the case made brings it within the fourth section of the act entitled "An act to quiet and settle the title to certain lands in the Yazoo delta," etc., approved March 2, 1888.[1] It was within the power of the legislature to require all actions to recover any of the land described in the act to be brought within 12 months after the passage of the act. While what is a reasonable time in which to bring actions asserting existing rights is not a purely legislative question for final determination beyond the reach of the courts, we are unwilling to declare that the time prescribed was an unreasonably short period for the assertion of claims to land in the situation in which the lands mentioned by the act referred to were. ATLANTIC & G. C. C. & O. LAND CO. v. KINSMAN.

[1] Acts 1888, c. 23, provides (section 1) that the deeds executed by Gibbs and Hemingway and by Given and Hemingway, commissioners of the chancery court in the cause of Joshua Green and others against Gibbs and Hemingway, treasurer and auditor and ex officio liquidating levee commissioners, shall be prima facie evidence of the regularity of the proceedings; (sections 2 and 3) that the auditor of public accounts shall, upon application to him of any purchaser of said levee lands from said commissioners, execute a deed conveying the state's title, which shall be prima facie evidence of paramount title; (section 4) "that twelve months' occupation, at any time after the passage of this act, of any tract of land, under any such conveyance from said commissioners of the Hinds county chancery court, or under said auditor's deeds, or of any part thereof, by any such occupant claiming the whole, shall forever bar any action, either at law or in equity, for such tract."

(Supreme Court of Florida. Jan. Term, 1892.)

DISMISSAL OF APPEAL—SETTLEMENT OF ACTION.

The attorney for appellant filed papers evidencing a settlement of the litigation, and then the attorneys who had argued the cause in this court in behalf of appellee moved for an affirmance of the judgment to the extent of the amount of fees claimed by them for their services; and thereupon the appellant moved to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the suit had been settled. Motion to dismiss granted, without adjudicating whether or not the suit had been settled, and without prejudice to any rights of attorneys for appellee.

Appeal from circuit court, Osceola county.

Action by A. S. Kinsman against the Atlantic & Gulf Coast Canal & Okeechobee Land Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

E. K. Foster, for motion. Cooper & Cooper, opposed.

RANEY, C. J. When this cause was reached upon the docket for reargument, under special rule No. 1, there had been placed among its files by the attorney for the appellant the following papers: (1) A certified copy of a deed bearing the date of March 12, 1890, made by the appellee, and purporting to sell and assign to the First National Bank of Orlando the judgment appealed from, the same being in favor of appellee, and against appellant, and for the sum of $9,456.62; the consideration for such assignment, as expressed in the deed, being "the sum of three thousand dollars, and other valuable considerations, lawful money of the United States of America," and the appellee covenanting that the full amount of the judgment and the interest thereon was still due and unpaid, and the appellant agreeing to save the appellee harmless from any costs of proceedings for the recovery of the amount. (2) A certified copy of an instrument dated April 8, 1891, signed and sealed by the appellee, in and by which instrument he authorizes John M. Lee, clerk of the circuit court of Osceola county, in which court such judgment was rendered, to cancel such judgment upon the Judgment of Record Books in such clerk's office; such authorization being, according to the instrument, for and in consideration of the sum of $1,250 to appellee in hand paid by the defendant, the appellant company, the receipt of such sum being acknowledged in full satisfaction of the judgment. (3) A certified copy of an instrument under seal, executed by the above-named bank, and bearing date July 6, 1891, and reciting the making, filing, and recording of such deed in the office of the clerk of the circuit court of Osceola county, then reading, in substance, as follows: Now, in consideration of $1,250 paid to said bank by said appellant company, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, in full satisfaction of said judgment, costs, and interest, and the same is hereby canceled of record in as complete a manner as if the whole sum of $9,456.62 had been paid, with costs and interest since the rendition of the judgment, "this cancellation being made in connection with another cancellation which has been made, executed, and delivered to said" appellant company "by A. S. Kinsman, in his own proper person, subsequent to the assignment of said judgment hereinafter mentioned to the First National Bank of Orlando, Florida."

These papers are certified by the clerk of the circuit court of Osceola county to be copies of the records of his office.

There had also been entered by Messrs. Cooper & Cooper, and was presented to the court on the calling of the cause, a motion by which they represent that they were and are the attorneys of record in this court of the appellee, and argued the case orally here, and prepared and filed the briefs in his behalf, and that the alleged deed of assignment to the Bank of Orlando, represented by the above-stated certified copy thereof, and the attempted cancellation of such judgment by Kinsman, were made without notice to them, and that such assignment and attempted cancellations were made without any payment or settlement of the fees due the movants for their services for appellee in this court, which fees amount to $500. That Kinsman had actual notice, and constructive notice from the records of this court, of their services, and the bank had the same constructive notice, and that before the attempted cancellation by the bank they gave notice to it, and to appellant, and to the latter's attorney, of their rights in the cause as attorneys, all of which they represent was known to each of said parties from the record in this cause; and they ask the court to affirm the judgment appealed from, to the extent of directing that it be enforced for the collection of the amount of $500 due them as attorneys for appellee.

The movants have filed certain papers in support of their motion, which, in view of the conclusion we have reached, it is unnecessary to notice.

Upon the argument of the above motion by counsel for appellant, he entered in behalf of the appellant a motion "to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the suit has been settled."

Our conclusion is to dismiss the appeal on motion of the appellant, but without adjudicating that the suit has been settled, and without prejudice to any right which the movants, Messrs. Cooper & Cooper, may have. Appellant has the right to dismiss on payment of costs, whether the suit has been settled or not. The dismissal of the appeal, however, will not, of itself, affect the judgment. If the judgment has been lawfully settled or canceled of record, the dismissal will not prejudice the movants, nor add anything to the effect of the alleged settlement or cancellation, if any they have, upon the rights of the movants. Moreover, it now seems to us, in view of the limited character of our original jurisdiction, which extends only to certain special writs, that the circuit court, and not this tribunal, is the proper forum for the assertion of whatever rights the movants may have.

Orders disposing of the appeal and of the motions in accordance with the above views will be made.

HODGE v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Florida. Jan. 28, 1892.)

CRIMINAL LAW—COMMISSION TO TAKE DEPOSITION OF WITNESS—REQUISITES OF AFFIDAVIT—PLEA IN ABATEMENT—WAIVER OF RIGHT—RECEIPT OF VERDICT ON SUNDAY.

1. The oath or affidavits required by the act of March 11, 1879, (section 41, p. 466, McClell. Dig.,) to satisfy the court that the testimony of a witness, whose deposition it is desired to take under a commission, is material and necessary to the defense of the accused, must present facts naturally and reasonably calculated to satisfy the judgment of the court that such testimony is material and necessary to the defense. An affidavit of counsel stating that he is acquainted with the case of the defendant, and what is necessary for his defense, and verily believes that the testimony of a named witness, to whom interrogatories calling for his opinion as an expert, and accompanying the motion for a commission, are addressed, "is necessary, material, and important to the defendant," is not sufficient.

2. A plea of not guilty is a waiver of the right to plead in abatement in a criminal cause.

3. If there can ever be a review by an appellate court of a ruling of a trial court refusing to permit the withdrawal of the general issue for the purpose of pleading in abatement of the indictment, it will not be done where the accused has waited 21 months after the finding of the indictment, and there has already been a trial on the merits, and the period barring a new indictment has elapsed.

4. A charge to a jury cannot be made a part of the record except by a bill of exceptions, or by being signed, sealed, and filed by the circuit judge in accordance with the act of March 2, 1877, (section 36, p. 388, McClell. Dig.,) and will not be reviewed by the appellate court when not made a part of the record.

5. A verdict may be received and entered on Sunday, but it seems that judgment or sentence cannot be lawfully rendered on that day. The former proceeding is not ground for a new trial.

6. The failure of the record to show that the judge asked a prisoner, before pronouncing sentence upon him, if he had anything to say why the sentence of the law should not be passed upon him, is not ground for setting aside the judgment, where the conviction is not of a capital offense.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Marion county; JESSE J. FINLEY, Judge.

Green W. Hodge was indicted December 20, 1888, for murder in the first degree, for the killing of one Jesse J. Marlow; and, after a conviction of the crime charged, and reversal by the supreme court, (26 Fla. 11, 7 South. Rep. 593,) was tried and convicted on the 2d day of November, 1890, of manslaughter in the third degree, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state penitentiary, at hard labor, for two years and six months. He brings error. Affirmed.

Miller & Spencer, for plaintiff in error. W. B. Lamar, Atty. Gen., for the State.

RANEY, C. J. The first allegation of error in the assignment of errors furnished under the requirement of the statute (section 4, p. 455, McClell. Dig.) is the refusal of the circuit judge of a motion, made in open court October 21, 1890, for the issuance of a commission to take the testimony of one E. C. Spitzka, residing at 712 Lexington avenue, New York, on interrogatories filed five days previously at the same term.

The statute of March 11, 1879, (sections 41 et seq., p. 466, McClell. Dig.,) enacts that when any person is arraigned before a circuit court upon indictment or information, charged with crime which is by law a felony, and he shall satisfy the court by his oath in writing, or by affidavits of other credible persons, that the testimony of absent persons is material and necessary to his defense, and such witnesses reside beyond the jurisdiction of the court, or are so sick or infirm that with diligence they cannot be procured to be in attendance at the same or next succeeding regular or special term at which the case may be tried, it shall be lawful, and is made the duty of the judge, upon the proper application of the accused or his attorney, and the filing of the interrogatories, to order that a commission be issued to some competent person or persons to take the deposition of the witness, to be used on the trial.

If we are permitted to consider the interrogatories in the absence of a bill of exceptions duly incorporating them, we see that their purpose is to prove by the proposed witness, as an expert, that there is such a thing as transitory or impulsive insanity, and also its nature and effect, and that certain assumed or supposed conditions and acts of a person were symptoms of his being the victim of such insanity, and that, in the opinion of the witness, a person acting in a described supposed manner, under described supposed conditions, was insane and irresponsible.

The affidavit presented in support of the application for the commission was made by Mr. Hugh E. Miller, one of the prisoner's counsel. The substance of Mr. Miller's affidavit is that he "is acquainted with the case of the defendant, and what is necessary and material to his defense; that he verily believes that the testimony of" Dr. Spitzka, residing at 712 Lexington avenue, in the city of New York, "is necessary, material, and important to the defendant," and that witness resides beyond the jurisdiction of the court. It might be said of this affidavit that it is evidence that Mr. Miller had satisfied himself that the testimony of Dr. Spitzka was "material and necessary" to his client's defense; but, certainly and obviously, the statute, when it says the prisoner shall satisfy the court that the testimony of the absent person is material and necessary to his defense, means that there shall be presented at least some facts which will reasonably and naturally satisfy the judgment of the court. It is palpable that there is nothing here to indicate to the court that the prisoner intended and would be able, or even expected, to prove on the trial the supposed facts which would make the opinions proposed to be elicited from Dr. Spitzka of any use to him in the trial of the cause. There is nothing for the judge to do but refuse the motion. Besides what has been said, it is apparent from the record that nearly two years had passed since the indictment was found, and that there had been a former trial, and it does not appear why the application was not made before this time, when the cause was about to be tried the second time; and again, in the absence of a bill of exceptions, how can it be assumed that there was any evidence on the trial of a character to make Dr. Spitzka's opinion of any value to the prisoner or his defense? There is nothing whatever to support the alleged assignment of error. This conclusion is not inconsistent with the ruling in Newton v. State, 21 Fla. 53.

Another error assigned is the refusal of the trial court to permit the prisoner to withdraw his plea of not guilty, and interpose a plea in abatement. This motion was made immediately after the denial of the preceding motion for the commission to take the deposition of Dr. Spitzka. The prisoner had already been tried upon the plea of not guilty. By this plea he waived his right to plead in abatement. By a plea in bar, voluntarily pleaded, it seems all matter of abatement is waived; and, though it may be in the discretion of the trial court to permit the withdrawal of such a plea for the purpose of pleading in abatement, that discretion will not be reviewed or interfered with on appeal. Savage v. State, 18 Fla. 909; Adams v. State, 28 Fla. —, 10 South. Rep. 106. Pleas in abatement should be pleaded before pleading in bar. 1 Whart. Crim. Pl. § 426; Savage v. State, 18 Fla. 909, 949. After the general issue pleaded, the defendant cannot plead in abatement; and according to the old authorities the proper time for the plea is upon his arraignment. 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. § 175; 2 Hale, P. C. 175; 1 Chit. Crim. Law, 447; Kinloch's Case, Fost. Crown Law, 16; Whart. Crim. Pl. § 426; Martin v. Com., 1 Mass. 347; State v. Farr, 12 Rich. Law, 24. Chitty says it was always necessary to plead it before any plea in bar, as the defendant will be estopped by an issue. 1 Chit. Crim. Law, marg. p. 447. If there can ever be a review by an appellate court of a ruling refusing to permit the withdrawal of the general issue for the purpose of pleading in abatement, we find no such authority; but, if there can, it will not be done in a case in which the party has waited over a year and nine months after indictment found, and after there has already been a trial on the plea of not guilty; and when more than two years have passed since the alleged killing, by which lapse of time any new indictment in this case has become barred. Johnson v. State, 27 Fla. —, 9 South. Rep. 208. To permit such a practice would encourage all kinds of delay, and overturn the established rule, which requires that all matters in abatement should be pleaded primarily. The fact that the proposed plea here tends to affect the legality of the grand jury does not change the rule, or create any exception to its application. There is, moreover, if an excuse for the delay would have any effect in favor of the assignment of error, not even a pretense of an excuse or reason for the delay in presenting the proposed plea.

It is also assigned as error that the court altered instructions asked for by the prisoner, and in charges given in lieu of those asked, and in refusing to give charges as requested. We have already stated that there is no bill of exceptions; and not only is this so, but it is also a fact that there is not in the transcript before us anything which can be recognized or treated as a charge requested or given or refused. There is upon no paper incorporated in the transcript before us, and purporting to be a charge offered, given, refused, or "altered," any evidence that the same, or the original thereof, was ever signed, sealed, and filed by the circuit judge, or either signed, sealed, and filed by him. Richardson v. State, 28 Fla. —, 9 South. Rep. 704; Parrish v. Railroad Co., 28 Fla. —, 9 South. Rep. 696. There is, it is true, quite a mass of papers, whose originals may have played an important part in the trial of the cause; but they have not been made a part of the record either by a bill of exceptions, or in the manner provided by the act of March 2, 1877, (section 86, p. 338, McClell. Dig.,) and indicated above; the only two legal modes of doing it, and of authorizing us to consider them as charges offered and given or refused.

In the absence of a bill of exceptions and of the entire testimony, no review can be made of the refusal of the motion for a new trial, the grounds of which, other than the matters considered above, were that the verdict was contrary to the charge of the court, and against the weight of and without evidence to support it, and alleged error of the court both in admitting and in rejecting evidence.

It is also objected that the verdict was rendered on Sunday. The jury returned into court on Sunday, November 2, 1890, the case having been submitted to them the previous day, and rendered their verdict, and were discharged; and thereupon the court adjourned until the next day at 9 o'clock, on which latter day the prisoner moved for a new trial, and, the same having been overruled, he was sentenced by the court to imprisonment in the state penitentiary at hard labor for two years and a half. No valid judgment can, at the common law, be rendered on Sunday, and any judgment actually pronounced or rendered on that day is void. Black, Judgm. § 182; Freem. Judgm. § 138; Chapman v. State, 5 Blackf. 111; Swann v. Broome, 3 Burrow, 1595. The sentence or judgment in the case before us was not rendered on Sunday, and the law applicable to such a state of facts is consequently not in point. We find, however, that a verdict may be received and entered of record on Sunday. Nearly all the cases touching the question sustain the practice as being both lawful and proper. Ball v. U. S., 140 U. S. 118, 131, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 761; Baxter v. People, 3 Gilman, 368; Van Riper v. Van Riper, 4 N. J. Law, 176; State v. Ricketts, 74 N. C. 187; State v. Penley, 107 N. C. 808, 12 S. E. Rep. 455. See, also, Allen v. Godfrey, 44 N. Y. 433; Huidekoper v. Cotton, 3 Watts, 56; Hoghtaling v. Osborn, 15 Johns. 119. The general rule is that judicial acts cannot be done on Sunday, but acts which are not judicial are not within the maxim, dies dominicus non est juridicus, and may be lawfully performed. Story v. Elliot, 8 Cow. 27. In Mackalley's Case, 9 Coke, 65, it was resolved that though Sunday was not dies juridicus, and no judicial act could be done on it, yet that ministerial acts might be lawfully executed; and the objection that an arrest could not be made was overruled. In Shaw v. McCombs, as reported in 2 Bay, 232, (A. D. 1799,) a new trial was granted by the court of appeals because the verdict was received on Sunday morning. In Hiller v. English, 4 Strob. 486, (A. D. 1849), where Shaw v. McCombs (a case in which no opinion was written) is examined, and the report of it by Bay corrected, and the term of the court shown to have expired, the decision of the court of errors, in the same state, was that the receipt and publication of a verdict on Sunday is a judicial act, but that where a court is directed to sit two weeks, and a jury retire before midnight of the first Saturday and return into court before day-light of Sunday, their verdict may be received and published, and that it seemed, both under the common law, applicable to courts not bound by the terms at Westminster, and under the statutes of South Carolina, that it might be received at mid-day of any Sunday included within the term, and that it also seemed that although Sunday, when mentioned in a statute, begins and ends as another civil day, yet to it, as a common-law festival, and as a holy day established by the usage of various sects and Christians, common-law prohibitions extend only from sunrise to sunset. In Davis v. Fish, 1 G. Greene, 406, where the jury was charged, verdict returned, and judgment rendered on Sunday, it was said that it is improper to even receive the verdict on Sunday. But the settled doctrine is against this view, in so far as to the mere receipt of the verdict and the entry thereof on that day, (Davis v. Fish, 48 Amer. Dec. 387, 392, 393, note;) and the statutes of this state are not repugnant to this conclusion, (section 17, p. 813, McClell. Dig.) The result of the authorities is that the receipt and record of a verdict on Sunday is not within the prohibition of the maxim mentioned above; and, whatever the true reason for this may be, we feel satisfied that neither good morals, the welfare of society, nor religion are offended by doing so, and relieving jurors from the restraints placed upon the usual and proper observance of the day by being detained in a jury-room for no practical or beneficial purpose.

In reaching the conclusion announced in the above paragraph, we have not invoked the aid of the written agreement appearing in the record, bearing date Saturday, November 1, 1890, signed by the state attorney and counsel for the prisoner, in which it is recited that the cause had been submitted to the jury under the charge of the court at a late hour of that day, and by which it is agreed that, in the event the jury may be ready to render their verdict at any time on the following day, it may be received as if rendered on any other day of the week, and that no advantage or exception "can be taken by defendant by reason of such verdict having been rendered on the Sabbath day under this agreement."

The only other error assigned is that it does not appear that the prisoner was asked by the circuit judge, upon being sentenced, if he had anything to say why sentence should not be passed upon him. In Keech v. State, 15 Fla. 591, 609, where it was urged that there was error in not asking the defendant why sentence of death should not be pronounced against her, RANDALL, C. J., speaking for the court, said: "It is laid down by Bishop that it is indispensably necessary that this ceremony should be observed in capital cases, and that it should appear of record that it was observed,"—and the authorities cited sustain the conclusion; but he further says the utmost that may be asked on account of the omission of this ceremony is "that the judgment be set aside, and the prisoner remanded to the proper court, to be dealt with according to law, the verdict standing unimpaired;" or, in other words, for a resentence, with an observance of the ceremony. It seems to be the view of the text-books that, only in cases where the sentence is death, is it indispensable that the record should show affirmatively the observance of this formula. Whart. Crim. Pl. § 906; 1 Chit. Crim. Law, 699, 700; 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. § 1118. See, also, Ball v. U. S., 140 U. S. 118, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 761. And though there are American decisions which refuse to set aside the judgment, even in capital cases, on account of the failure of the record to show that the question was asked, (see notes to Wharton and Bishop, supra,) we find but two authorities (Safford v. People, 1 Parker, Crim. R. 474, and Crim v. State, 43 Ala. 55) holding that it is necessary that the record should show it in convictions of other or inferior offenses. In the following cases, not capital, it is at least held that the judgment or sentence will not be set aside on account of the omission: Grady v. State, 11 Ga. 253; West v. State, 22 N. J. Law, 212, 229; State v. Ball, 27 Mo. 324; State v. Taylor, 27 La. Ann. 393; Jones v. State, 51 Miss. 718; Spigner v. State, 58 Ala. 421. Where the record shows, as it does here, that the prisoner was in court, and represented by counsel who were present, and that a motion for a new trial was made and refused, and there is, moreover, no error apparent on the record for which the judgment can be arrested, it does look like child's play to send the case back for the purpose of asking a question to which there can be no answer that will change the prisoner's fate, and of having a new sentence pronounced. State v. Johnson, 67 N. C. 55, 60; Spigner v. State, supra. The authorities do not call upon us to extend the rule applicable in capital cases; and we, in the absence of a meritorious reason, are not disposed to do so. Jones v. State, 51 Miss. 721, 728. Doubtless, if the question had been material to defendant, his counsel would have called the matter to the judge's attention, if it was in fact omitted, and due exception would have been taken, had there been a refusal to ask the question.

The judgment is affirmed.

ADAMS et al. v. FRY.

(Supreme Court of Florida. Jan. 12, 1892.)

FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE—DEFENSES—PLEADING AND PROOF—PERSONAL JUDGMENT—MASTER'S REPORT.

1. To a bill filed to foreclose a mortgage for purchase money due on real estate, the mortgagor in undisturbed possession, under a warranty deed from the mortgagee with covenant that said real estate is not incumbered by any mortgage, judgment, or any lien whatever, cannot set up as a defense an outstanding incumbrance or title, in the absence of any allegation of an eviction, actual or constructive, from the premises, or fraud or insolvency on the part of the mortgagee.

2. It is error to decree a personal judgment against a married woman, or direct an execution to issue generally against her property for such deficiency of a decree as may exist after the sale of mortgaged property in foreclosure proceedings.

3. When a reference is made to a master to ascertain a fact depending upon testimony, his report should show the basis of his finding, so that the court may see the correctness of his conclusions; and a decree for solicitor's fees, predicated upon the report of a master, in the absence of any testimony to show what was a proper fee under the circumstances of the case, introduced either before the master, or otherwise appearing in the record, will be set aside.

4. In foreclosure proceedings, though not under default, there is no rule of practice making it compulsory on a chancellor to refer a cause to a master to ascertain the amount of principal and interest due on a note, or what is the reasonable attorney fee to be allowed in a case. These are matters of mere computation, or of ready ascertainment, that can usually be made and established under the supervision of the chancellor without interfering with his public duties; but if, in a case not under default, a chancellor, after adjudicating the equities between the parties, refer it to a master for his report, the proceedings before him are regulated and controlled by the rules of practice prescribed in such cases.

Bill by Reginald Fry against J. Irene Adams and Thomas J. Adams to foreclose a mortgage on real estate. Decree for complainant. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

Thomas E. Wilson, for appellants. C. P. & J. C. Cooper, for appellee.

MABRY, J. The appellee, Reginald Fry, instituted proceedings in equity by bill in the circuit court of Clay county, Fla., in March, A. D. 1887, against the appellants, J. Irene Adams and Thomas J. Adams, to foreclose a mortgage. The mortgage was executed by appellants to appellee on the 9th day of February, A. D. 1885, on real estate situated in said county, to secure the sum of $5,000, payable in equal installments one and two years from the 31st day of January, A. D. 1885, with interest from that date at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum. This suit is instituted to foreclose said mortgage for the last installment maturing January 31, A. D. 1887. The bill here is the usual one in foreclosure proceedings, with no distinguishing features from the ordinary bills filed in such cases.

Within the time prescribed by the rules of practice applicable to such cases, the appellant filed an answer, to which appellee filed exceptions. The record does not reveal any disposition of said exceptions by the court, but, at a subsequent date, appellants, as respondents in the circuit court, filed an amended answer alleging substantially the same matters contained in the original answer, together with others.

The complainant below, appellee here, set the cause down for hearing upon bill and amended answer, and upon these a hearing was had, and a final decree rendered in favor of appellee.

In view of this hearing, the allegations of the amended answer became important in disposing of this case, as they are conceded to be true. It is herein alleged by appellants that they agreed, about the 1st day of February, 1885, to purchase from appellee, through his agent, the land described in the mortgage sought to be foreclosed, and that upon their demand, as a prerequisite to said purchase, said agent agreed to furnish them a clear abstract of title to said land; that on the 18th day of February, A. D. 1885, appellee executed and delivered to the appellant J. Irene Adams a warranty deed to said land, and therein covenanted that the same, at the date of said deed, was unincumbered by any "mortgage, judgment, dower, limitation, or by any incumbrance whatever;" that appellants agreed to pay $7,000 for said land, in three installments, as follows: $2,000 cash; $2,500 in one year, with 10 per cent. interest; and $2,500 in two years, with 10 per cent. interest; that they paid the cash installment of $2,000, and executed notes to appellee for the others, securing the same by mortgage on said land; and that they paid the first note falling due; and aver that appellee is proceeding in this suit to foreclose the said mortgage on the second note for the purchase money of said land.

Appellants further answer that before said second note became due they discovered an unsatisfied mortgage for the sum of $7,000, covering, with other lands, the said land conveyed by appellee to said J. Irene Adams, and that said mortgage was executed by a prior grantor and predecessor, through whom appellee derived his title to said land, and to the best of appellants' knowledge, information, and belief said mortgage was at the time of said conveyance to J. Irene Adams, and still remains, an incumbrance and lien thereon, as shown by the records in the clerk's office of Duval county, in which, appellants are informed, said land was situated at the time of the recording of said mortgage.

The answer then proceeds to specify that the said mortgage claimed to be an incumbrance was executed by one John H. McIntosh on the 16th day of December, A. D. 1844, to one Kingsley B. Gibbs, and was recorded in the clerk's office for Duval county, Fla., on the 30th day of said month; that said mortgage is for the sum of $7,000, with interest from the 16th day of December, A. D. 1844, and has never been satisfied of record, and is now a valid and existing lien against the property so purchased by appellant J. Irene Adams, as shown by the record in said clerk's office.

It is further alleged that the administrators of said John H. McIntosh, in the year 1853, sold the land in question to one Stephen Bryan; and the chain of title from said McIntosh through Stephen Bryan to the appellee is set out in full, with the dates of the record of the various deeds constituting the same. Some of said deeds are alleged to be recorded in Duval county, and some in Clay county; and at the time of the mortgage from McIntosh to Gibbs the latter county is alleged to have been a part of the former.

Appellants further answer that they are not informed, and do not know, whether or not the mortgagee, Gibbs, is deceased, and, if dead, whether or not he left minor heirs, and that they have no further knowledge on the subject of said mortgage than that learned from an investigation of the records in the counties of Duval and Clay.

They further say that, on discovering the condition of the title of the land conveyed to appellant J. Irene Adams, they applied to the agent of appellee to have said incumbrance removed as a cloud upon their title, but appellee has neglected and refused, and still neglects and refuses, to take any steps to remove the same, and that appellants refused to pay him the said second note and interest until he did remove said incumbrance and cloud upon their title, believing that a court of equity would compel appellee to do so before allowing him to foreclose his said mortgage.

On the hearing, which was on the 18th day of January, 1888, the court decreed the equities of the bill in favor of appellee, and referred the case to a special master to compute and report the sum due on the note attached to the bill, and also a reasonable amount for solicitor's fee, as provided in the mortgage, under the rules and practice of the court. The special master reported to the judge at chambers, on the 20th of said month, a sum as due for principal and interest on said note, and also an amount as solicitor's fee for foreclosing the mortgage.

On the 6th day of February, 1888, a final decree, based upon the bill, amended answer, and report of the special master, was filed in the office of the clerk of the circuit court of Clay county, Fla. The report of said master was also filed in said office that day. The final decree confirms the report of the master, and adjudges that the respondents, within 10 days from date, pay the said sum ascertained by the master to be due, with interest, the amount reported for solicitor's fees, and costs of court, to be taxed by the clerk, and, in default, that said mortgaged premises be sold at public auction by a master named and appointed for that purpose. After directing the disbursement of the funds arising from said sale, and in the event of a surplus that it be reported to the court, the decree further adjudges "that the defendants be not dismissed until the said debt, principal and interest, and said solicitor's fees, and all costs and expenses of foreclosure, be paid, and execution to issue against said defendants' goods and chattels, lands and tenements, generally, for any balance of mortgage debt, fees, and costs, as aforesaid, not paid and satisfied by the proceeds of sale of said mortgaged property."

Defendants below, J. Irene Adams and Thomas J. Adams, appeal from the decree of the court, and in their petition of appeal assign the following: First, the decree of the court is erroneous; second, the decree of the court should have found the equities of the case with the defendants, and not with complainant; third, the master's report should have been allowed to lie for 30 days, as required by the rules of the court; fourth, there was no opportunity given to take exceptions to the master's report; fifth, there was no notice given of any hearing before the master.

The first and second assignments of error may be considered together. Appellants here contend that the chancellor should have decreed the equities of the bill with them, and not with the appellee. The defense upon which they rely under these assignments is that the wife, J. Irene Adams, obtained the land which is the subject of this foreclosure proceeding from the appellee by a warranty deed with covenant that said land was not "incumbered by any mortgage, judgment, dower, limitation, or by any incumbrances whatsoever," and that there is upon the records of Duval county, Fla., an uncanceled mortgage covering the land in question, together with other property, to secure the sum of $7,000. They contend that, as this proceeding is to foreclose a mortgage on said land for the last installment of purchase money, a court of chancery should not lend its aid to the appellee until he has removed said incumbrances as a cloud upon their title; that although said mortgage is recorded in Duval county, yet at the time of its record Clay county, in which said land is now situated, was a part of Duval county; and, although appellants have no other information in reference to said mortgage than that derived from an examination of said records, as a matter of fact it may have been kept in existence by payments, or disability of parties in interest.

For appellee it is contended that said mortgage was never recorded in Clay county, and, furthermore, that it has long since become barred by the statute of limitation; the bond which it secured having matured some 40 years before the execution of the present mortgage. It is further contended that appellants cannot avail themselves of the matters set up in their said answer as a defense in the proceeding. Leaving out of consideration the contention that said mortgage is barred by limitation, or not recorded in Clay county, we think there is in the last objection urged a sure foundation upon which to base our decision. The bill alleges that, at the time of the execution of the mortgage to appellee, the appellant J. Irene Adams was seised in fee of the land described in the mortgage; and there is no contradiction of this anywhere, but, on the contrary, it is alleged in the answer that appellee executed and delivered a warranty deed to said J. Irene Adams, conveying to her said land. Their possession of the land has not been disturbed, nor have any proceedings been instituted to foreclose the said outstanding mortgage, or any demand of payment of the same made by anybody of them. No eviction, actual or constructive, from the premises, is alleged, and no fraud or misrepresentation on the part of appellee in selling the land is averred, nor is there any intimation that he is insolvent. The answer distinctly alleges that the land was conveyed to J. Irene Adams by warranty deed with covenant that the same was free from all incumbrances whatever. In such a case "it is no defense to a foreclosure suit on a purchase-money mortgage that there is an outstanding title or incumbrance. The mortgagor is left to his remedy on the covenant." 2 Jones, Mortg. § 1500. In Peters v. Bowman, 98 U. S. 56, it is said: "It is the settled law of this court that upon a bill of foreclosure, or, as in this case, a bill to enforce a lien for the purchase money, and where there has been no fraud and no eviction, actual or constructive, the vendee, or a party in possession under him, cannot controvert the title of the vendor; and that no one claiming an adverse title can be permitted to bring it forward, and have it settled in that suit. Such a bill would be multifarious, and there would be a misjoinder of parties." It is further said: "The rule is founded in reason and justice. A different result would subvert the contract of the parties, and substitute for it one which they did not make. In such cases, the vendor, by his covenants, if there are such, agrees upon them, and not otherwise, to be responsible for defects in the title. If there are no covenants, he assumes no responsibility, and the other party takes the risk. The vendee agrees to pay according to his contract, and secures payment by giving a lien upon the property. Here it is neither expressed nor implied that he may refuse to pay, and remain in possession of the premises, nor that the vendor shall be liable otherwise than according to his contract." This case is referred to in the decision of our own court in the case of Randall v. Bourgardez, 23 Fla. 264, 2 South. Rep. 310, where it was held that where a mortgagor in possession, holds under deed with full covenant warranting the title and there has been no eviction, actual constructive, and no fraud or insolvency or on the part of the vendee is alleged, the defense of an outstanding title or breach of covenants cannot be set up to a bill of foreclosure brought by the vendor for unpaid purchase money. There was no error on the part of the chancellor in decreeing the equities of the cause in favor of appellee.

It is apparent, however, that there is error in the decree rendered. After confirming the report of the master, the decree adjudges that the said defendants, within 10 days from its date, pay complainant the amount reported by the master for debt, solicitor's fees, and costs; and, further, "execution to issue against defendants' goods and chattels, lands and tenements generally, for any balance of mortgage debt, fees, and costs, as aforesaid, not paid and satisfied by the proceeds of sale of said mortgaged property." One of the defendants, J. Irene Adams, is shown by the record to be a married woman, and it is not competent to decree a personal judgment against her, or direct execution to issue generally against her property, even when a deficiency is shown after the exhaustion, by sale, of the mortgaged property. This point was decided in Randall v. Bourgardez, supra.

It is further contended that the report of the master should have been filed in the clerk's office, and there remain for 30 days, as required by the rules of the court; and that a failure to observe the rule in this instance deprived appellants of an opportunity to take exceptions to the master's report. The interlocutory decree referring the cause to the master to report the sum due on the note and mortgage, and a reasonable amount for solicitor's fee, was made on the 18th day of January, A. D. 1888. The final decree recites that the master's report was submitted on the 20th day of January, A. D. 1888, but said report and the final decree were filed in the clerk's office on the 6th day of February, A. D. 1888. It is clear that the report was not filed in the clerk's office before the final decree was rendered, nor is there anything to show that appellants had any knowledge of the making of said report before the decree was rendered. Looking into the report, we find no error in the master's computation of the amount due on the note secured by the mortgage. This amount was ascertained by a simple calculation of interest on the note which was before him. In reference to the solicitor's fee, the master reported as follows, viz.: "I find that the solicitor's fees for foreclosing said mortgage should be fixed at three hundred dollars, should the entire amount of the mortgage debt be collected; or ten per cent. of the amount collected, if a less amount than the entire sum be realized of the mortgage debt, principal and interest." He does not report any testimony as taken to establish what was a reasonable fee, nor does his finding on this point purport to be based upon any testimony before him. The rule requires that the evidence upon all examinations before a master shall be taken down by him, or some other person by his authority, in his presence, and filed with his report. The decree of the chancellor for solicitor's fees could not be sustained in the absence of any testimony to support it. Long v. Herrick, 26 Fla. 356, 8 South. Rep. 50. When a reference is made to a master to ascertain a fact depending upon testimony, his report should show the basis of his finding, so that the court may see the correctness of his conclusions. The report in this case did not furnish a basis for a final decree as to the solicitor's fees, as it did not appear that the amount reported was ascertained from evidence. The reference to the master was not to obtain his estimate of what was a reasonable fee, but for him to ascertain from competent testimony what was a reasonable fee under the circumstances of the case. If an exception had been taken to the report on this item, it would have been the duty of the court to have recommitted the report to the master, with instructions to report the testimony upon which he based his finding. In June v. Myers, 12 Fla. 310, it was held that when the appellate court cannot determine from the report of a master, or from the evidence in the case, the basis upon which the decree was made, it will be reversed. See, also, Strang v. Allen, 44 Ill. 428. In Nims v. Nims, 20 Fla. 204, it was said, where it appears that the report of the master is not correct or intelligible, the order of confirmation should be vacated, and exceptions allowed to be filed. There is nothing in the report of the master, nor is there any testimony in the case, from which the court can determine the correctness of the report in reference to the solicitor's fees. If the decree did not award judgment and execution against Mrs. Adams for any balance that may remain after sale of the mortgaged property, it might be reversed, with directions that the amount of a reasonable solicitor's fee be ascertained by competent evidence, as in Long v. Herrick, supra; but in view of that error a general reversal will be ordered.

In proceeding in cases like this, not under default, as is the case here, there is no rule of practice making it compulsory on a chancellor to refer a cause to a master to ascertain the amount of principal and interest due on a note, or what is a reasonable attorney's fee to be allowed in the case. These are matters of mere computation, or of ready ascertainment, that can usually be made and established under the supervision of the chancellor without interfering with his public duties, and in many cases would save to parties the fees incident to a reference. In a bill for an account, where the items are few and not complicated, a reference to a master to state an account, or the statement of the account by the chancellor before or at the rendering of the decree, is not essential, there being no confusion or uncertainty in arriving at the basis of the decree or the rules regulating his decision. May v. May, 19 Fla. 373. If, however, in a cause not under a default, a chancellor, after adjudicating the equities between the parties, refers it to a master for his report on matters specified in the reference, the proceedings before him are regulated and controlled by the rules of practice prescribed in such matters.

In view of the general reversal of the decree, it is not deemed necessary to say anything further in reference to the proceedings before the master.

The decree is reversed, with directions that the chancellor ascertain, according to the rules of practice in such matters, the amount due on the note secured by the mortgage which is the subject of foreclosure in this suit, and also by proper proof a reasonable solicitor's fee for foreclosing said mortgage, and that such further proceedings be had in this cause as may be agreeable to equity.

SUMMER v. MITCHELL.

(Supreme Court of Florida. Jan. 20, 1892.)

FOREIGN DEEDS AS EVIDENCE—LEGISLATIVE POWERS—RETROACTIVE LAWS—ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF DEED—TECHNICAL ERRORS—JUDICIAL NOTICE OF FOREIGN STATUTES.

1. In 1865 the laws of this state did not authorize the admission to record of a deed acknowledged out of this state, but in another state of the United States, before a clerk or deputy-clerk of any court, or before a judge of any court not a court of record, and having a seal and clerk or prothonotary.

2. A legislature has power, in the absence of any inhibiting constitutional limitation, and except as against prior vested rights, to cure by retroactive legislation defective acknowledgments of deeds in all cases where the purpose of the acknowledgment is the admission of the instrument acknowledged to record, or its use in evidence.

3. An effect of the "Act providing for the acknowledgment of deeds and other conveyances," approved February 24, 1873, (sections 16–19, pp. 218, 219, McClell. Dig.,) is to authorize the acknowledgment of the execution of a deed for the record here, to be taken out of this state and according to the laws of the state where it may be taken, at least if the execution of the deed, as distinguished from its acknowledgment is, as in the case at bar, in compliance with the laws both of Florida and of the state of its execution and acknowledgment.

4. The fourth section of the act of February 25, 1872, (section 19, p. 219, McClell. Dig.,) which provides that any deed of conveyance heretofore executed and acknowledged in compliance with the previous provisions of the act should have the same force and effect and be as valid as if the same had been executed after its passage, was to validate, at least from the approval of such act, any prior acknowledgment made out of this state of a deed conveying lands located here, if the acknowledgment conformed to its provisions, and certainly where, as in the case at bar, the execution of the deed, as distinguished from its acknowledgment, conformed both to the law of this state and that of the state of its execution and acknowledgment.

5. It is the established policy of the law to uphold certificates of acknowledgment of deeds, and, wherever substance is found, obvious clerical errors and all technical omissions will be disregarded. Inartificialness in their execution will not be permitted to defeat them, if looking at them as a whole, either alone or in connection with the deed, we find that they reasonably and fairly indicate a compliance with the law. Clerical errors will not be permitted to defeat acknowledgments when they, considered either alone or in connection with the instrument acknowledged, and viewed in the light of the statute controlling them, fairly show a substantial compliance with the statute.

6. The instrument acknowledged may be resorted to for support to the acknowledgment; and where the same name appears as a witness to the execution of the deed, and to the certificate of acknowledgment as the officer taking it, it may be presumed, in support of the certificate, that these names represent the same person.

7. Where the title of an officer taking an acknowledgment of a deed is written out in full in the body of the certificate, its omission from the signature is immaterial, and affixing it to the signature is itself sufficient. Initials may, however, be used, and are sufficient to designate such title.

8. The certificate of acknowledgment, either of itself or aided by the instrument, must show that the officer taking the acknowledgment is one authorized by law to do so; but initials are sufficient to show this, and if they, viewed in connection with the statute, reasonably indicate an officer designated by it as competent to take the acknowledgment, the certificate should be sustained.

9. Where the title of office stated in the body of the certificate of acknowledgment is one which the law did not authorize to take the acknowledgment, and the suffix to the signature, read in connection with the deed, if not alone, indicates an office having such authority, the suffix will control.

10. A deputy may take an acknowledgment of a deed in his own name.

11. Where an instrument has been acknowledged in another state before a deputy-clerk of a court, signing himself as such, and affixing the seal of office, it will be presumed, in support of the certificate, that the clerk had authority to appoint a deputy.

12. The ordinary provisions of recording statutes do not contemplate that recording officers shall record official seals of public officers; and hence, where the acknowledgment of a deed, as recorded, indicates by its language that the official seal of the officer taking it was affixed to such acknowledgment, the absence of the seal, or of anything representing it, from the record, or from a transcript thereof, is not sufficient to overcome the presumption created by such language, that the officer's official seal was affixed to the original.

13. The act of February 24, 1873, (pages 218, 219, McClell. Dig.,) in relation to the acknowledgment of deeds, does not require other evidence of the official character of an officer taking an acknowledgment when he affixes his official seal to such acknowledgment.

14. If it does not appear that the introduction of a certified copy of the record of a deed was objected to in the trial court on the ground that it was not shown that the original was not within the custody or control of the party offering the copy, the appellate court will conclude that this requirement of the constitution (section 23, art. 16) was complied with or waived.

15. The effect of the act of February 24, 1873, in relation to the acknowledgment of deeds, is to validate, at least from the approval of such act, a record made prior thereto of any deed cured thereby.

16. In 1863 the laws of Georgia authorized the conveyance there of land located there by a writing signed by the maker and attested by two witnesses, and the record of the deed there upon an acknowledgment made there before a clerk of the superior court, or a justice of peace, but, unlike our statute as to the acknowledgment of deeds out of the state, did not require the certificate of acknowledgment to state that the officer taking it knew, or had satisfactory proof, that the person making it was the individual described in, and who executed, the deed. A deed purported to have been signed, sealed, and delivered in Thomas county, Ga., by H. L. H. and M. E. H., his wife, in the presence of two witnesses, one of whom signed his name, "T. C. Bracewell, J. P.," and the certificate of acknowledgment represented that it was acknowledged in the same county by H. L. H. and M. E. H. before (according to the body of the certificate) "the undersigned, deputy-clerk of circuit court" of the county; the conclusion of the certificate being: "In witness whereof, I herewith set my hand and seal of office the day and year above mentioned. T. C. BRACEWELL, Deputy-Clerk S. & J. C." Held, that the acknowledgment, whether deemed, as might be, to have been made before a deputy-clerk of the superior court, or a justice of the peace, was in accordance with the law of Georgia, and validated by the Florida act of February 24, 1873, as was the record made of the deed here in 1863 on such acknowledgment, and that a transcript of the record is admissible in evidence under section 24, art. 16, Const. 1885, though no representation of the seal of the officer taking the acknowledgment appeared on such record or transcript.

17. The statutes of another state of the Union must be proved by being introduced as evidence. Our courts do not take judicial notice of them.

Appeal from circuit court, Marion county; JESSE J. FINLEY, Judge.

Ejectment by Mary M. Summer, through her next friend, against Reuben S. Mitchell, to recover an undivided half of certain land and the mesne profits thereof. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

The other facts fully appear in the following statement by RANEY, C. J.:

The action is ejectment for the recovery of an undivided half of lot 2, block 35, old survey of Ocala, and mesne profits, and was commenced in June, 1887, by the plaintiff, then a minor, through her next friend, she being the only surviving child of Adam G. Summer, who died in the spring or summer of 1866. To further sustain her action, she put in evidence a certified copy of the record of a deed in the office of the clerk of the circuit court of Marion county; such deed bearing date September 1, 1858, and purporting to have been made by Martha Baker, Robert Bullock, and Amanda Bullock, his wife, and to convey to H. L. Hart, in fee, the lot in question. She also offered in evidence a certified copy of the record in Marion county clerk's office of a deed bearing date July 9, 1863, and purporting to have been executed in Thomas county, state of Georgia, to be a conveyance in fee of the same property by Hart and wife to Adam G. Summer and Henry Smith; but, its admission in evidence having been objected to by defendant on the ground that the deed "had not been duly proven and acknowledged and recorded as required by law," the objection was sustained, the plaintiff excepting to the ruling, and having, in support of the admissibility of the deed, read in evidence sections 2690, 2705–2707, of the Code of the state of Georgia, (second edition, of date 1873, revised, corrected, and annotated by David Irwin, George N. Lester, and W. B. Hill.)

Plaintiff then offered as a witness Robert Bullock, who testified that he was in possession of the lot in 1854, claiming title, had the lot under fence, built a livery stable, and operated and ran it, dug a well on the south-west corner of the lot, and so remained in possession until some time in 1858, when he sold it to H. L. Hart, and placed him in possession thereof; that Hart continued in the same business on said lot, running a livery stable, for a number of years thereafter. The following questions were asked the witness by plaintiff, and each of them was objected to, and the objection sustained; the plaintiff excepting to the rulings:

"(1) How long did H. L. Hart remain in actual possession of said lot after you put him in possession thereof? And state whether or not he was in possession, claiming title exclusive of any other right. (2) Were you in possession of said lot at that time, claiming title thereto exclusive of any other right? (3) State the character of the possession of H. L. Hart." This question being preceded by an offer to prove by the witness the character of Hart's possession, and being asked for such purpose. "(4) Who was in possession of said lot immediately after H. L. Hart?" This question being preceded by an offer to prove that Hart placed Summer in possession when he sold to him, and being asked for that purpose.

The plaintiff also introduced as a witness W. P. Trantham, who testified that he was acquainted with the premises in controversy, and knew Adam G. Summer; and then plaintiff asked him the following questions, each of which was ruled out on objection of defendant, and the ruling excepted to by plaintiff:

"(1) State how long Adam G. Summer was in possession of said lot, and what was the character of the possession. (2) Was Adam G. Summer, prior to his death, in 1866, in actual possession of said lot?"

The plaintiff here offered to prove by the witness Robert Bullock that the possession of Bullock, Hart, and Summer followed in immediate succession, and was turned over from one to the other, and was continuous and adverse from 1854 to Summer's death, in 1866, each claiming title from the other in the order of succession, and for this purpose asked him the following question: "State whether or not the possession of said lot by Robert Bullock, H. L. Hart, and Adam G. Summer, from 1854 to 1866, immediately succeeded each other, and each claiming title from the other." The question was excluded on objection by defendant, and plaintiff excepted.

The plaintiff having rested, the defendant put in evidence a deed of conveyance in fee of the above property, dated May 1, 1886, from William E. Schoeflin and wife to H. E. Miller and Edwin Spencer.

Schoeflin, a witness for defendant, testified that he took possession of the lot in 1878; that he built a new fence around it, and built a house on it, and lived in it with his family until he sold it to Miller and Spencer; that it is the same house Mr. Hicks now lives in. On cross-examination he said that he built a new fence, and did not repair an old one; took away some old pieces of boards, and built a new fence. The house he built is the same one Hicks now lives in,—the same house that Wallace Dawkins put there; and witness put a new story on, and fixed it up the same as building a new one. The house that Mr. Hicks lives in is on lot 26, west of this one, but "I had all fenced up,—both lots." The house was partly in the street that runs between the two lots. At this time that street was not opened. "I told you that the house I built and lived in is the same one in which Mr. Hicks now lives, and had the whole thing under fence."

Defendant then introduced a deed from Miller and Spencer to the defendant, bearing date December 7, 1886, and purporting to convey to Mitchell and his heirs the lot in question.

The defendant having rested, the plaintiff introduced one Wallace Dawkins, who testified that he lives in Ocala, and has seen the lot every day for the last 12 years. That he took possession of the lot in 1877, and put a fence around it. That he took possession by mistake, intending to locate on another lot, and got on this one by mistake. (Witness locates the lot on a map of Ocala handed to him.) That, when he found out his mistake, he moved off. That he built a house on the lot across the street from this one on the west. That he built it. That Schoeflin moved in the same house; moved in the same day, witness thinks, that witness moved out of the house. That the fence witness put around it was the same one that was there when Schoeflin went there. When witness went there, no fence was around the lot, and no houses. That no house was ever built on the lot, since witness knew it, until after the big fire in 1884, when old man John Eliza put up his little stand, in December, 1884. It is the same place he now uses.

Mrs. Margaret Summer, mother of plaintiff, testified that her husband, Adam G. Summer, was seised and possessed of the lot. That it has been vacant for a number of years; not occupied until defendant took possession of it, something over a year ago. Does not know of plaintiff's possession within seven years. That Mr. Summer was engaged in some business upon the lot, but she does not know what the business was.

Plaintiff testified she had never had possession since her father's death.

Fleming & Daniel, Bullock & Burford, and R. L. Anderson, for appellant.

RANEY, C. J., (after stating the facts.) Appellant sued appellee in ejectment, and the result was a judgment in favor of defendant.

The first error assigned is the refusal of the judge to admit in evidence a certified copy of the record of a deed of the land in controversy, a lot in Ocala, from Hubbard L. Hart and Mary Elizabeth Hart, his wife, to A. G. Summer and Henry Smith. The deed purports to have been executed for and in consideration of $600, in Thomas county, state of Georgia, July 9, 1863. Its conclusion is as follows:

"In testimony whereof, we, the said party of the first part, have hereunto set our hands and seals this, the day and year first above written. HUBBARD L. HART. [Seal.] M. E. HART. [Seal.] Signed, sealed, and delivered in presence: JACOB KUBITSKIK. T. C. BRACEWELL, J. P."

The certificate of the acknowledgment made by the grantors of the execution of this deed is as follows:

"State of Georgia, Thomas county. Be it remembered that on this 22nd day of July, A. D. 1863, personally came before me, the undersigned deputy-clerk of the circuit court in and for the county and state aforesaid, Hubbard L. Hart and Mary Elizabeth Hart, who respectively acknowledged, each for himself and herself, and the said Mary Elizabeth Hart, being absent from her husband, the said Hubbard L. Hart, acknowledged voluntarily, without fear or compulsion of or from her said husband, that they signed, sealed, and delivered the foregoing instrument for the purposes therein mentioned. In witness whereof, I herewith set my hand and seal of office the day and year above mentioned. T. C. BRACEWELL, Deputy-Clerk S. & J. C."

The deed thus executed and acknowledged was admitted to record in the office of the clerk of the circuit court of Marion county on the 30th day of July, 1863, by the clerk of that court. His certificate of the record need not be set out. A copy of this record, duly certified March 19, 1888, by the then clerk, being offered in evidence, was objected to by defendant on the general ground that the deed had not been duly proven, acknowledged, and recorded as required by law; and, the objection having been sustained, the ruling was excepted to.

The particulars wherein the acknowledgment or the copy of the record was objected to as being deficient are not stated in the bill of exceptions. Still, whatever objection might have been taken here to the generality of the objection below has been waived by the specifications of the particular grounds of objection in the brief of counsel for appellant, upon whose behalf alone the cause has been argued before us. Carpenter v. Dexter, 8 Wall. 524.

These grounds of objection are: (1) That it does not appear that the parties making the acknowledgment were known to the officer taking the acknowledgment; (2) a deputy cannot take an acknowledgment; (3) it does not appear that the officer acted within his jurisdiction; (4) the acknowledgment was taken before an officer who had no authority to take acknowledgment of deeds in this state.

At the time of the execution and acknowledgment of the deed in question, viz., July, 1863, the statute regulating the acknowledgment or proof, made out of the state, of deeds conveying any interest in real estate within the state, for the purpose of being used or of entitling such deeds to be recorded here, was that of February 3, 1834, entitled "An act concerning the authentication of conveyances," as amended by act of February 27, 1840. The first section of the act of 1834 provided that the deed should be acknowledged by the party or parties executing the same, or that the execution thereof by such party or parties should be proved by a subscribing witness thereto, "before the officers hereinafter named, and in the manner and form hereinafter mentioned;" and its second section enacted that no acknowledgment or proof of any such deed "executed or acknowledged out of the state should be taken by an officer or officers aforesaid unless the officer taking the same shall know or have satisfactory proof that the person making such acknowledgment is the individual described in, and who executed, the deed or instrument under seal." Its third section provides, "in addition to the requisites contained in the preceding sections," for the privy examination of married women (residing out of the territory) executing such an instrument; and the fourth section made provisions as to the acknowledgments made out of the territory, but within the United States, and was supplanted and expressly repealed by the above-mentioned act of 1840. This statute, entitled "An act in amendment of" the former act, enacted that all such instruments acknowledged out of the territory, but within the United States or its territories, with the intent to be used or recorded here, should be acknowledged or proved before one of the commissioners appointed under the act of January 24, 1831, and in those cities or counties wherein no commissioner "is or shall be appointed under said law, or in case of his sickness, death, or inability to perform the duties of his office where he may have been appointed," that such acknowledgment and proof might be taken before the chief justice, judge, presiding justice, or president of any court of record of the United States, or of any state or territory thereof, having a seal and a clerk or prothonotary; but that no proof or acknowledgment taken by any such chief justice, judge, presiding justice, or president should entitle such instrument to be recorded, unless taken within some place or district to which the jurisdiction of the court to which he belongs should extend, and that the place of taking such acknowledgment should be set forth in the certificate, and also that the court of which he was such officer was a court of record; and that such certificate of acknowledgment should be accompanied by a certificate of the clerk or prothonotary of the court, under its seal, to the effect that the former officer was duly appointed or authorized as such judge, justice, or president. The fifth section of the act of 1834 relates to acknowledgments or proofs taken out of the United States, but in North or South America or in Europe; and the sixth or remaining section is that the certificate of such acknowledgment, as aforesaid, by the officer before whom the same shall be taken, shall contain and set forth substantially the matter required to be done or proved to make such acknowledgment effectual by this act.

The above legislation is to be found in Thompson's Digest, pp. 181, 182, and McClellan's Digest, pp. 216, 217, the word "state" being properly substituted for that of "territory," when applicable to Florida.

Thus the law as to such acknowledgment or proof stood in 1873; and we may further observe that, up to this time, acknowledgments or proof made in the state had to be made before the officer authorized by law to record the instrument, or before some judicial officer, (Act Nov. 15, 1828; McClell. Dig. § 6, p. 215,) or before a notary public, (Act Feb. 8, 1861; McClell. Dig. § 3, p. 792.)

It is entirely clear that there was in 1863 no law in this state authorizing the admission to record of a deed acknowledged out of the state, and in another state of the United States, before a deputy-clerk or the clerk of any court, nor before even a judge of any such court, not a court of record, and having a seal and clerk or prothonotary; and unless legislation, subsequent to that in force at the time this record was made, has legalized the record, there was no error in the ruling of the judge excluding the transcript as evidence, under section 21 of article 16 of the constitution, which section is as follows: "Deeds and mortgages which have been proved for record, and recorded according to law, shall be taken as prima facie evidence in the courts of this state without requiring proof of the execution. A certified copy of the record of any deed or mortgage that has been or shall be duly recorded according to law shall be admitted as prima facie evidence thereof, and of its due execution, with like effect as the original, duly proved: provided, it be made to appear that the original is not within the custody or control of the party offering such copy."

There was approved by the governor on the 24th day of February, 1873, a statute entitled "An act providing for the acknowledgment of deeds and other conveyances," whose first section, after providing that deeds, executed in this state, of any interest in lands herein, shall be executed in the presence of two witnesses, who shall subscribe their names as such, and that the persons executing such deeds may acknowledge the execution thereof before any judge, clerk of the circuit court, notary public, or justice of the peace within the state, enacts that if any such deed or conveyance of land shall be executed in any other state, territory, or district of the United States, such deed may be executed according to the laws of such state, territory, or district, and the execution thereof may be acknowledged before any judge or clerk of a court of record, notary public, justice of the peace, or other officer authorized by the laws of such state, territory, or district to take the acknowledgment of deeds therein, or before any commissioner appointed by the governor of this state for such purpose. Its second section provides that, if such deed be executed in a foreign country, it may be executed according to the laws of such country, and that any execution thereof may be acknowledged before certain officers designated therein; they being some of those designated in the fifth section of the act of 1834, and others besides. The third section is to the effect that if any such deed or other conveyance shall be executed and acknowledged in any other state or country, before any officer not having an official seal, he shall have attached thereto a certificate of the clerk or other proper certifying officer of a court of record, or certificate of the secretary of state, minister extraordinary, minister resident, charge d'affaires, commissioner, or consul, as the case may be, that the person whose name is subscribed to the certificate of acknowledgment was at the date thereof such officer as he is therein represented to be, that he believes the signature of such person subscribed thereto to be genuine, and that the deed is executed and acknowledged according to the laws of such state, territory, district, or foreign country. The fourth section of this statute is as follows: "Any deed or conveyance heretofore executed and acknowledged in compliance with the provisions of this act shall have the same force and effect, and be as valid, as if the same had been executed after the passage of this act." The fifth or remaining section, providing that future conveyances, not recorded within six months after their execution, shall be void as against subsequent purchasers, was held void, on account of not being within the expression of the title of the act, in Carr v. Thomas, 18 Fla. 736.

A purpose of this act, as applicable to conveyances made in any other state of lands located here, was the adoption of the laws of that state regulating the acknowledgment of conveyances of any interest in real estate located there. This is made entirely clear by the provision of the third section, which requires that the certificate therein provided for, in cases where the officer taking the acknowledgment has no official seal, shall state that the deed "is executed and acknowledged according to the laws of such state, territory, district, or foreign country." This provision implies, beyond doubt, that, wherever an acknowledgment shall be in accordance with the laws of the state where it was executed and acknowledged, it will be sufficient, however wanting it may be in any requisite prescribed by previous laws of our own state as to acknowledging deeds executed beyond its limits. It is unnecessary to stop to inquire if the second section of the act of 1834 is repealed; for, even if it is not, and a deed acknowledged in accordance with its provisions, as amended by the act of 1840, will still be entitled to record, it is entirely clear that the act of 1873 has established at least an additional rule, which renders any acknowledgment made in accordance with the laws of the state where it is executed sufficient, though its certificate does not state, in compliance with former legislation, that the officer taking the acknowledgment knew or had satisfactory proof that the person making it was the individual described in, and who executed, the deed. Had the deed in question been executed, acknowledged, and recorded subsequent to the act of 1873, there would certainly have been nothing in the first objection made to the introduction of the copy of the record thereof; nor is there anything in this objection, if the fourth section, supra, of the act of 1873, is not ineffectual, in so far as applicable to the circumstances of the case before us.

The power of a legislature, in the absence of any inhibiting constitutional limitation, to cure by retroactive legislation defective acknowledgments in all cases where the purpose of the acknowledgment is admission of the instrument acknowledged to record, or its use as evidence, is, except as against prior vested rights, unquestionable. The legislature, when enacting the statutes of 1834 and 1840, could have dispensed with any requirement as to acknowledgments to be found in them; and, this being so, it has the authority, at least in all cases of mere irregularity, or where no vested rights are affected, the power to do the same by subsequent legislation. Cooley, Const. Lim. (5th Ed.) 458, 471; City of Jacksonville v. Basnett, 20 Fla. 525; Webb, Record Title, § 97; Gordon v. Collett, 107 N. C. 362, 12 S. E. Rep. 332; Barto v. Morris, 15

Ohio, 408; Watson v. Mercer, 8 Pet. 88; Buckley v. Early, 72 Iowa, 289, 33 N. W. Rep. 769; Green v. Abrahams, 43 Ark. 420; Johnson v. Richardson, 44 Ark. 365.

The intention of the legislature in enacting the fourth section of the act of 1873 was at least to render valid any irregularity in the acknowledgment of a deed of conveyance of land which had been previously executed in another state, if the execution of the deed and of the acknowledgment were in compliance with the laws of the state where the execution took place. This intention extended to making the acknowledgment as valid, at least, from the approval of the statute, as if at the time of the execution of the acknowledgment the law of this state had provided that deeds of conveyance executed according to the law of the state of their execution might be acknowledged according to the laws of the state regulating the acknowledgment there of deeds of lands located there.

Upon the trial of the cause, the plaintiff, to support the introduction of the above deed as testimony, read in evidence sections 2690, 2705-2707 of the Code of Georgia of 1873. The substance of these sections, so far as material here, is as follows:

Sec. 2690. A deed to lands in Georgia must be in writing, signed by the maker, attested by at least two witnesses, and delivered to the purchaser or some one for him, and be made on a valuable or good consideration.

Sec. 2705. Every deed conveying lands shall be recorded in the office of the clerk of the superior court of the county where the lands lie.

Sec. 2706. To authorize the record of a deed to realty, it must, if executed in Georgia, be attested by a judge of a court of record of that state, or a justice of the peace, or notary public, or the clerk of the superior court in the county in which the three last-mentioned officers, respectively, hold their appointments; or if, subsequent to its execution, the deed is acknowledged in the presence of either of the above-named officers, that fact certified on the deed by such officer shall entitle it to be recorded.

Section 2707 relates to proof by a subscribing witness.

These sections are shown by the Code to be legislation of prior date to the execution and acknowledgment of the deed under discussion.

It is apparent from the first of these sections that the deed, considered as separate from the acknowledgment, was executed in accordance with the law of Georgia; and as it was signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of two subscribing witnesses, such execution was also, we may state, in compliance with our own laws in force at that time, controlling the mere transfer of the title from Hart; and hence the deed is one which, in so far as the conveyance of Hart's fee is concerned, is valid and effectual under the laws of both states.

There was in the Georgia law nothing requiring the certificate to state that the officer taking the acknowledgment knew or had satisfactory proof that a person making an acknowledgment was the individual described in, and who executed, the deed; and, this being so, the first objection made to the acknowledgment and copy of the record offered in evidence fails. Collender Co. v. Brackett, 37 Minn. 58, 33 N. W. Rep. 214; Sanford v. Bulkley, 30 Conn. 344.

The second and fourth objections will be considered together. Reversing the order of their statement, they are, in effect, that the acknowledgment was taken before an officer who had no authority to take it, according to (such being our understanding of the use made of the word "in" by counsel in stating their fourth objection) the laws of this state, and was, moreover, taken before a deputy of such officer, and that a deputy could not take such an acknowledgment.

To decide whether the acknowledgment was made before or taken by an officer recognized by the act of 1873 as competent to take it, we must first ascertain what officer took it. According to the body of the certificate, it was taken before a deputy-clerk of the circuit court of Thomas county, Ga., but, when we look at the signature to the certificate, we find that he does not sign as acting in that capacity, and, moreover, we are not informed that there was any "circuit court" in Georgia. Counsel for appellant contends that the words and initials, "Deputy-Clerk S. & J. C.," stand for and mean, "Deputy-Clerk of Superior Court and Justice of Peace." To reach this conclusion they invoke the aid of the attestation of the deed, in which it will be found that a person of the same name, "T. C. Bracewell," is one of the attesting witnesses; he affixing to his signature there the initials, "J. P." There is no doubt that the instrument acknowledged may be resorted to for support to the acknowledgment. Einstein v. Shouse, 24 Fla. 490, 5 South. Rep. 380; Collender Co. v. Brackett, 37 Minn. 58, 33 N. W. Rep. 214; Owen v. Baker, 101 Mo. 407, 14 S. W. Rep. 175; Wells v. Atkinson, 24 Minn. 161; Samuels v. Shelton, 48 Mo. 444; Sharpe v. Orme, 61 Ala. 263; Carpenter v. Dexter, 8 Wall. 513; Luffborough v. Parker, 12 Serg. & R. 48. In Carpenter v. Dexter, 8 Wall. 513, the deed purported to have been signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of two witnesses, one of whom signed his name as "Wendell, Jr." The certificate of acknowledgment purported to have been taken before and signed by "H. Wendell, Jr., Justice of the Peace," and stated that "the above-named Walter T. Davenport, who has signed and sealed and delivered the above instrument of writing, personally appeared before" such undersigned justice of the peace, and acknowledged the same; but it omitted to state, in the language of the statute, that the person making the acknowledgment was personally known to the officer to be the person who executed the deed, or had been proved by credible witnesses to be such. The court, after observing that "one of the subscribing witnesses was the justice of the peace before whom the acknowledgment was taken," and referring to the above statement of the certificate as following immediately the attestation clause, remarks: "Read thus, with the deed, the certificate amounts to this: that the grantor personally appeared before the officer, and in his presence signed, sealed, and delivered the instrument, and then acknowledged the same before him. An affirmation in the words of the statute could not more clearly express the identity of the grantor with the party making the acknowledgment." In Luffborough v. Parker, 12 Serg. & R. 48, the statute required that deeds should be proved by a subscribing witness, and A. B. made the proof, which did not state that he was a subscribing witness, yet by reference to the deed it appeared from his name that he was one, and the proof was held sufficient. It is apparent that in the former of these cases the identity of the witness and of the person taking the acknowledgment is presumed from identity of name, and that a similar presumption is made in the second case as to the person subscribing the deed as a witness and the one proving its execution; yet the court does not make this presumption supply of itself, in the former case, the express statement as to identity of the grantor and person acknowledging required by the statute to be made. In the other case no corresponding statement as to identity was exacted by the law controlling the certificate of proof of execution. Where a deed is referred to in a certificate in such manner as to connect the former with the latter, or make it substantially a part thereof, as is the case here, and, reading them together, there can be found a substantial compliance with the demands of the statute, the certificate should be sustained; but we cannot supply the statutory requirement of an express statement of a fact in a certificate by a mere presumption of such fact, and for the reason that the officer's statement, and not the presumption, is the evidence expressly called for by the statute to prove the particular fact. This rule is not violated in either of the above cases, nor by our concluding here, as we do, that the witness and deputy-clerk Bracewell were one and the same person. Mott v. Smith, 16 Cal. 534; Hogans v. Carruth, 18 Fla. 588. This conclusion or presumption does not, however, render the certificate of Bracewell sufficient under the second section of the act of 1834; there being absent from it the substantial affirmative statement as to the identity of parties to be found in Carpenter v. Dexter.

The certificate of itself, or aided by the instrument acknowledged, must (unless parol evidence be admissible for such purpose,—a point not presented) show the character of the officer taking the acknowledgment; and, when we have learned this much, we must ascertain whether he was authorized to take it. The title of the officer may be written out fully in the body of the certificate, and when this is done its omission from the signature is immaterial, (Colby v. McOmber, 71 Iowa, 469, 32 N. W. Rep. 459; Brown v. Farran, 3 Ohio, 140;) or it may be affixed to the signature, and, if so, this is, of itself, sufficient, (Devlin, Deeds, § 501; Russ v. Wingate, 30 Miss. 440.) The use of initials generally understood to stand for the title of an office will answer. In Rowley v. Berrian, 12 Ill. 198, where an officer affixed to his signature, "N. P. for the City of Quincy, in Adams County, Illinois," the initials were held to mean "Notary Public;" and "J. P." was decided to signify "Justice of the Peace" in Shattuck v. People, 4 Scam. 477. In Russ v. Wingate, 30 Miss. 440, the certificate began, "State of Mississippi, Hancock county," and concluded: "Given under my hand and seal this day and year above written. LEWIS Y. FOLSOM, J. P. H. C. [Seal.]" There was no other designation of the officer, yet it was held to be a sufficient designation of the officer as a justice of the peace. See, also, Final v. Backus, 18 Mich. 218; Sparrow v. Hovey, 41 Mich. 708, 3 N. W. Rep. 198; State v. Manley, 1 Tenn. 428; Stinson v. Russell, 2 Tenn. 40; Major v. State, 2 Sneed, 15; Burton v. Pettibone, 5 Yerg. 442. In McDonald v. Morgan, 27 Tex. 503, the affidavit of a subscribing witness to a deed executed in Liberty county, Tex., was made March 13, 1838, before a person signing himself, "George W. Miles, R. L. C.," which was followed by a certificate of the record on May 4, 1838, of the deed "in my office," headed "Republic of Texas, Liberty County," and signed as above. A statute in 1841 validated all records of deeds acknowledged before certain officers, among whom was "the clerk of the county court in whose office such record is proposed to be made." The law in force at the time of the record made clerks of the county courts recorders for their respective counties; and it was held that the official character of the officer as clerk of the county court and ex officio recorder was sufficiently indicated. Somewhat on the same line is Owen v. Baker, 101 Mo. 407, 14 S. W. Rep. 175, where there was a certificate giving at the outset the state and county, and signed, "James C. Jackson, Recorder," and stating in the body that the grantor appeared "in open court" and acknowledged the deed; such certificate being followed by a statement similarly signed, 20 days subsequently, to the effect that the subscriber had duly recorded the instrument. The statutes required the acknowledgment to be made before the circuit court of the county wherein the estate was situated, and that the clerk of the court should indorse upon the deed a certificate thereof, "under the seal of the court;" and it also made the clerk of the designated court recorder of deeds. "Jackson, who signed the certificate," says the opinion, "was recorder only by virtue of his office as as circuit clerk. His description of himself, therefore, as recorder, indicated likewise that he was circuit clerk, and, with the recitals in the acknowledgment, made it clear that it was taken by him as clerk. As circuit clerk, he was authorized to take the acknowledgment, but as recorder he had no such authority. * * * In this case the acts of the sheriff [the grantor] and court, described in the certificate of Jackson, were valid if performed before him as clerk, but not as recorder."

Not only do the courts hold initials sufficient to indicate the character of the officer taking an acknowledgment, but they do not permit clerical errors to defeat or render acknowledgments ineffectual, when they, considered alone, or read in connection with the instrument acknowledged, fairly show a substantial compliance with the statute. In Blythe v. Houston, 46 Tex. 65, 79, there was offered in evidence a certified copy of the record of a deed, which was objected to on the ground that the certificate of acknowledgment did not show of what county the officer giving the certificate was notary public, nor that he was a notary public when the acknowledgment was taken. The certificate commenced, "The state of Texas, county of Hopkins," and recited the appearance of the parties before the "undersigned authority," and concluded, "Witness my hand and official seal at Douglass, this 6th day of October, A. D. 1854," being signed, "John R. Clute, Notary Public N. C." "The objection" says the supreme court of Texas, "was, we think, properly overruled. * * * The discrepancy between the county named in the outset, and the letters designating his county, appended to the signatures, might easily be accounted for, and certainly was not of sufficient importance to invalidate the record." In reaching this conclusion the court remarks that McDonald v. Morgan, supra, "is nearly in point as to the sufficiency of the signature, which, it must be assumed, was authenticated with the official seal of the notary, showing the words, 'Notary Public County of ——, Texas.'" Bank v. Harrison, 39 Mo. 433, is a case in which the notary public who took the acknowledgment of a deed offered in evidence described himself in the body of the acknowledgment as a notary public within and for the county of Livingston, but appended to his signature his official character in the following words: "Notary Public Howard County;" and the supreme court said they were inclined to think that the deed should have been admitted, but, being excluded, there was still evidence enough to show a prima facie right to recover. In Agan v. Shannan, 103 Mo. 661, 15 S. W. Rep. 757, the certificate of acknowledgment, after stating that W. L. H. Frazier appeared in the probate court, in open court, and acknowledged the deed, concluded, including the signature, as follows: "In testimony whereof, I, W. L. H. Frazier, judge of said court, have hereunto set my hand and affixing my private seal. * * * M. L. WYRICK, Probate Judge." A private seal was affixed, and there was also a statement that no seal of office had yet been provided. It was held, overruling Lincoln v. Thompson, 75 Mo. 623, that the certificate was good.

Viewing the certificate of acknowledgment in the light of the Georgia law, it must be held sufficient if we can learn from the certificate, either alone or aided by the instrument acknowledged, that the acknowledgment was made before or taken by any officer authorized by such law to do so. From the Georgia law, as proved, it appears that, among other officers, either a clerk of a superior court or a justice of the peace could take in that state an acknowledgment of a conveyance of land situate therein; and hence, if the description following and constituting a part of the signature fairly indicates either of these officers, the acknowledgment must be sustained. Invoking, as we lawfully may and properly should do, the aid of the attestation of the deed, our conclusion is that each of the above official capacities is sufficiently indicated. The final "C." may, in the light of the authorities, be regarded as a clerical error, and intended for a "P.;" and, so treating it, the quotation would read, "Deputy-Clerk of the Superior, and Justice of the Peace." The omission of the word "Court," or the letter "C.," as standing for "Court," after the letter "S.," cannot be regarded as material; but its absence, in view of the liberal principles of law always obtaining and to be applied in support of these instruments, will be supplied. The letter "S." can, in view of the Georgia law, be given no other signification than as standing for "Superior;" and informed as we are, by this law, that a clerk of the superior court may perform the official functions in question, we must elect between ignoring the clear indication of the words "Deputy-Clerk Superior," and defeating the acknowledgment, or of regarding them in the light of the statute and supplying the word "Court" as a clerical omission, and sustaining the certificate. Instruments like these, say the authorities, must be construed ut res magis valeat, quam pereat, and in dealing with them it should be the aim of the courts to preserve and not to destroy. Einstein v. Shouse, 24 Fla. 490, 5 South. Rep. 380; Kelly v. Calhoun, 95 U. S. 710; Carpenter v. Dexter, supra; Touchard v. Crow, 20 Cal. 150, 160. It is the policy of the law, observes the supreme court of Minnesota in Collender Co. v. Brackett, supra, to uphold certificates of this character; and, wherever substance is found, obvious clerical errors and all technical omissions or defects will be disregarded. Again, should we read, as it might be said we should, the final "C." as standing for or intended to indicate the word "Court," so that the entire suffix to the signature should read, "Deputy-Clerk of Superior and Justice Court," it seems to us entirely clear and reasonable to hold that thus read, in connection with the attestation, it was intended by the officer to indicate his dual official capacity of clerk and justice. If nothing followed the signature but "J. C." or "Justice Court," we would be obliged, in view of the attestation and the law, to hold that it was a clerical error or an inaccuracy, and intended to indicate the official character of justice of the peace; and it is nothing more than reasonable to hold that the last two initials, if to be read, the former as "Justice," and the latter as "Court" or "Courts," were used, the former as standing for "Justice," and the latter as applying, not only to it, but also to "Superior" as indicated by the letter "S." Again, if it is to be assumed that "J." does not stand for "Justice," but for some other word, there is still enough to signify the office of clerk of the superior court.

Inartificialness in the execution of these instruments cannot be permitted to defeat them, if, looking at them as a whole, we find that they reasonably and fairly indicate a compliance with the law.

In reaching this conclusion, we have not overlooked the use of the word "circuit" in the body of the certificate. Our judgment as to this is that, in the absence of evidence that there is any such court in Georgia, the suffix to the signature must control, as showing that the person taking the acknowledgment was acting in the authorized official capacity indicated by it, and that the word "circuit" was written at least unadvisedly, even if by the officer himself, and is to be controlled by the designation following his signature, which is to be presumed to have been made by him, and to have been a subsequent, if not the last, act in the matter. Carlisle v. Carlisle, 78 Ala. 542.

In what has been said, the fact that the acknowledgment was taken by a deputy, if taken in the capacity of clerk of the superior court, instead of that of a justice of the peace, has not been noticed. In Hope v. Sawyer, 14 Ill. 254, a question arose upon the legality of the record in Illinois of a deed acknowledged in Missouri; the certificate of acknowledgment being signed in the name of the clerk of the circuit court, "by E. Baker, Deputy-Clerk." It was objected that the acknowledgment should have been made before, and certified to by, the clerk, in person. "The objection," says the opinion, "is not well founded. The acknowledgment purports to have been taken by the clerk, and it is certified in his name and under the seal of the court. Prima facie, this is sufficient. The seal of the court proves itself, and we must presume that it was affixed by the proper officer. The presumption is that the clerk was authorized by the laws of Missouri to act through a deputy, and that Baker was regularly appointed as such. The deputy had the power to use the name of the clerk, and attach the seal of the court. * * * The certificate in question was none the less the act of the clerk because made by his authorized deputy." Devl. Deeds, § 475; Webb, Record Title, § 62. In Small v. Field, 102 Mo. 104, 14 S. W. Rep. 815, where an acknowledgment of a deed to land in Missouri, taken before a deputy-clerk of a territorial district court in Washington Territory, was held sufficient, notwithstanding the statutes of the United States providing for the appointment of the clerk of such court made no provision for a deputy, though deputy-clerks of territorial courts are expressly spoken of elsewhere in the statutes, the supreme court of Missouri observed: "If necessary to uphold this certificate, we would presume that a law of the territorial legislature was in existence, authorizing the appointment of a deputy-clerk. * * * Moreover, the seal of the court, being affixed to the certificate, carries with it prima facie evidence that it was rightfully affixed, and throws the burden of overcoming the prima facie case thus made on the objectors to the sufficiency of the certificate." Musser v. Johnson, 42 Mo. 74.

In the case before us, it is to be presumed, from the words of the certificate to such effect, that the seal of office of the clerk of the superior court was impressed upon the original certificate. The absence from the record or from the transcript of such seal, or anything as representing it, is not sufficient to overcome the presumption created by such words. The ordinary provisions of statutes regulating the recording of instruments do not contemplate the inscription of public official seals upon the record. Devl. Deeds, § 700; Webb, Record Title, § 74; Geary v. City of Kansas, 61 Mo. 378; Hammond v. Gordon, 93 Mo. 223, 6 S. W. Rep. 93; Ingoldsby v. Juan, 12 Cal. 564; Smith v. Dall, 13 Cal. 510; Jones v. Martin, 16 Cal. 166; Griffin v. Sheffield, 38 Miss. 359; Hedden v. Overton, 4 Bibb, 406; Sneed v. Ward, 5 Dana, 187; Ballard v. Perry, 28 Tex. 347; Witt v. Harlan, 66 Tex. 660, 2 S. W. Rep. 41; Coffey v. Hendricks, 66 Tex. 676, 2 S. W. Rep. 47; Gale v. Shillock, (Dak.) 29 N. W. Rep. 666. In Jones v. Martin, supra, where, as here, the body of the certificate indicated a seal by apt words, the words "No seal" appeared in the certified copy, where the notarial seal should have been; and it was held that these words did not imply that no seal was affixed to the instrument by the notary who took the acknowledgment, but was a mere note of the recorder of the place of the notarial seal, which he probably had no means of recording, and which it was not necessary that he should record.

As it is to be presumed from these words of the certificate that a seal was impressed upon the original, the only distinction between the case at bar and those cited from Illinois and Missouri is that here the certificate is signed by the deputy simply in his own name, without using that of the clerk. There is conflict of authority as to how such certificates of acknowledgment should be executed when they are made by deputies. In Tennessee it was held (Beaumont v. Yeatman, 8 Humph. 542) that such certificates should be in the name of the deputy; and likewise, in a late case in Georgia, where an acknowledgment was taken out of the state, (MacKenzie v. Jackson, 82 Ga. 80, 8 S. E. Rep. 77;) and in California a certificate was held valid which stated that "before me, the undersigned, county clerk of Sonoma county, personally appeared * * *," and was signed, "John A. Brewster, Deputy County Clerk of Sonoma County," the principal's name not appearing, (Touchard v. Crow, 20 Cal. 150.) See, also, Rose v. Newman, 26 Tex. 131; Cook v. Knott, 28 Tex. 85. In Talbott's Devisees v. Hooser, 12 Bush, 408, where the acknowledgment was in fact taken by the deputy-clerk, but the name of the clerk alone was signed by such deputy to the certificate, the acknowledgment was decided by the supreme court of Kentucky to be valid, and this, too, although the deputy was a minor; the statute not prescribing the qualifications of a deputy.

The doctrine of this case is that all official acts should be done in the name of the clerk, and not in that of the deputy. The view expressed in Devlin on Deeds (section 474) is that the signature of the deputy alone does not invalidate the acknowledgment, but that the better practice is for the deputy to sign the name of the principal, by himself as deputy. That this is the better rule in all cases where a deputy acts, we will not deny; but in view of the conflict of authority, and the liberal views governing, in cases of these acknowledgments, we cannot hold this certificate invalid on account of the manner in which the deputy has signed, but must regard it as sufficient in this aspect; and this being so, and the presumption being that the official seal of the clerk of the superior court of Thomas county, Ga., was affixed to the original certificate of acknowledgment, and rightfully so, (Touchard v. Crow, Small v. Field, supra,) the certificate must be sustained, though executed by a deputy and in another state. That the act is one which in its nature may be performed by a deputy cannot be denied, (Devl. Deeds, § 473; Webb, Record Title, § 62;) and there is, in view of the authorities cited above as to deputies, and the manner in which they may sign, in the fact that the name of the clerk does not appear, nothing to except this certificate from the rule which presumes, prima facie, that the appointment of Bracewell as the deputy-clerk was valid. Hope v. Sawyer and Small v. Field, supra.

If we refer the taking of the acknowledgment to Bracewell's capacity as justice of the peace, then the certificate shows that he had an official seal, as such officer; and no other evidence of such capacity is required by the act of 1873, supra.

In Carpenter v. Dexter, supra, it is announced as law that where one state recognizes acts done in pursuance of the laws of another state the courts of the former will take judicial cognizance of those laws, so far as may be necessary, to determine the validity of the acts alleged to be in conformity with them. We find no other decision to this effect; the general rule being that the statute law of another state is to be proved according to the law of the former, in which the trial is had. Tuten v. Gazan, 18 Fla. 751; Session v. Reynolds, 7 Smedes & M. 130; Whart. Ev. § 302; Greenl. Ev. §§ 486, 489. We may remark, however, that we are not advised that the application of the rule announced by the supreme court of the United States would have led to a conclusion against the validity of the acknowledgment in question.

A further question, suggesting itself, is, what effect is to be given the fact that the record in Marion county was made before the act of 1873? Does this fact except such record, or a transcript thereof, from the effect of the provision of our constitution set out above? The act of 1873 was, in effect, an amendment of the existing prior legislation referred to in this opinion. As has been shown in the statement of that legislation, a purpose of it was the regulation of the acknowledgment and proof, made out of the state, of deeds of lands here, for the purpose of their being used or recorded here. Upon the approval of the act of 1873 the acknowledgment of the deed became as valid as it would have been, from the date of its execution, had it been acknowledged after the approval of the act; and a record of this deed, made upon the originally defective acknowledgment, immediately after the statute became operative, would have been as valid, for all purposes involved in this cause, as if the deed had been acknowledged subsequent to the approval of the statute. This deed, as acknowledged, standing upon the record, as it did, at the time the act became effective, we see no good reason why the record was not, from that time, as valid as if it had been made immediately after the approval of the statute; or, in other words, why it was not duly recorded from that time. Such, we think, was the logical and necessary effect of the statute upon the existing record. The deed was duly recorded from that time, and the record or a certified copy was admissible, under the section of the constitution set out above. East v. Pugh, 71 Iowa, 162, 32 N. W. Rep. 309; Fowler v. Merrill, 11 How. 375.

No objection that the original was not within the custody or control of the party offering the copy appears to have been made, and hence we conclude that this requirement was complied with or waived.

That the officer acted within his jurisdiction appears sufficiently upon the face of the certificate. Devl. Deeds, §§ 482, 486.

Other assignments of error need not be noticed.

The judgment must be reversed and remanded for proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion. It will be so ordered.

PARKER, Treasurer, et al. v. STATE, to Use of SUMMIT BANK.

(Supreme Court of Mississippi. Feb. 22, 1892.)

PUBLIC SCHOOLS—APPLICATION OF SCHOOL FUND.

Under act of March 18, 1886, changing the public school year so as to begin on October 1st and end on September 30th, instead of beginning January 1st and ending December 31st, as provided by the Code of 1880, the taxes levied for school purposes by the county supervisors, on or before September 1st of each year, were not made applicable to the expenses for the year following that in which they were imposed, but continued, as under the Code of 1880, applicable to the expenses of the year in which they were imposed, until the passage of act of February 22, 1890, which distinctly declares that all school funds "received and collected" within the scholastic year shall constitute the common-school fund of the county of that scholastic year.

Appeal from circuit court, Amite county; W. P. CASSEDY, Judge.

Action by the state, for the use of the Summit Bank, against James A. Parker, treasurer of Amite county, and the sureties on his official bond. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

D. C. Bramlett, for appellants. T. McKnight, for appellee.

COOPER, J. This suit was brought against Parker, treasurer of Amite county, and the sureties upon his official bond, to recover for the use of the Bank of Summit the amount of 71 school warrants issued by proper authority to the teachers in the public schools of said county during the scholastic year beginning October 1, 1889, and ending September 30, 1890. Parker's term of office began on the first Monday of January, A. D. 1890. The facts proved, or offered to be proved, were that the warrants sued upon were legally issued, and are now owned by the usee, the Bank of Summit; that they were issued to teachers for services rendered for the scholastic year beginning October 1, 1889; that $8,000 of the taxes levied for school purposes at the September, 1889, meeting of the board of supervisors was received by the defendant Parker, a large part of which was paid to him by the tax collector in school-warrants issued between January 1, 1889, and October 1st of that year; and that the treasurer paid out as much as $2,000 of that fund on warrants issued between those dates; and also that the school fund for the year beginning October 1, 1889, was exhausted by such and other lawful disbursements. On these facts the court instructed the jury to find for the plaintiff, which was accordingly done, and from a judgment on the verdict the defendants appeal.

It will be seen that the single question presented in this cause is whether the taxes levied by the county authorities in September, 1889, were appropriable under the law to school warrants issued to teachers for services rendered in the scholastic year beginning October 1, 1888. To determine this question it will be necessary to examine the statutes upon the subject. By the Code of 1880 a consistent and complete scheme for the maintenance of public schools was provided. The principal funds were directed to be provided by state distribution, and by the levy of local taxes by county or municipal authorities. Of these, the principal or original fund was that supplied by the state, which was to be supplemented by the imposition of local taxes. The scholastic year began on January 1st, and ended with the 31st day of December. By section 724 of the Code, it was provided that, whenever the amount of the school fund in the state treasury in any fiscal year should not amount to $200,000, the state treasurer should transfer from the general fund to the common-school fund a sufficient amount to make the sum of the school fund $200,000. By section 725 it was provided that this fund should be distributed among the several counties of the state, according to the number of educable children therein, which distribution was to be made by the auditor on the second Monday of July and January. Section 727 required the treasurer of each county "to make a report to the county superintendent of education on or before the 1st day of July, annually, showing the amount of the school fund, if any, in the treasury, and the amount that can be made available during the current year for common-school purposes, as nearly as he can make said estimate from data accessible to him." By section 698, the county superintendent of education was directed "to make a report to the board of supervisors, on the first Monday in July, annually, of the number of schools established, or to be established, in the county for the current scholastic year; the monthly cost of maintaining each, and the total monthly cost; the amount of common-school funds in the treasury, or to be in the treasury, available for the common schools of the year; and the amount necessary to be added thereto, to maintain the schools five months, and to pay the salary of the county superintendent." By section 730, the board of supervisors of each county was required, "on or before the first Monday in September, annually, to levy a tax upon the taxable property of such county not to exceed three mills on the dollar, to be collected as other county taxes for general purposes, and at the same time, and to be paid into the county treasury to the credit of the common-school fund, to make up any deficiency in the aggregate amount of common-school funds arising from other sources, necessary to maintain the public free schools of said county during the time required by law."

It thus appears that under the Code of 1880 the school fund for each year (aside from sums received as poll-taxes) consisted of the state distribution, supplemented by the sum derived by the levy of the county tax. Of this there was received one-half the state fund in July of the scholastic year, and the other half in January following, and the sums derived from the levy of the tax by the board of supervisors as the same was collected by tax collectors, whether the same was paid by the tax-payer or collected by sale of his property. The fund derived from the county taxes belonged to the year in which it was imposed, whether collected during that year or after its expiration. The scheme was an annual one, as was decided in Foote v. Brown, 60 Miss. 155. On the 18th of March, 1886, there was approved an act entitled "An act in relation to free public schools," under the provisions of which, it is contended by the appellee, a different application of the county tax was made. It is said by appellee that while, under the Code of 1880, the tax levied by the board of supervisors at its September meeting in the year 1886 would have been a part of the common-school fund of that year, the effect of the act of March 18th was to withdraw it from the fund for the year 1886, and carry it forward as a part of the fund for the next ensuing scholastic year, and that, as a necessary consequence, the tax of each succeeding year was appropriable to the school fund of the scholastic year next following its levy. The act of March 18, 1886, presents difficulties of construction, as is generally the case with crude and imperfect legislation. Under the Code of 1880, the current and scholastic years were identical, and the scheme provided for the support of the schools was symmetrical and complete. By the sixty-fifth section of the act of 1886, the scholastic year was changed so as to begin on October 1st and end on September 30th; but the provisions of the Code of 1880 having reference to the current year, and intelligible there as applied to the scholastic year, because the current and scholastic years were the same, were brought forward in totidem verbis into the act of 1886, under which the scholastic year differed from the current one. The act, by express provisions, repealed the Code chapter, except sections 732 to 744, inclusive, which unrepealed sections have no reference to the question under consideration. It is improbable, impossible to say when the legislature intended the act to become operative. By section 78 it is declared "that this act shall be in force from and after the 1st of September, 1886: provided, that sections 37 to 45, inclusive, and such other sections as may be necessary to put this act into operation, be in force from and after its passage." This language would seem to indicate that the act was to be "operative" from the date of its approval, but not to be "in force" until September. What, if anything, was meant by this section we do not attempt to discover. It is certain that the scholastic year 1886 was contracted by the act so as to end on September 30, 1886, instead of December 31st, as it would have done under the Code of 1880. But we are unable to discover a purpose on the part of the legislature to withdraw any portion of the fund for that scholastic year. The only portion of the act tending to indicate such purpose is the provision of section 12 that the superintendents of the several counties shall, on the first Monday of July, annually, make a report to the board of supervisors of the number of schools established in the county for the current scholastic year, the monthly cost of maintaining each, and the total monthly cost; the amount of common-school funds in the treasury, or to be in the treasury, for the common schools of the next year; and the amount necessary to be added thereto to maintain the schools five months, and to pay the salary of the county superintendent. But, by the seventy-second section of the act, the county treasurer, who furnishes the superintendent with the data upon which his estimate is to be made, was required to make report to him of the amount "in the treasury, and the amount that can be made available during the current year for common-school purposes." The seventy-fifth section of the act, prescribing the duty of the board of supervisors in levying the tax for school purposes, is identical with section 730 of the Code, under which we have seen that the tax levied would clearly have been for the scholastic year 1886.

A construction of the act by which the tax levied in September, 1886, should be carried to the next scholastic year, would be manifestly unjust to those who had rendered services as teachers during the year commencing January 1, 1886, in that it would leave no sufficient fund for their payment. Another result of this construction would be to cut from the school fund its center, leaving the distribution of the state fund made in July, 1886, to the scholastic year 1886, and then carrying to the next scholastic year the county tax levied in September, and payable in October, and then turning back to the year 1886 the state distribution of January, 1887. As opposed to this construction is the certain fact that the whole of the state fund for the scholastic year 1886 remained appropriable to that year, and that by section 5 of article 8 of the constitution no county neglecting to maintain the public schools for a period of at least four months was entitled to participate in the state distribution. It ought not to be assumed that the legislature intended either to permit the distribution of the state fund to a county failing to comply with the condition prescribed by the constitution, or that it intended to disable it from compliance by withholding permission from the local authorities to raise, by taxation, a sum sufficient for the support of the common schools, so as to entitle the counties to receive the state distribution. We are therefore of opinion that the county taxes levied by the board of supervisors in September, 1889, was under the act of March 18, 1886, appropriable to the payment of school-warrants issued in the scholastic year beginning October 1, 1888, and ending September 30, 1889. By the ninth section an act entitled "An act to amend the school law," approved February 22, 1890, it is declared that "all school funds received and collected within the scholastic year shall constitute the common-school fund of the county of that scholastic year." Under the view we have taken of the act of 1886, all taxes for common-school funds levied in September were appropriable to the scholastic year then current. The act of February 22, 1890, distinctly and unmistakably announces a different rule. But it does not appear that the appellant Parker, as county treasurer, made any payments after February 22, 1890, on warrants of the preceding scholastic year, or that he received from the tax collector any such warrants received by the tax collector after that time. Since the warrants for the scholastic year ending September 30, 1889, were entitled to be paid by the taxes collected under the levy made on the first Monday of that month, until the passage of the act of February 22, 1890, it is not shown that appellant has in any respect made an unlawful application of the school fund. The tax-payer had the right to pay his school taxes in the warrants for the payment of which the tax was levied, and the collector was entitled to a credit for such as he had received before the enactment of the act of 1890. So, also, the treasurer might lawfully pay out the funds in his hands on such warrants before the passage of said act. There is nothing in the record to show any disbursement of the fund after February 22, 1890. If that fact was shown, the only question presented would be whether it was competent for the legislature to divert the fund raised for the payment of the warrants of the year 1889 to the school fund of the next year,—a question upon which it is not now necessary to express any opinion. Judgment reversed.

BOWIE v. GREENVILLE ST. RY. CO.

STREET RAILWAYS—INJURY TO PASSENGER—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—ALIGHTING.

In an action against a street-railway company for personal injuries, a complaint alleging that plaintiff, while a passenger on defendant's car, requested to be put off at a certain point, and, in expectation that the car would stop as requested, got on the rear step so as to be ready to alight, and that the car, instead of stopping, was so negligently run as to throw him to the ground, and injure him, is not demurrable on the ground that it shows contributory negligence on plaintiff's part.

Appeal from circuit court, Washington county; R. W. WILLIAMSON, Judge.

Action by Louis Bowie against the Greenville Street-Railway Company for personal injuries. The amended declaration alleged that plaintiff went upon defendant's car, requested to be put off at a certain point, and, in expectation that the car would stop as requested, went to the rear of the car, and got on the step, so as to be ready to get off; that, instead of stopping as was expected, the car was so negligently run as to throw him to the ground, and injure him. A demurrer was sustained to the declaration, on the ground that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence; and, plaintiff declining to amend further, judgment was rendered against him. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wilford H. Smith, for appellant. Jayne & Watson, for appellee.

CAMPBELL, C. J. The demurrer to the amended declaration should have been overruled. The special cause of demurrer is that the declaration shows that plaintiff's negligence contributed to the injury complained of. We are not willing to affirm that the fact that the plaintiff got on the step at the rear end of the car ready to descend to the ground, under the circumstances stated in the declaration, constituted contributory negligence on his part. The averment is that he had requested the car to be stopped, and, in the confident belief that it would be stopped, he put himself in a position to alight, and "he was by the negligence and carelessness of said company's driver thrown from said car," and injured. The declaration requires an answer. Reversed, demurrer overruled, and cause remanded.

NOGALES CLUB v. STATE.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—SALES BY SOCIAL CLUB.

A social club, having a back room partly disconnected from its parlors and fitted up with a sideboard from which drinks are sold by a salaried steward to members and visitors at a price fixed, under the laws of the club, by a "governing committee," is, if drinks are so sold without a license, or to a minor member, indictable under the law prohibiting unlicensed retailing, and sales to minors, and declaring (Code, § 1112) that any person who shall directly or by any evasion or subterfuge violate any provisions of the act shall be liable to indictment.

Appeal from circuit court, Warren county; J. D. GILLAND, Judge.

Indictment against the Nogales club for selling intoxicating liquors without a license, and for selling to a minor. From a judgment of conviction, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

It appeared that defendant was a social club organized for social pleasures of its members; that the club-house had rooms fitted up as parlors and dancing halls, for use of members, their families, and lady friends; but that in a back room, disconnected partly from the other rooms, there was fitted up a sideboard or bar from which "drinks," intoxicating and otherwise, were sold to members and visitors at a price fixed, under the laws of the club, by the "governing committee" of the club, and that the liquors were thus sold and dispensed by a steward who was regularly employed by the club on a salary, but who had no interest in the sale of the liquors. One Cloud was a minor, and a member of the club, by permission of his parents, but liquor was sold to all members of the club by the regularly employed steward, without a license to retail, and was sold to said Cloud without the knowledge or permission of his parents.

Dabney & McCabe, for appellant. T. M. Miller, Atty. Gen., for the State.

CAMPBELL, C. J. We unhesitatingly adopt as sound the views of those courts which have held that such a device as was resorted to by the appellant in disposing of vinous and spirituous liquor was a violation of the law against unlicensed retailing. State v. Mercer, 32 Iowa, 405; Marmont v. State, 48 Ind. 21; Rickart v. People, 79 Ill. 85; Martin v. State, 59 Ala. 34; State v. Lockyear, 95 N. C. 633. It must be so, unless an association of persons may lawfully do what none of the individuals could, and it would be a reproach to the law if this were so. "If any person shall directly, or by any evasion or subterfuge, violate any provision of this act, then the person so offending (and also any person who may own or have any interest in any vinous or spirituous liquor sold contrary to this act) shall be liable to indictment," etc. Code, § 1112. Under this language there is no ground for controversy as to the guilt of appellant.

Affirmed.

GREENVILLE ICE & COAL CO. v. CITY OF GREENVILLE.

TAXATION—EXEMPTIONS—ICE FACTORIES.

Act March 9, 1882, entitled "An act to encourage the establishment of factories in this state, and to exempt them from taxation," and (section 1) declaring exempt from taxation for 10 years the machinery used for the manufacture of cotton or woolen goods, yarns or fabrics composed of these or other materials, or for the making of all kinds of machinery or implements of husbandry, "or all other things or articles not prohibited by law," exempts only machinery used for making articles of like character with the articles enumerated, and does not exempt ice factories.

Appeal from circuit court, Washington county; R. W. WILLIAMSON, Judge.

The city of Greenville levied a tax on the factory of the Greenville Ice & Coal Company, which tax was resisted upon the ground that the factory was exempt. There was judgment in favor of the city, and the company appeals. Affirmed.

Jayne & Watson and Calhoon & Green, for appellant. Campbell & Starling, for appellee.

WOODS, J. The language of the statute entitled "An act to encourage the establishment of factories in this state, and to exempt them from taxation," approved March 9, 1882, is marvelously infelicitous in many, and absolutely meaningless in some, of its parts, if its letter is rigidly adhered to. The statute in its first section declares exempt from taxation, for a period of 10 years, "the machinery used for the manufacture of cotton or woolen goods, yarns or fabrics composed of these or other materials, or for the making of all kinds of machinery or implements of husbandry, or all other things or articles not prohibited by law," etc. It would seem, from an attentive examination of this language, that the legislative intention was to encourage the establishment of manufacturing enterprises in this state, to the extent of exempting from taxation, for the period named: (1) Machinery used for the manufacture of cotton and woolen goods, and other fabrics composed of like materials; and (2) machinery used for making all kinds of machinery or implements of husbandry, and all other articles or things of like character with those last enumerated. The words "not prohibited by law" convey no meaning, and may be disregarded in any effort to ascertain the construction of the statute, inasmuch as neither the manufacture of any textile fabrics, nor machinery nor agricultural implements, nor any other manufactured product are prohibited by law. The general words, "all other articles or things not prohibited by law," by a well-known rule of statutory interpretation, must be referred to the particular words which they immediately follow, and will include only articles or things ejusdem generis with those specifically enumerated, unless the context clearly requires that the general words shall be construed in their larger signification. We nowhere find in the act any words or provisions indicative of a clear legislative purpose to extend the exemption further than the specifically enumerated cases, and others of like character. It must not be forgotten, too, that this well-known rule of interpretation is of special application and force in seeking to ascertain the legislative intent in statutes which require strict construction. Statutes imposing burdens of taxation receive strict construction, and statutes exempting from the common burden of taxation must likewise receive such construction. Furthermore, if we look to the fourth section of this very obscure and imperfect statute, the foregoing view will receive strong confirmation. This fourth section, if it means anything, declares that all capital hereafter employed in canning factories and capital employed in the operation of the Clement's attachment shall be exempt from taxation, as provided in the first and second sections of the act. Now, canning factories and the Clement's attachment are not ejusdem generis with the specifically enumerated cases exempted from taxation in the first section of the act. They were not included in the words, "all other articles or things not prohibited by law," and are therefore themselves specifically named for exemption in the fourth section. This exemption of canning factories, etc., in the fourth section, is wholly idle and meaningless if all factories, of every character and description, had already been exempted by the general words in section 1 which we have been considering. The statute must be held to mean all those other manufactured articles or things of character similar to the particular classes just then enumerated, to-wit, machinery used for making machinery or implements used in husbandry. The party pleading exemption from taxation has imposed upon him the burden of clearly showing his title to the immunity claimed, and, if his right may be fairly said to remain in doubt, the claim must be denied. We are of opinion that factories for the manufacture of ice are not entitled to the exemption provided by the statute. Affirmed.

STATE v. HEMINGWAY et al.

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—MORTGAGE TO INDEMNIFY SURETY—VALIDITY—EQUITY—DISMISSAL OF BILL.

1. A deed by a defaulting state treasurer of all his property, in trust to indemnify the sureties on his bond, is valid, and takes precedence of any lien the state may subsequently acquire by judgment against him.

2. Such a deed is not objectionable, because it is to indemnify the sureties on different bonds given by the grantor for several terms during which he held office, and is subject to the subsequent ascertainment as to during which term the default occurred, and which set of sureties is liable.

3. Nor is such deed rendered invalid by the failure of the trustee to take possession and control of the property immediately after its execution.

4. Where a suit in equity has reached a stage where defendants are interested in having a decree previously rendered maintained, and other matters settled, in order that justice may be done between them, and a further decree is necessary, complainant cannot dismiss the bill without their consent.

Cross-appeals from chancery court, Hinds county; H. C. CONN, Chancellor.

Bill by the state against W. L. Hemingway and others. Hemingway was state treasurer, and when his term of office expired he failed to turn over to his successor certain moneys belonging to the state which were reported by him to be in his hands. Pending the investigation of the treasury books to ascertain the amount of the default, he executed a deed of all his property to a trustee for the benefit of the sureties on his several official bonds, he having occupied the office of treasurer for several terms, and it then being unknown when the default occurred, or which bond was bound. The deed provided that the property should be sold, and the proceeds used, for the benefit of those sureties who should have to answer the demand of the state, should any default be finally ascertained. The bill was filed by the state to cancel the deed, and to subject the property conveyed thereby to the claim of the state against Hemingway, leaving the state afterwards to go against his sureties for any balance. The defendants answered, claiming the right of Hemingway to indemnify his sureties. There was a decree upholding the conveyance, and dismissing the bill, except in so far as to require that the trustee should pay over all money in his hands, and to come into his hands, in liquidation, pro tanto, of the judgment against the sureties. The state appealed generally, and the defendants appealed because the bill was dismissed over their objection. Affirmed on the state's appeal, and reversed on the appeal of defendants.

T. M. Miller, Atty. Gen., for the State. Nugent & McWillie, W. P. Harris, J. B. Harris, and Calhoon & Green, for defendants.

CAMPBELL, C. J. An unbroken line of adjudged cases and text-books sustains the proposition that a mortgage for indemnity of sureties is valid,—the liability of the surety being a sufficient consideration for such a mortgage,—and such a conveyance will be held to have precedence of any subsequent lien on the property incumbered. This is the undoubted rule as between individuals, and we are not aware of any distinction between the rights of parties to obligations to the state and others, and fail to perceive why a principal debtor to the state may not indemnify the sureties on his bond to the state, in the same manner as if the obligation was to an individual. Indeed, there is greater reason for sustaining an indemnity by a principal of his sureties as against the state than in case of private persons, for the state takes no account of the property of its official. That is not looked to by the state. It makes no distinction between a millionaire and a pauper in this matter. The same bond is required of all incumbents alike, without regard to what they may possess, or what may be their character or habits. The prescribed bond is the security the state exacts in all cases alike. Individuals in their dealings may be largely influenced by the solvency and wealth of a principal debtor, and his character and business capacity and habits, and may be less exacting as to the sureties required because of the large property of the principal. Not so with the state, as already stated. If, then, it is the unquestioned right of the sureties of a principal debtor to a private creditor to receive indemnity, a fortiori should the right of sureties of a public debtor to have indemnity be recognized and upheld. The state did not look to the individual means of its officer in approving the bond he gave for each term as the condition of being qualified for the office, but the persons who became his sureties on the bonds may have been largely influenced to become such because of his possessions and prospects. Therefore there was nothing in the situation to preclude the valid execution by Hemingway of a conveyance of his effects for the indemnity of the sureties on his several official bonds. Nor do we think the conveyance he made was subject to legal exception because of the contingency expressed in it on which it was to be made available to the payment of ascertained liability in exoneration of the sureties. It is true that, being for the indemnity of sureties on several bonds, it necessarily contemplated ascertainment of liability or nonliability as to each of the bonds before it could be known how to apply the property conveyed; but there is nothing in that to condemn the conveyance. The mere fact that delay may occur in settlement of rights growing out of a conveyance of property as security is not a valid objection to it. The delay here contemplated is only that incident to legal proceedings necessary to adjust the rights of the several beneficiaries of the conveyance. The state has no right to complain of this delay as an objection to the conveyance by Hemingway, for, as we have seen, its security prescribed by itself was the bond; and the conveyance for indemnity, being valid, created a lien entitled to precedence over any lien the state could acquire by judgment against Hemingway; and besides, the conveyance, being for the payment of his liability to the state, in exoneration of his sureties, was enforceable by the state for that purpose, and has actually been so enforced by the decree made. On all of which grounds we conclude that the conveyance was not involved. Nor do we find any ground to condemn it upon the facts attending and following its execution, all of which are explained in such manner as to uphold the conveyance. It is not an assignment, and subject to the strict rules in such cases, but a mortgage enforceable on a contingency consisting of future developments; and the failure of the trustee to take complete and exclusive possession and control of the property immediately after the conveyance, and the dealing with the property for some months after, are not sufficient to cause it to be declared fraudulent in fact. We concur with the chancellor in upholding the conveyance.

It was error to allow the dismissal, against the objection of the defendants, of the bill, in the several matters wherein it was dismissed. The cause had reached a stage where it was too late to dismiss without the consent of the defendants. The bill sought to have the conveyance declared invalid on several views of it, or, if held valid, to enforce it directly in favor of the state, and to take possession of the property conveyed by it, and administer the trust if valid, and, if invalid, to apply the property to satisfy a decree against Hemingway, and to compel an accounting with all the sureties on the two bonds, so as to fix liability where it might belong, and relieve the state from uncertainty as to this, and also to vacate some conveyances of land embraced in Hemingway's conveyance which he and Waite had made since it was made. Testimony had been taken in the cause, and a stipulation had been entered into between the solicitors on both sides as to certain matters of fact to be considered as proved, and certain letters and official reports were agreed to be received in evidence. Much of this agreed testimony relates to the inquiry on which bond liability is chargeable. The case had been heard by the chancellor, who, on the 14th March, 1891, made a decree adjudicating that the conveyance is valid and enforceable in behalf of the state, but primarily for the exoneration of the sureties on the two bonds; that Hemingway was entitled to homestead exemption; and that sale should be made of the property embraced in the conveyance on certain terms, (included in which was the consent of the attorney general,) and the net proceeds should be paid into the state treasury, with certain other matters relating to the administration of the trust property not necessary to be mentioned. The attack made by the bill on the conveyance had failed. Its prayer to enforce the conveyance as a security for the state was granted. The question, where the liability as between the two sets of sureties should fall, was left open, with a reservation to the court of the right to do justice between them by final apportionment of the proceeds of the trust property according to their rights, upon adjustment of the respective liabilities. The decree made March 14, 1891, was based on, and could be justified only on the assumption of, a final decree ascertaining where, among the sureties, liability is. The requisite parties were before the court; the trust property was in its possession; a decree had been made adjudicating the chief matter of controversy, and directing payment of money into the state treasury; testimony by depositions and agreements had been taken and filed; the cause had been set for final hearing, after the expiration of time allowed for taking testimony; and it was too late to dismiss the parts of the bill proposed and allowed. The defendants had acquired rights by what had occurred which entitled them to object successfully at that stage of the suit to a dismissal.

The decree already made in the cause required as its complement a further decree on the very matters as to which the bill was dismissed, without which that decree could not stand. It had been made, and the defendants were interested in its maintenance. In such a condition of things it is not allowable for the complainant to dismiss against the objection of the other parties. The cases to this effect are numerous. Seymour v. Jerome, Walk. Ch. 356; Watt v. Crawford, 11 Paige, 470; Cozzens v. Sisson, 5 R. I. 489; Bank v. Rose, 1 Rich. Eq. 292; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Union Rolling-Mill Co., 109 U. S. 702,[1] which last case contains an extensive review of authorities on the subject, English and American. All seem to agree that, in the stage of this case at which it was when the dismissal occurred, it was not allowable to dismiss, without the consent of all concerned. After laborious investigation and protracted consideration we have reached the conclusion that the dismissal of the bill should not have been allowed; and we affirm the decree on the appeal of the state, but on the cross-appeal the decree dismissing parts of the bill is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in the chancery court in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

GEORGIA PAC. RY. CO. v. BRADFIELD.

MASTER AND SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

A brakeman on a railroad construction train, who, in spite of the warning of a fellow-servant, attempts to replace on a moving flat-car cross-ties which have become displaced so as to project over the end of the car, and is knocked from the car and killed, is guilty of such negligence as will prevent a recovery from the railroad company for his death.

Appeal from circuit court, Lowndes county; L. E. HOUSTON, Judge.

Action by M. A. Bradfield against the Georgia Pacific Railway Company for the death of her husband. Deceased was a brakeman on a construction train of defendant. Some of the flat-cars were loaded with cross-ties, and some of them had become displaced, so that their ends jutted over and beyond the end of the car on which they were placed. Deceased, though cautioned as to the danger by a fellow-employe, attempted, while the train was in motion, to adjust the cross-ties, and in so doing was knocked from the train and killed. Defendant asked an instruction peremptorily charging the jury to find for it, which was refused, and there was a verdict for $10,000 for plaintiff, and a judgment thereon. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Fox & Roane, for appellant. S. M. & W. C. Meek, for appellee.

COOPER, J. The unfortunate man, for whose death damages are sought by this suit, was the victim of his own rashness and negligence. Familiarity with the dangerous character of his vocation had begotten contempt of its perils, and, in disregard of the circumstances, which a man of the slightest prudence should have heeded, he voluntarily engaged in an effort to adjust the deranged ties on a flat-car, and to so place himself in a situation from which escape in safety would have been almost miraculous. The facts are undisputed, and from them no other conclusion can be drawn but that the deceased palpably contributed to his death. The peremptory instruction asked by the defendant should have been given. Reversed and remanded.

KIRK v. STATE.

GAMING—SELLING TICKETS FOR RAFFLE.

Under Code, § 2851, declaring any person guilty of gaming, and liable to indictment, who, "in order to raise money for himself or another, shall publicly or privately put up a lottery, to be drawn or adventured for, or any prize or thing to be raffled or played for," or who "shall sell, or expose for sale, any lottery ticket," an indictment will not lie against one who sells, or offers for sale, a chance in a "raffle."

Appeal from circuit court, De Soto county; JAMES T. FANT, Judge.

Indictment against Charles T. Kirk for playing at, betting upon, encouraging, and promoting a raffle for money. From a judgment of conviction, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Morgan & Buchanan, for appellant. T. M. Miller, Atty. Gen., for the State.

COOPER, J. By section 2851 of the Code it is declared that "if any person, in order to raise money for himself or another, shall publicly or privately put up a lottery, to be drawn or adventured for, or any prize or thing to be raffled or played for, or if any person shall sell, or expose for sale, any lottery ticket, such person shall be guilty of gaming, and on conviction," etc. The indictment charges that the defendant did "play at and bet upon, encourage and promote, a certain game of chance, called 'raffle,' for money," etc. The proof was that the defendant offered for sale in Mississippi a chance in a raffle to be played in the state of Tennessee, and sold one such chance. It is not made unlawful to encourage or promote "raffling," nor to sell a chance in a raffle. The statute condemns him who puts up, for himself or another, property to be raffled for; but no penalty is declared against him who sells chances in a "raffle." It is otherwise as to lottery tickets, for the statute expressly so declares. Judgment reversed.

GOODBAR et al. v. TATUM.

(Supreme Court of Mississippi. Jan. 25, 1892.)

ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—VALIDITY—PARTNERSHIP.

1. On a contest, as to the right to partnership property, between the assignee for the benefit of the creditors of the firm and subsequent attaching creditors, the assignee testified explicitly that all the property mentioned in the deed of assignment was delivered to him by the firm when they delivered the deed. One of the partners testified that, so far as he knew, all the partnership assets had been applied to the payment of the debts; but he also testified, when asked if he got any money from the firm for himself, that he may have got as must as $20 or $25. Held, that the evidence failed to show with sufficient certainty that the $20 or $25 was part of the assigned estate, and the assignment should be upheld.

2. In such contest, the assignment having been of partnership effects only, any question as to the good faith of one of the partners in dealing with his individual lands is immaterial, as he was not bound to assign his individual estate.

Appeal from circuit court, Grenada county; R. W. WILLIAMSON, Judge.

Powell & Son made an assignment, preferring certain creditors, and the assigned property was turned over to the assignee, S. T. Tatum. Goodbar & Co. and other creditors, who were not preferred, sued out an attachment against the property. The assignee interposed a claim under the deed of assignment, and a trial of the claimant's issue resulted in a verdict and judgment in his favor. The attaching creditors appeal. Affirmed.

Slack & Doty and Nugent & McWillie, for appellants. William C. McLean, for appellee.

WOODS, J. The testimony of Tatum, assignee, is explicit to the point of the delivery of all the property embraced in the deed of assignment by the assignors. The evidence of Tatum is unqualified on this particular matter. In reply to counsel for appellants, Tatum declares that all the goods and property mentioned in the deed of assignment were delivered to him by the assignors when they delivered him the deed. W. H. Powell, one of the assignors, was asked, "Has the firm of W. H. Powell & Son applied all their assets, as far as you know, to the payment of their debts?" and to this he replied, "Yes, sir; so far as I know." These statements appear to us, and have always appeared to us, to be perfectly maintainable, examination being had of all the other evidence in the transcript, except as affected, or seeming to be affected, or supposed to be affected, by the information found also in W. H. Powell's testimony. We quote from the record: "Question. Did you get any money from W. H. Powell & Son for yourself? Answer. I may have got as much as $20 or $25. I have it yet,—what I have not necessarily spent. I have spent about $6 or $8 of it at the hotel here this week. Q. That was just to live on,—to support yourself? A. Yes, sir; I expected to die, and thought it would bury me, may be." We are of opinion that the evidence, thus taken together, fails to show with certainty that the $20 or $25, referred to in the testimony of W. H. Powell, was part of the assigned estate. We would be constrained to supply a palpable failure in the proofs to declare, as a fair inference from the proved facts, that W. H. Powell took this money either at the time the deed of assignment was made or preparatory thereto. We do not feel authorized to say this is a certain, reasonable inference, deducible from the known facts. The other contentions of appellant are so plainly groundless that we think it unnecessary to enter upon them. It may be said that this was a general assignment of partnership effects only, and that W. H. Powell did not assign, or profess to assign, his individual estate, nor was he bound to do so in making the general assignment of the partnership effects. Any consideration of the good faith of W. H. Powell in dealing with his individual lands would be wide of the mark, in the present controversy. The judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

STATE, to Use of BARNETT, v. DALTON et al.

SHERIFF—NEGLIGENCE—DESTRUCTION OF GOODS BY FIRE—CHALLENGE OF JUROR.

1. The fact that plaintiff in attachment selects a person, and has the sheriff appoint him his deputy to levy the attachment, is not such interference with the sheriff as will release him from liability for the negligence of such deputy resulting in the destruction of the goods by fire after they have been levied on.

2. A sheriff is not liable for the destruction by fire of goods attached by him, and which he allowed to remain for a few days in the store-room wherein they were found, where it does not appear that there was any reason to think the store-house unsafe.

3. Error of the court in allowing defendant a fifth peremptory challenge is not ground for reversing a judgment for him if plaintiff had an impartial jury, as plaintiff has no vested right to any particular juror, but only to an impartial jury.

Appeal from circuit court, Prentiss county; L. E. HOUSTON, Judge.

Action by the state, for the use of J. T. Barnett, against A. J. Dalton and others, the sheriff, and the sureties on his bond, for the loss of goods levied on by the defendant sheriff, and alleged to have been destroyed by fire through his negligence. Barnett sued out an attachment against one Maxwell, who lived and did business away from the county-site; and when the writ was issued he named a person, and requested the sheriff to appoint him to go out and levy the attachment, which request was acceded to. The person appointed proceeded to the store-house of Maxwell, and levied the attachment upon a stock of goods; and, as the goods could not then (Saturday) be sold, they were, at the request of Barnett's agent, left in the house where found, and were burned. The sheriff defended, (1) because the plaintiff interfered by selecting the deputy who levied the writ, and (2) because the goods were as safe where they were left after the levy as they would have been if moved to any other place in the neighborhood. There was judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

B. A. P. Selman and J. M. Boone, for appellant. Boone & Allen, for appellees.

WOODS, J. We fail to discover any merit in the position of the appellees as to the supposed interference of the appellant, or his agent or attorney, in the matter of the appointment of the deputy, Kimball, and the consequent release from liability of the sheriff because of the alleged negligence of this deputy. It is not unreasonable intervention for the plaintiff in a suit to express a desire to have some one levy the process, and discharge other duties imposed by law upon the sheriff, who is familiar with and competent for such official work. Not only is this not such intervention in the discharge of the sheriff's duty by a party litigant as will relieve the officer from liability, but it seems only the usual and natural effort of the party litigant to quicken the diligence of the official, and to promote the faithful performance of his duty. It is equally certain, however, that there was not that want of care in the dealings of the sheriff with the goods which will render him and the sureties liable for the loss sustained in the destruction of the store-house and its contents. The reasonable care which was the measure of the officer's duty did not necessarily require the immediate removal of the goods from the house where they were found when levied upon to the county-site or elsewhere; and it is not made clear that the removal to Millicen's store-house would have rendered the goods more secure than in the Maxwell store-house. The plaintiff's agent thought the latter store-house reasonably safe, for the goods were to be left there, without any thought or suggestion of probable loss in so doing, at this agent's request, from Saturday until the Monday or Wednesday following. Millicen, too, said on trial that Maxwell's store-house was as secure as his, in so far as danger of loss from burning went; and, undisputedly, the loss complained of resulted from burning.

The action of the court in permitting to appellees a fifth peremptory challenge was erroneous, but the error is not reversible. The plaintiff, as has long been held in this state, had no vested right in any particular juror. He had a right to an impartial jury, and this right seems to have been enjoyed by him. We decline, moreover, to reverse, because another trial, properly conducted, could only result in a judgment for the appellees on the evidence before us. Affirmed.

BROWN v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Mississippi. Feb. 1, 1892.)

CRIMINAL LAW—INTERFERENCE BY BAILIFF WITH JURY.

On a prosecution for murder, after the jury had been considering their verdict, having been instructed that if they should find defendant guilty they might fix his punishment at imprisonment for life instead of capital punishment, the district attorney, without any intention that his remark should be communicated to the jury, stated to the bailiff that, if they would examine the instruction, they would promptly reach a verdict. The bailiff pointed out the instruction to the jury, stating that it was his desire that they should not delay their decision, as he did not wish to wait longer, and they found a verdict of guilty, and fixed defendant's punishment at imprisonment for life. Held, that the bailiff's officious interference was ground for reversal.

Appeal from circuit court, Coahoma county; GEORGE WINSTON, Judge.

Indictment against Frank Brown for murder. The case was given to the jury under the evidence and instructions of the court,—one of the instructions for the state being that the jury had the right under the law to fix the punishment of the prisoner at imprisonment for life, if he was found guilty. After the jury had been considering the verdict, the bailiff, whose duty it was to wait on them, was told by the district attorney, in speaking of the failure of the jury to promptly return a verdict of guilty in view of the evidence, that, if the jury would examine the instruction above referred to, it would promptly reach a verdict; but there was no intention on the part of the district attorney that the remark should be communicated to the jury. The bailiff, however, did point out to the jury the instruction referred to, and the jury found defendant guilty, and fixed the punishment at imprisonment for life in the state penitentiary. Judgment was so entered, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. W. & W. D. Cutrer, for appellant.

COOPER, J. We are not prepared to affirm that no injury resulted to the appellant from the suggestion of the bailiff to the jury that his personal desire was that they should not longer delay their decision, as he wished to be relieved of further waiting, and his officious intermeddling by pointing out an instruction (by which the jury were told that it was within their power to find the defendant guilty of murder, and award the punishment of imprisonment for life instead of capital punishment) upon which, in the opinion of the prosecuting attorney, they would agree upon a verdict. It is to be hoped that the zeal of the bailiff was abated by his being retired, under the order of the court, to the common jail, and that in his reflections there it has occurred to him that one on trial for his life has rights which even a bailiff must respect. Judgment reversed.

KANSAS CITY, M. & B. R. CO. v. CANTRELL.

RAILROAD COMPANIES—KILLING STOCK ON TRACK—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action against a railroad company for the killing of plaintiff's mare by one of defendant's trains, defendant's employes testified that the night was dark, that the mare jumped on the track only a short distance in front of the train, and that the collision could not be avoided; while plaintiff's witnesses testified that the night was bright, and that the mare's tracks were found running several hundred yards down the track, until she was overtaken and killed. Held, that an instruction to find for defendant was properly refused.

2. In an action against a railroad company for the killing of a mare by one of its trains, where the mare was running at large, an instruction that it was the engineer's duty to ring the bell, and blow the whistle, and reverse the engine, and to do everything in his power, in the ordinary discharge of his duty, to save the animal's life, is erroneous, as, in the case of animals running at large, the railroad company is not bound to exercise the utmost care in running its trains, but only such reasonable care as a prudent man, engaged in the same business, would use to prevent injury to or destruction of animals.

Appeal from circuit court, Monroe county; G. J. LEFTWICH, Special Judge.

Action by A. C. Cantrell against the Kansas City, Memphis & Birmingham Railroad Company to recover damages for the killing of a mare by one of defendant's trains. Defendant's employes testified that the night was dark, that the mare jumped on the track only a short distance in front of the train, and that the collision could not be avoided; while plaintiff's witnesses testified that the night was bright, and that the mare's tracks were found on the road-bed running several hundred yards down the track, and until the mare was overtaken by the train and killed. There was a verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. W. Buchanan, for appellant. Clifton & Eckford, for appellee.

WOODS, J. The judgment must be reversed because the instructions, especially 2 and 3, given for the plaintiff below, held the defendant corporation and its servants to a higher degree of accountability than is required by law. If the first instruction was designed to inform the jury that the use of air-brakes, or the employment of a large corps of brakemen on the freight train in question, would have averted the killing of the mare, perhaps, and that the failure of the defendant to provide air-brakes or a larger corps of brakemen was a failure to do all in the power of the defendant, in the ordinary discharge of its duty, to avert the killing, then it was clearly erroneous. Its language is not free from ambiguity, and, in view of the evidence offered as to the non-use of air-brakes and of numerous brakemen on the train, the jury may have been misled. The second instruction declares that it was the duty of the engineer to ring the bell, and blow the whistle, and reverse the engine, and to do everything in his power, in the ordinary and diligent discharge of his duty, to save the life of the animal. This does not state the correct measure of defendant's accountability in cases where recoveries are sought for injuries done to animals running at large. The rule of diligence for fixing responsibility is said in Railroad Co. v. Miller, 40 Miss. 45, to impose upon the railroad the exercise, not of the utmost care, in such cases as we are considering, but only such reasonable care, in running its trains, as a prudent man, engaged in the same business, would use to prevent injury to or destruction of animals. To ring a bell, or blow a whistle, or reverse an engine, or to do any other particular act, may not be required of the railroad company in every case, and under all circumstances. The ringing of the bell, in one case, may afford timely warning, and, in another case, it may be an idle, or even mischievous, employment; and this is equally true when applied to the other acts referred to in the instructions, the failure to do which by the defendant is supposed in the instruction to be negligence. The court properly refused the peremptory instruction prayed by defendant. There were sharp, and not immaterial, conflicts in the evidence, and the issue was rightfully held by the court as belonging to the domain of a jury's determination. Reversed and remanded.

NEWMAN et al. v. STATE.

INCEST—UNLAWFUL COHABITATION—INDICTMENT.

1. An indictment alleging that defendants, being uncle and niece, "did cohabit together, and were guilty of adultery and fornication, he, the said N., being a married man, and she, the said H., being an unmarried woman," is not good as an indictment for incest, under Code, § 2701, because incest is a felony, and it is not alleged that the act was feloniously done.

2. Nor is the indictment good as an indictment for unlawful cohabitation, under Code, § 2700, since it does not aver that there was habitual sexual intercourse, which is the gist of the offense.

Appeal from circuit court, Panola county; JAMES T. FANT, Judge.

Indictment against Josh Newman and Helen Newman, charging that, being uncle and niece, defendants "did cohabit together, and were guilty of adultery and fornication, he, the said Josh Newman, being a married man, and she, the said Helen Newman, being an unmarried woman," etc. Defendants were convicted of unlawful cohabitation, and appeal. Reversed.

Ira D. Oglesby, for appellants. T. M. Miller, Atty. Gen., for the State.

COOPER, J. The motion in arrest of judgment should have been sustained. The indictment charges no offense. It is not good as an indictment for incest, under section 2701 of the Code, for the reason that incest is a felony, and the indictment fails to aver that the criminal act was feloniously done. Bowler v. State, 41 Miss. 570. It does not charge the offense of unlawful cohabitation, under section 2700 of the Code, for it fails to aver that the parties were guilty of habitual sexual intercourse, and that is the gist of the offense. Carotti v. State, 42 Miss. 334; Kinard v. State, 57 Miss. 132; Granberry v. State, 61 Miss. 440. The judgment is reversed, judgment on the verdict arrested, and the defendants directed to be held to answer such indictment as may be preferred against them.

McIVER v. CLARKE.

(Supreme Court of Mississippi. Feb. 1, 1892.)

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—CONTRACTS—FAILURE TO PAY LICENSE—EQUITY.

1. Where only one member of a firm of attorneys has paid his privilege tax, prescribed by Code, § 589, imposing a license tax on each person (not each firm) practicing law, and declaring that all contracts made with any person who shall violate the act, in reference to the business carried on in disregard of the law, shall be null and void, an entire, joint, and several contract made with the firm for their services is void, though the other member may have paid his license; and a claim thereunder cannot be enforced by an assignee of the firm.

2. Where such an assignee files a bill in equity to enforce the claim, tendering with her bill the difference between the claim and the amount of a loan due from her to the person from whom the claim is alleged to be due, and asking that defendant be compelled to surrender notes deposited with her as collateral for the repayment of the loan, the fact that defendant answers, setting up the invalidity of the contract on which the claim is based, and makes her answer a cross-bill asking to enforce payment of the collateral, does not entitle complainant to a decree on the ground that defendant, to entitle her to the affirmative relief prayed, must do equity by paying what is due from her under the condemned contract, since defendant is not voluntarily in court, and merely sets up the defense that the contract was void, which, if held, would leave her free to enforce payment of the collateral.

Appeal from chancery court, Lee county; NEWNAN CAYCE, Special Chancellor.

Bill by Mrs. M. E. Clarke against Mrs. Alice McIver. Complainant borrowed money from defendant, giving as security therefor notes of a debtor to her, which were secured by a lien on land they were given to purchase. Defendant had, prior to her loan to complainant, employed the firm of Lacey & Clarke as her attorneys in a suit against a savings institution, which had become involved, and this firm of attorneys held a claim against her for services in said suit, and this claim they transferred to complainant. Mr. Lacey, one of the attorneys of the firm, had not paid his privilege tax at the time the contract for their services was made, or when the services were performed. The bill was to compel defendant to surrender the notes she held as collateral, and complainant tendered with her bill the difference between the claim transferred to her by Lacey & Clarke, and the note due by her to defendant. Defendant answered, making her answer a cross-bill, setting up the fact that one of the attorneys had not paid his privilege tax, and that neither he, the firm, nor any one claiming under them, could enforce any contract made while under disability through this failure to pay the privilege tax, and praying an enforcement of the lien given to secure the notes held by her as collateral. There was a decree for complainant. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Houston & Reynolds, Houston & Woods, and T. J. Buchanan, Jr., for appellant. Clarke & Clarke and Calhoon & Green, for appellee.

WOODS, J. The contract sued on is an entire one. It secures upon the one side the services of Messrs. Lacey & Clarke, as attorneys, in the suit of appellant against the Okolona Savings Institution; and upon the other side it secures from Mrs. McIver the lowest fee chargeable for such professional services under the fee-bill of the Okolona bar. The services were to cover the entire litigation, and were to be paid for by such lowest fee. Not each step taken, or each labor performed, in the progress of the cause, was to be paid for, but the litigation in its entirety was to be conducted by the attorneys, and paid for by the client. The contract was joint with the attorneys, and their right of action thereon is a joint right. The license tax was payable by each member of the law firm. It is imposed by section 589 on each person practicing law, and not upon each firm practicing law, and so must be paid by each person, whether practicing alone or in connection with one or more others as a firm. By this section, too, it is declared that "all contracts made with any person who shall violate this act, in reference to the business carried on in disregard of this law, shall be null and void." And by the same section a penalty is denounced against any person who shall exercise any of the privileges enumerated in the act without first paying the price and procuring the license required. The business of practicing law in violation of the act is as clearly made unlawful as the business of carrying on a mercantile venture, the keeping of a restaurant, or any oher business for the lawful conduct of which prepayment of a privilege license tax is required. In the case of the delinquent lawyer, just as in the case of the delinquent merchant, there is found legal incapacity to enforce any contracts made in the prosecution of the business, and the infliction of a penalty upon the delinquent. This legal incapacity to reap, in part at least, the fruits of the venture, whether in mercantile or legal life, coupled with punishment for carrying on the business in violation of law, must be held to stamp the business, no matter what its nature, as unlawful. The law does not absolutely prohibit the prosecution of the business, but it will not lend its assistance to help the contemner of its requirements in his efforts to reap the fruits of his labors. It simply leaves him where his unlawful conduct has placed him. It leaves him where it found him.

The supposed difficulty in the case before us arises out of the fact that Clarke, one of the law firm in question, is shown to have paid the privilege license required, and the assumption that this payment by one member of the firm will operate to relieve Clarke & Lacey, either wholly or partially, of the incapacity which is imposed upon one member of the firm as a person. The difficulty, however, is not real. The firm was an entity, engaged in the practice of law. The contract which gives rise to the question we are considering was a single, entire one. The right of action under that contract is joint as to Lacey & Clarke. The business, as to Lacey, was clearly unlawful. His capacity to successfully contract in the business in which his firm was engaged was "infected with fatal infirmity;" and this fatal infirmity, inhering in one of the essential parts of the single entity,—the law firm of Lacey & Clarke,—extends to and incapacitates the entire entity. Any other view would unmistakably frustrate the plain intent of the statute, and this view is the logical outcome of what we have held in Carter v. State, 60 Miss. 456; Harness v. Williams, 64 Miss. 600, 1 South. Rep. 759; and Pollard v. Insurance Co., 63 Miss. 244.

It is said by counsel, however, that, even if the contract of Lacey & Clarke with appellant be non-enforceable by the appellee, still the appellant properly lost below, and must lose here, because she is seeking affirmative relief by her cross-bill against the appellee, and has not offered to do equity by paying what is due from her under the condemned contract. The reply is that appellant is not voluntarily in court at all. She was brought in at the instance of appellee in an effort, in part, to enforce collection of the sum supposed to be due under the infected contract; and, defensively, to meet this attempt, she shows the insuperable barrier to a successful recovery on Lacey & Clarke's claim against herself. True, appellant asked leave to set up this defense by an amendment to her answer and cross-bill, but it is clearly by way of answer, as showing the incurable infirmity in the claim. The effect of this defensive matter, if successfully pleaded and supported, will be to disentangle appellant herself from the demand of Lacey & Clarke's assignee, and to leave herself free to collect the balance due her by appellee by enforcing against Siddall payment of the purchase-money notes then held by her as security for payment of Mrs. Clarke's note to appellant, and this, in fact, is just what appellant sought to do,—to have affirmative relief by enforcing the vendor's lien against Siddall. The contract of Lacey & Clarke with Mrs. McIver is not enforceable, and the defense attempted to be set up by appellant in the court below was properly pleaded, and should have prevailed for her protection. Reversed and remanded.

JAMISON v. MOSELEY.

ASSAULT AND BATTERY—JUSTIFICATION—BURDEN OF PROOF—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action for damages for assault by shooting, though, where defendant admits the shooting, the burden is on him to prove justification, yet plaintiff cannot invoke the aid of this principle in making out his case, and cannot, after proving the admission, delay introducing his evidence, to show the circumstances of the shooting, until after defendant has introduced his evidence in justification, and then bring in his evidence in rebuttal, but must disclose his entire case by evidence in chief.

2. In an action for assault by shooting, plaintiff introduced evidence that, while he and defendant were engaged in an altercation, the latter made a movement as if to draw a weapon, whereupon he (plaintiff) made an effort to defend himself by drawing his pistol, and that defendant then shot him. Defendant introduced evidence that the movement made by him merely consisted of his moving his hand from the top of his cane, and placing it on his lap, without any intention to draw a weapon or assault plaintiff, and that plaintiff immediately began to draw a pistol; whereupon defendant drew his own, and fired simultaneously with or a little after plaintiff. Held, that an instruction that if the jury believed that defendant made a movement as if to draw a pistol, apparently aggressive, and then plaintiff made an effort to defend himself, and thereupon was shot by defendant, they should find for plaintiff, was erroneous, as it justified plaintiff in acting on appearances, and denied defendant the right to act upon the facts as he claimed they existed; whereas, if plaintiff misinterpreted defendant's movement and drew his pistol, defendant was justified in drawing his, and shooting in self-defense.

Appeal from circuit court, Clay county; C. H. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Action by E. A. Moseley against A. J. Jamison for assault and battery. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Fox & Roane, for appellant. Beall & Pope and W. T. Houston, for appellee.

COOPER, J. This is an action by appellee to recover damages from appellant for an assault and battery by shooting. The plaintiff proved by a witness (Mrs. Smith) that defendant, on the day of the shooting, stated to her that he had shot the plaintiff. He then proved by his physician the character of the wound received, the length of time plaintiff was confined to his bed, and the probable future result of the wound. Other witnesses were then introduced to prove the extent of damages inflicted, and the plaintiff then rested. The defendant then introduced certain eye-witnesses of the difficulty, whose testimony tended to show that the plaintiff was the aggressor in the difficulty, and that the defendant justifiably shot him. The plaintiff then introduced other witnesses, whose testimony tended to prove that the defendant provoked the difficulty, and that the plaintiff, having reasonable ground to apprehend an attack, prepared to defend himself, and was thereupon fired upon and wounded by the defendant. While the evidence introduced by the respective parties was generally favorable to the party by whom offered, some parts of the defendant's evidence was in some respects favorable to the plaintiff, and some parts of that for the plaintiff tended to support the defendant's defense of justification. It is sufficient to say that the evidence upon the developed case was conflicting, and that a verdict for either party, upon proper instructions, would be sustained. The court gave many instructions, both for the plaintiff and the defendant. Among those given for the plaintiff, the 4th, 10th, and 13th are assigned for error. They are as follows: "(4) The court instructs the jury, for the plaintiff, that, as the defendant has admitted that he shot Moseley, the burden of proof is on the defendant, and, unless the defendant has proven by a preponderance of evidence, so as to satisfy the jury, a full legal justification for the shooting of Moseley, the jury will find for the plaintiff." "(10) The court charges the jury that if they believe from the evidence that, while the plaintiff was in the discharge of his duties as an attorney, the defendant used language to the plaintiff that was irritating, and thereupon the plaintiff retorted in like language, and then the defendant demanded to know to whom plaintiff referred, making a movement at the time as if to draw a pistol, apparently aggressive, and then plaintiff made an effort to defend himself, and thereupon was shot and wounded by the defendant, they will find for the plaintiff, and will give him such damages," etc. "(13) The court instructs the jury for the plaintiff that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff has shown that he was shot and wounded by the defendant, as alleged in plaintiff's declaration, and that the plaintiff's evidence showing such assault and battery failed to show any excuse, justification, or mitigation of such assault and battery, and that plaintiff further showed in evidence that he suffered actual damages in loss of time and money expended, amounting to $259, and other actual damages, consisting of mental and physical suffering, then the jury will find for the plaintiff the amount of such actual damages, so shown in evidence, including what they may deem adequate compensation for mental and physical suffering, unless they believe from the evidence that the defendant is proven, by a preponderance of the evidence, to their satisfaction, to have been justified in so shooting and wounding plaintiff; and if said evidence, so introduced after plaintiff had established his right to recover, leaves the matter in doubt as to whether the defendant was justified or not, then the jury must, under their oaths, find for plaintiff," etc.

It is proper to state, before considering these instructions, that by our statute (Code, § 1549) the defendant, in an action for assault and battery, under the plea of "not guilty," may give in evidence any mitigating circumstance to reduce the damages, notwithstanding he may also have pleaded a justification. The rule announced by the fourth and thirteenth instructions for the plaintiff, which is, in effect, that a defendant in an action for assault and battery, who seeks to justify the battery, has the burden of proof upon that issue, is correct; but as stated in these instructions, and under the peculiar development of the case by the plaintiff, it should not have been given to the jury, or, if given, the jury should have been advised of the circumstances of its application. A plaintiff may not invoke the principle as an aid to him in making out his case, and more especially may he not, by withholding his evidence which should be put in in chief, and developing it as rebutting the defendant's case, gain an advantage by indirection to which he would not be entitled if he had proceeded in the ordinary method of disclosing his case.

There were many witnesses of the difficulty, several of whom were in attendance at the trial in the plaintiff's behalf. Instead of disclosing the circumstances of the rencounter by the testimony of his witnesses, the plaintiff resorted to proof of an admission made by the defendant to one who was not present that he had shot the plaintiff, and having then proved his damages rested his case; thus forcing the defendant to first disclose the circumstances of the shooting, and holding his own evidence in reserve, to be used to rebut the defense rather than to establish his own case. The manifest purpose of this course of procedure was to wrench the rule of law that one who relies upon an affirmative defense must establish it, to the prejudice of the defendant, and to gain an undue advantage by refusing to fully develop his own case. In the administration of justice there are many arbitrary and abstract rules and principles which experience has shown to be essential. But the end and purpose of all of them is that justice in the concrete case shall be reached, and it is not permissible to evade or misapply them. The burden of proof on the whole case was upon the plaintiff, and if, in making out the whole case, the plaintiff's evidence showed, or tended to show, that the shooting by the defendant was lawful under the circumstances, the defendant was entitled to the benefit of such evidence. The presumption of law is that a battery is malicious or unlawful; but, when the facts are fully disclosed, there is no longer room for presumption, and if, on all the facts, the jury is unable to say that the battery was unlawful, the plaintiff must fail of recovery.

The tenth instruction is erroneous, for the reason that it permits a recovery by the plaintiff if he misinterpreted the purpose of the defendant in "making a movement at the time as if to draw a pistol, apparently aggressive," and thereupon made an effort to defend himself, (by drawing his own pistol,) and was then shot by the defendant. The defendant contended, and introduced evidence to show, that the movement to which this instruction refers was the innocent one of taking his hand from the top of his cane, and placing it upon his lap, (he then being seated,) without any intention to draw a weapon or to assault the plaintiff, who immediately began to draw his pistol; whereupon he (the defendant) drew his own, and fired simultaneously with or a little after the plaintiff. Under the instruction as given, the plaintiff was justified in acting upon appearances, while the defendant was denied the right to act upon the facts as he contends they existed. If the parties used irritating language towards each other, and the defendant made "a movement at the time as if to draw a pistol apparently aggressive," but in fact was not intending either to draw a weapon or to assault the plaintiff, and the plaintiff, misinterpreting the defendant's act, thought it necessary to defend himself by shooting the defendant, we are not aware of any principle of law under which the defendant was precluded from anticipating the imminent and impending attack, so long as in so doing he acted only in necessary self-defense. Under the tenth instruction, this right was distinctly denied him. Reversed and remanded.

MCDERMOTT v. THOMPSON.

(Supreme Court of Florida. Jan. 27, 1892.)

MINORS—HOW MADE PARTIES IN EQUITY—PLEADING BY STRANGER.

1. Where minors are to be made parties defendant in a suit in equity, subpœna should be issued to such minors, and regularly served upon them in the presence of their legal guardian, or in the presence of the person who has the present care and custody of them. Then a guardian ad litem for such minors should be appointed by an order of the court, and such guardian ad litem should also be served with subpœna in the cause.

2. Where a stranger to the cause interposes any pleading in an equity suit for and on behalf of minors interested in the issues thereof, as their guardian ad litem, and the record fails to show that such party has ever been appointed or authorized by the court to act in said cause as such guardian ad litem, all the pleadings so interposed by such stranger are nugatory, and do not bind such minors; and all orders and proceedings in said cause predicated upon such pleading will be set aside as void.

Appeal from circuit court, Monroe county; HENRY L. MITCHELL, Judge.

Bill by John L. McDermott against John E. Thompson, executor of Olivia Gibbons, deceased, and George Edward Gibbons and Thomas Eugene Gibbons, minors, to set aside the will of deceased, and for an accounting by the executor. From an order dismissing the bill on a demurrer interposed by G. Bowne Patterson as guardian ad litem of the minors, complainant appeals. Reversed.

John A. Henderson, for appellant.

TAYLOR, J. On the 20th day of January, 1882, John L. McDermott filed his bill in equity in the circuit court of Monroe county, sixth judicial circuit, against John E. Thompson, as executor of the will of Olivia Gibbons, deceased, and against George Edward and Thomas Eugene Gibbons, minor children of Olivia Gibbons, deceased, praying that the last will of Olivia McDermott, who was formerly, before her marriage with McDermott, called Olivia Gibbons, made before her marriage with McDermott, be set aside as illegal and void, and for an accounting by John E. Thompson as the executor of such will, etc.

John E. Thompson, as executor, answered. Testimony was taken, and the cause submitted to the chancellor, and a final decree therein was rendered in the court below on the 24th of April, 1882, setting aside the will, and declaring it to have been revoked because of the fact that it was made by the testatrix prior to her second marriage, devising all of her property to children by a former marriage, and having had issue of a son by her second marriage with McDermott, who was not provided for by said will. From this decree the cause was appealed to this court, and this court at the January term, 1883, rendered a decision therein (19 Fla. 852) reversing the decree of the court below because of the failure to make the minor children of Olivia Gibbons by her first marriage parties to the suit by proper service upon them of process in the cause, and because of the want of proper answer for such minors through a guardian ad litem. In the former decision of this court in the cause it was distinctly decided that the subpœna in the cause should be served upon the minors in person, and upon a guardian ad litem for them appointed by the court, and that the service on the minors should be in the presence of their legal guardian, if they have one, or in the presence of such person as had for the time being the actual care or custody of such minors. After the decision of this court, subpœna seems to have been issued to such minors, but the return of service thereof is defective, because it does not show the names of the minors upon whom it was served; neither does it show that it was ever served upon any guardian ad litem for such minors, appointed by the court. On the 2d day of June, 1883, after the service of subpœna on the minors, of which the imperfect return was made as aforesaid, G. Bowne Patterson, as guardian ad litem for the minors George E. and Thomas E. Gibbons, interposed a demurrer to the bill. This demurrer was subsequently, on September 11, 1884, sustained by the court below, and the bill dismissed; and from this order the cause is appealed a second time to this court. How, or by what authority, G. Bowne Patterson got into the case as guardian ad litem for these minors, we have been unable to discover from anything in the record. There is no order of court appointing and authorizing him to act in that capacity, and there is no subpœna directed to or served upon him, citing him in that or any other capacity to appear and answer for and on behalf of said minors. We are constrained to conclude from this status of the record that the requirements of the former decision and mandate of this court have not been complied with, and that the said minors are not yet properly before the court. With that decision we are fully in accord. It pointed out with sufficient particularity what was necessary to be done in order to get the minors properly before the court: (1) That a guardian ad litem should be appointed by the court for such minors; (2) that such minors should be personally served with subpœna in the presence of their legal guardian, or in the presence of such person who had the care and custody of them; and (3) that such guardian ad litem should be served with subpœna in the cause. None of these requisites have been complied with. It follows that all the proceedings and orders had and made in the cause since the former decision of this court in the premises must be set aside and reversed, with directions to supply the omissions in the proceedings therein, and herein pointed out; and it is so ordered.

CONOVER v. RUSS.

(Supreme Court of Florida. Jan. 27, 1892.)

EJECTMENT—MAPS AS EVIDENCE.

Where the land in controversy in an ejectment suit is located adjacent to the boundary line between two counties, the location of which boundary line is involved in such doubt, uncertainty, and dispute as to render it seriously doubtful as to which of said two counties said land belongs, and the defendant relies entirely upon a tax-title to the land, acquired in one of such counties, and it appears that the land was assessed and sold for the same year's taxes in both counties, and the plaintiff has redeemed from the sale in one of them, but not from the sale in the county that resulted in defendant's tax-title, the material issue, under these circumstances, that most vitally affects the validity of such tax-title, is the true locus of the land. In the trial of this issue the official maps of the county in which the plaintiff claimed the land to be, and from the tax-sale in which he redeemed them, are entirely proper and highly pertinent evidence to throw light upon the leading fact in issue,—the true locus of such land; and it is error to exclude such maps from evidence, when they show the land to be part of the county in which the tax redemption has been made.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Orange county; JOHN D. BROOME, Judge.

Ejectment by Simon B. Conover against John C. Russ. Verdict and judgment for defendant. New trial denied. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Charles Swayne, for appellant. Mershon & Rogers, for appellee.

TAYLOR, J. Simon B. Conover, as plaintiff in the court below, on the 20th day of January, A. D. 1886, instituted his action of ejectment in the circuit court of Orange county, in the seventh judicial circuit, against the appellee, John C. Russ, to try the title to, and recover the possession of, the following described lands: Lots 1, 2, 3, and 4 of section 12, township 20 S., of range 26 E. To the declaration the defendant pleaded the general issue. The cause was tried before a jury in Orange county on the 13th of June, 1887, and resulted in a verdict for the defendant, Russ. The plaintiff moved for a new trial upon divers grounds, which being denied, judgment was entered for the defendant, and from this judgment the plaintiff, Conover, appeals to this court. From the conclusions we have reached, after a careful consideration of the case, some discussion of the evidence becomes necessary. The plaintiff, to prove the issues on his behalf, introduced a deed to himself as grantee, made by the board of trustees of the internal improvement fund of Florida, dated the 23d of February, A. D. 1869, in which deed the said lands are described as "lying and being in Sumter county, Fla.," which deed, as appears from the indorsements thereon, was duly recorded in the Sumter county records on the 23d of May, 1871. The plaintiff then offered in evidence a certified transcript from the assessment rolls of Sumter county, showing that the lands in question were assessed for taxes in Sumter county for the years 1878, 1882, 1884, 1885, 1886, and 1887, accompanied by a certified copy of a portion of the map of Sumter county used and recognized by the officials of that county, that included the lands in question, and other adjacent lands along and near the supposed boundary line between the counties of Sumter and Orange, for the purpose of showing that said land lay in Sumter county at that time. This certified transcript of records and map of Sumter county were ruled out by the court, which ruling we think was erroneous. From the further developments at the trial it became evident that the defendant, Russ, claimed the land solely under a tax-deed acquired from the officers of Orange county, in pursuance of an alleged assessment and sale of the land for taxes for the year 1877 in Orange county; and it was further developed that the same land was assessed for taxes for that year (1877) in Sumter county, and sold to the state for such taxes in Sumter county, and that Conover, the plaintiff, redeemed the same from the state, and paid the taxes for the year 1877 that had been assessed thereon in Sumter county. The relative rights of the parties plaintiff and defendant depended then, in great measure, upon the solution of the fact as to whether these lands, in the year 1877, formed a part of the territory of Sumter or that of Orange county. If the land at that time formed a part of the territory of Sumter county, then it follows, as a matter of course, that the assessment and sale thereof for the taxes of that year in Orange county were a nullity, and that Russ acquired no title whatever by his tax-deed made in Orange county. For this reason it became highly important at the trial to establish the fact clearly as to which of the two said counties this land belonged in 1877; and as the land was located quite near to or upon the boundary line between the two, and as the exact location of that boundary line was enveloped in much obscurity, uncertainty, doubt, and dispute, both counties continuing, after the year 1877, to assess this land as part of their respective territory, we think that the maps of Sumter county, offered in evidence by the plaintiff and ruled out by the court, became not only competent, but entirely proper and highly pertinent, evidence in the cause, as throwing light upon the leading fact in issue,—the proper locus of the land. Tate v. Gray's Lessee, 1 Swan, 73; Carmichael v. Trustees, 3 How. (Miss.) 84; McClintock v. Rogers, 11 Ill. 279; Steele's Heirs v. Taylor, 3 A. K. Marsh. 225; Bruce v. Taylor, 2 J. J. Marsh. 160; Alexander v. Lively, 5 T. B. Mon. 159; Doe v. Hildreth, 2 Ind. 274; Den v. Van Houten, 22 N. J. Law, 61. We think the ruling of the court excluding these maps of Sumter county was such fatal error, and of such damaging effect upon the plaintiff's rights in the premises, that it is cause for reversal; and, having arrived at this conclusion, we deem it unnecessary to notice any other questions presented.

The order of the court is that the judgment of the court below is reversed, and that a new trial be granted.

CLARK et al. v. POPE.

(Supreme Court of Florida. Feb. 9, 1892.)

ATTORNEYS' FEES—VERDICT—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE—OFFER OF SETTLEMENT—EFFECT.

1. Where there is a conflict between the evidence introduced by the plaintiff and that offered by the defendant, the settlement of the question belongs to the province of the jury; and, under a well-settled rule on this subject, the appellate court will not disturb the verdict of the jury.

2. While it is true that a verdict of a jury, unsupported by evidence, or against the evidence, will not be sustained, yet a verdict cannot be set aside on the ground that it is excessive, and not justified by the evidence, where a witness, who is uncontradicted, testifies for plaintiff that the amount due from defendant is larger than the amount of the verdict rendered.

3. An offer of settlement made by plaintiff, but not accepted by defendant, is not binding on either party, and it is incumbent on plaintiff, after such offer, to establish by evidence the amount of his demand against the defendant.

Error to circuit court, Duval county; JAMES M. BAKER, Judge.

Suit by Frank W. Pope against Clark & Loftus to recover for services as an attorney at law. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. New trial denied. Defendants bring error. Affirmed.

R. B. Archibald, for plaintiffs in error. John E. Hartridge, for defendant in error.

MABRY, J. The defendant in error commenced a suit in September, A. D. 1887, in the circuit court for Duval county, against plaintiff in error, to recover the sum of $1,005, alleged to be due for services rendered as an attorney at law. The material averments of the declaration are as follows: "For that the said defendants are indebted to plaintiff in the sum of one thousand and five dollars, for money payable by defendants to plaintiff, for legal services as an attorney at law, done and rendered by plaintiff for defendants at their request."

"And in a like sum for work done in and material provided by plaintiff for defendants, at their request."

"And in like sum for money received by defendants for the use of the plaintiffs."

"And in like sum for money found to be due from defendants to plaintiff on an account stated between them." And in consideration of the premises said defendants promised to pay said several sums of money to the plaintiff on request, yet they have disregarded their said promises, and have not paid the same or any part thereof, to plaintiff's damage $1,300. A bill of particulars for $1,005 is attached to the declaration. To all the counts of the declaration defendants pleaded that they "never were indebted as alleged," and issue was joined thereon. The cause was tried in said court in May, A. D. 1888, and a verdict for $780 rendered in favor of plaintiff. Defendants below made a motion for a new trial, assigning three grounds, viz.: First, the "verdict had no basis in the evidence to rest upon, and was contrary thereto;" second, said "verdict was contrary to the law and the charge of the court;" and, third, "said verdict was excessive, and was not justified by the evidence." This motion was overruled, and defendants brought the case here upon writ of error.

The only questions presented for our review are those contained in the motion for a new trial, made in the circuit court. The testimony introduced on the trial, and the instructions of the court to the jury, are before us by bill of exceptions; but no objections were made to any part of the evidence, nor were any exceptions taken to any part of the instructions to the jury.

The plaintiff in error testified as a witness in his behalf that he was a practicing lawyer, and that in July, 1887, Mr. Clark, of the firm of Clark & Loftus, defendants, came into his office in Jacksonville, Fla., with insurance policies aggregating in amount $15,000, and said the insurance companies that issued the policies refused to pay more than nine or ten thousand dollars on a loss by fire a short time previous. That Clark made a statement of the matter to witness, and wanted his counsel. Witness advised Clark not to settle for such sum, as the policies could be collected. That, after advising with witness as a lawyer, Clark placed the claims against the insurance companies in his hands, as an attorney, for collection. That witness proceeded to prepare proofs of loss, which were very voluminous, and it took about a week's work for himself and clerk to furnish each company with proof of loss, and copy for defendants. That this involved many visits to the place of business of defendants, and an examination of their firm books. When proofs were made in proper form they were sent by mail to the insurance companies by witness, with a demand for payment. This was written in the name of defendants, as requested by Clark. That soon after the proofs were forwarded to the companies the adjusters returned to Jacksonville, and Mr. Clark came to the office of witness, and informed him that they had offered $13,000 as a settlement, and asked witness' advice about it. Witness advised that the claims were good for $15,000. Clark said he thought he had better take it, as different parties were suing him, and it would injure his credit; and that $13,000 would be better for him now than $15,000 in the future. Witness told him that, in view of the case, he could take the $13,000 if he wished, but that $15,000 could be collected; and thereupon Clark decided to take the $13,000, and asked for the policies, and witness' clerk went to the safe, got them out, and gave them to him, not suspecting that Clark intended to play any trick; and, supposing he would pay witness' fee when the money was collected, the policies were handed to Clark. When Clark first came to consult with witness, he asked what he was to be charged. Witness told him that the usual charge was 10 per cent., but, as this claim was for a large amount, he would not charge so much. Witness did not say what the charge would be, because he did not know how much work was involved in it. Clark paid witness $50 on account after adjusters had settled with him. He asked witness what his charge was, and witness told him that he would take $650. Witness then offered to take $650 because he wished to be very reasonable, having done some business before for defendants, and thinking it would be paid without any trouble. When Clark first consulted witness he said the insurance companies had offered between nine and ten thousand dollars; that they demanded a reduction of 20 per cent., or $3,000, for deterioration of furniture, $1,000 for property stolen the night of the fire, and over $1,000 for property saved. After advising with witness fully about it, Clark decided not to take it, and put the policies in witness' hands for collection. When proofs were sent to companies by due course, the adjusters returned to Jacksonville, and offered $13,000. The entire matter was conducted through witness, and on his advice.

Columbus B. Smith testified on behalf of plaintiff that he was present when Mr. Clark came to see Mr. Pope in reference to the insurance claims; that he heard Mr. Clark speak to Mr. Pope in reference to his charges, and also heard Mr. Pope say the regular charge was 10 per cent., but he would not charge Mr. Clark that much. Mr. Clark came to the office a number of times. Witness was about a week typewriting the proofs, as they were very voluminous. Witness was in the office when Mr. Clark came, after the proofs had been sent off and payment demanded. Mr. Clark said the adjusters had returned, and offered $13,000. Witness was not right close to them, but not far off; did not hear all of the conversation between them, but heard what was stated. Mr. Pope asked witness to unlock the safe, and get the policies for Mr. Clark, which he did, and handed them to him.

A. W. Cockrell, a witness for plaintiff, testified that he was an attorney at law, and that, in his opinion, 10 per cent. of the sum recovered is a proper fee to charge for the services rendered by the plaintiff; that 10 per cent. of the amount collected is a just and reasonable fee. Witness does not mean 10 per cent. of the amount in excess of $10,000, but 10 per cent. of $13,000.

Edward F. Clark testified, on behalf of the defendants, that he was one of the defendants, and in the latter part of June, 1887, the firm of Clark & Loftus lost their stock of furniture by fire. That said furniture was insured for $15,000, and the adjusters of the insurance companies, upon investigation, offered to settle for $10,000, but he refused to settle for that amount, and it became necessary to make up proofs of loss. That he went to Mr. Pope with the insurance policies, and said to him that the companies had offered to pay $10,000, but he would not accept that in settlement. He then told Mr. Pope that he wanted proofs of loss prepared, to present to the insurance companies. That witness did not put the claims in Mr. Pope's hands for collection. The insurance companies had not positively refused to pay then, but had simply made the offer of $10,000. That witness did not ask Mr. Pope to do anything more than prepare the proofs and send them in to the insurance companies; and that he did not employ Pope as a lawyer, to collect the amount due, but simply as a clerk, to make out the proofs. That he asked Mr. Pope what he would charge, but he would not tell. He simply replied that they would not quarrel about the charges. Pope did not tell witness that the usual rate was 10 per cent., but that he would not charge witness that much. Witness asked repeatedly what would Mr. Pope's fee be, and he replied in the same manner, —that he did not know, but they would not quarrel about fees. When witness refused to accept the offer of the insurance companies, the agents said that proofs of loss would have to be made up; and, after the proofs were forwarded, the companies settled at $13,000. Witness went to Mr. Pope's office to get the policies, and saw them scattered over the desk. Witness got the policies, and the adjusters paid him $13,000. After this, Mr. Pope called on witness for $50, which was paid him. About two weeks later he called again, and asked for $100, and witness asked him what he was going to charge defendants. Pope said he was entitled to a commission of 5 per cent. for collecting the money, which would make $650, and witness said it was not fair; that the claims had not been placed in Pope's hands for collection, but only to make up the proofs of loss.

In rebuttal, plaintiff testified that it was untrue, as testified to by Mr. Clark, that he did not put the policies in witness' hands for collection, but simply to make proofs; that Clark put them with plaintiff, as a lawyer, for collection. The proofs were made out by plaintiff, as the initial steps in the collection, and not at the request of Mr. Clark to make out proofs. He did not ask plaintiff to make proofs, but placed the claims in his hands for collection; and the proofs were made out because, after the refusal of the companies to pay, that was the first step to take. It is untrue, as stated by Clark, that plaintiff did not tell him that the usual rate was 10 per cent., but that plaintiff would not charge him that much. Plaintiff did so tell him. It is untrue, as stated by Clark, that when he came to get the policies he found them scattered over the desk. They were in plaintiff's safe, and plaintiff's clerk took them out of the safe, at plaintiff's direction, and handed them to Clark. Columbus B. Smith further testified that he heard Mr. Pope tell Mr. Clark that the usual rate was 10 per cent., but that he would not charge him that much; that when Mr. Clark came for the policies they were not scattered over the desk, but were in the safe, from which witness took them, by the direction of Mr. Pope, and handed them to Mr. Clark.

The above is a full statement of the evidence. There is a square issue between plaintiff and defendants as to whether or not the insurance claims were placed in the hands of the former as an attorney at law for collection. The settlement of this question belongs to the province of the jury, and, under the well-settled rule on this subject, the appellate court will not disturb their verdict. Wilson v. Dibble, 14 Fla. 47; Schultz v. Insurance Co., Id. 73; Nickels v. Mooring, 16 Fla. 76; Coker v. Merritt, Id. 416; Mayo v. Hynote, Id. 673.

Counsel for plaintiffs in error concedes that the verdict cannot be set aside on this ground, but he contends that the verdict is excessive, and there is no evidence to sustain the finding of the jury to the extent they have gone. The process of reasoning by which he arrives at this conclusion is this: that the plaintiff, according to his own showing, has done nothing but prepare proofs of loss, and submit same to the insurance companies; and in consequence of this work the said companies paid $3,000 more than they had previously offered. Hence it is contended that the plaintiff cannot recover compensation for anything except the $3,000. It is unquestionably true that a verdict of a jury, unwarranted by the evidence, and directly against it, will not be sustained. Schultz v. Insurance Co., 14 Fla. 73; Alvord v. Little, 16 Fla. 158; Wilson v. Marks, 18 Fla. 322; Railway Co. v. Roberts, 22 Fla. 324; Miller v. White, 23 Fla. 301, 2 South. Rep. 614. The testimony, however, submitted to the jury, must we look to in determining whether or not the verdict must be sustained. In the record before us, A. W. Cockrell testifies that he is an attorney at law, and that 10 per cent., not on the amount in excess of $10,000, but on $13,000, the amount collected, is a just and reasonable fee for the services rendered by the plaintiff. Defendants introduced no evidence in opposition to this testimony as to what was a reasonable fee to allow the plaintiff. The verdict is not for as much as the witness testified the plaintiff was entitled to, and hence it cannot be said that the verdict is unsupported by evidence. It is conceded that the verdict cannot be disturbed as against the weight of the evidence. Young v. Whitney, 18 Fla. 54. This being the case, we are unable to disregard the evidence of the only witness as to the value of the services rendered. The evidence shows that the plaintiff, Frank W. Pope, offered to take $650 for his services rendered the defendants, but this was not accepted; and he says he "offered then to take $650, because he wished to be very reasonable, having done some business for defendants before, and thinking, of course, it would be paid without any trouble." This offer did not bind either party, and, in the absence of any agreement as to the amount to be paid for the services, it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to establish by evidence what was a reasonable fee for his services. The testimony of the witness is that plaintiff is entitled to 10 per cent. on $13,000, and defendants have not controverted this testimony.

On the record before us we see no ground for disturbing the judgment of the circuit court, and it is therefore affirmed.

McSWAIN v. HOWELL.

(Supreme Court of Florida. Feb. 9, 1892.)

APPEAL — OBJECTIONS NOT RAISED BELOW — VERDICT — WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

1. Where no exceptions are taken in the trial court to the charge of the court, either in a motion for a new trial or otherwise, it is too late to raise such objections for the first time in the appellate court.

2. When no objection is made to the introduction of testimony on the trial of a cause, the rule is that such testimony is considered as received by consent, and no objection can be urged on appeal that was not made in the trial court, except as to its sufficiency.

3. A mere recital of a ground for a new trial, based upon matters in pais, in a motion, is no evidence that the matters so recited are true.

4. A verdict of a jury will not be set aside as against the weight of the evidence, unless it appears to be so palpably against the evidence, or against such a very strong preponderance of evidence, that great injustice seems to have been done, leading to the conclusion that the verdict was the result of prejudice, excitement, or other improper influences operating upon the minds of the jurors.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Walton county; JAMES F. McCLELLAN, Judge.

Action by C. E. Howell against G. D. McSwain for a breach of contract. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. New trial denied. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Daniel Campbell, for appellant. D. L. McKennon, for appellee.

MABRY, J. This is an action at law instituted in the circuit court for Walton county, in the first judicial circuit of Florida. C. E. Howell, appellee, was plaintiff, and G. D. McSwain, appellant, was defendant, in the circuit court.

In a special count in the declaration it is, in substance, alleged that on or about the 1st day of February, A. D. 1887, plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract whereby the plaintiff was to build for defendant a house in the town of De Funiak Springs, for a house and lot in said town, the property of defendant, and estimated by plaintiff to be worth $1,200; that it was understood and agreed, by and between both parties, that the defendant would make plaintiff a deed to said house and lot at any time when called on for that purpose, as plaintiff might desire it to raise money to complete said house to be constructed for defendant, and also to enable plaintiff to carry on his business as contractor and carpenter; that soon after the making of said contract plaintiff began work on said house, agreed to be built, and called upon defendant several times while said house was in progress of construction, for the deed to said house and lot agreed to be executed, and that defendant, after promising to execute said deed soon, under various pretexts put plaintiff off until just before said house was completed, and then absolutely refused to execute said deed; that plaintiff completed said house according to contract, and defendant accepted and received it, and it was worth $1,200; that defendant failed to make the said deed to said house and lot for plaintiff, or pay him anything for the said building so constructed and accepted, though often requested so to do, and which has damaged plaintiff in the sum of at least $500 in addition to the value of said building, by preventing him from taking other contracts, injuring his credit, and involving him in lawsuits, with heavy costs and attorney's fees.

There are other counts in the declaration. One is for $1,240.65 for furnishing material and building a house for defendant at his request, and the common counts for like sum of money lent by plaintiff to defendant at his request, and for like sum paid by plaintiff for use of defendant at his request, and for like sum of money found to be due from defendant to plaintiff on an account stated between them.

A demurrer to that portion of the declaration which claims damages for refusal to execute deed to house and lot, interposed by defendant below, was sustained by the trial court. Issue was joined upon three pleas of defendant, and the cause submitted to a jury for hearing. The first plea—which is to the common counts—is that defendant was never indebted to plaintiff as alleged in the declaration. The second plea, also directed to the common counts, is that plaintiff, at the commencement of said suit, was, and still is, indebted to defendant in the sum of $138.75, with interest, which sum defendant is willing to set off against plaintiff's claim. The third plea, directed to the special count, is that plaintiff agreed to build for defendant a house of certain dimensions for a house owned by defendant, situated in East De Funiak, and which was estimated to be worth $800; that plaintiff agreed to furnish all material and do the work in a workman-like manner, and deliver the house to defendant free from all liens of carpenters or material-men, and that defendant would then deliver to plaintiff a deed to said house and lot in East De Funiak; that plaintiff went into possession of said house in East De Funiak, and occupied the same, and when not in the occupancy thereof leased it to others; that before plaintiff had made much progress on said house he desired a deed executed for the building in East De Funiak, but defendant did not execute said deed, as it was not agreed by defendant to execute deed until the said house was completed; that plaintiff said he was unable to carry out his contract unless he could raise money, and defendant then indorsed for plaintiff, and he received $425 thereon; and that after the house was considered completed by plaintiff, and before the commencement of this suit, defendant executed and tendered a deed to plaintiff for the house and lot as agreed upon, and that he was always ready and willing to execute said deed after the said house was completed. Upon these pleas issue was joined, and the jury to whom the cause was submitted rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $842.66⅔.

A motion for a new trial was made by defendant, McSwain, on the alleged grounds that: (1) "The verdict of the jury was contrary to the evidence;" (2) "the verdict of the jury is against the weight of evidence;" (3) "the verdict of the jury is unsupported by the evidence;" (4) "the verdict of the jury is contrary to law;" (5) "the verdict of the jury is against the charge of the court;" (6) "the jury permitted the bailiff to come into their room during their deliberations, and was asked something in reference to his opinion about the case then under consideration." This motion was overruled, and defendant appealed.

Appellant, McSwain, assigns in this court the following as errors: (1) The court erred in admitting evidence to prove the value of the house, and of the material used in building the house, charged in plaintiff's bill of particulars filed; (2) the court erred in its charge to the jury, in substance, that the plaintiff could recover in this action, notwithstanding the evidence might show that the plaintiff accepted an indorsement by the defendant to aid in building the house after defendant had refused a deed to plaintiff; (3) the court erred in refusing to set aside the verdict, and grant a new trial; (4) the court erred in its charge to the jury, stating, in substance, that the plaintiff could recover in this action, though the jury should believe from the evidence that there was an express contract between the parties, and that the house and lot of the defendant in East De Funiak was the consideration agreed upon by the parties for the building and furnishing material of the house by the plaintiff for the defendant; (5) the court erred in overruling the motion of the defendant for a new trial.

The 1st, 2d, and 4th assignments of error endeavor to raise questions which we cannot consider. No exception whatever was taken to the charge of the court, or any part thereof, either in the motion for new trial or otherwise, and it is too late to raise objections to the charge of the trial court for the first time in the appellate court. This question has been so thoroughly considered in recent decisions of this court that we deem it unnecessary to go over the authorities again. Parrish v. Railroad Co., 28 Fla. —, 9 South. Rep. 696; Richardson v. State, 28 Fla. —, 9 South. Rep. 704; Pinson v. State, 28 Fla. —, 9 South. Rep. 706. We are not at liberty to disregard the rule announced in these decisions. It does not appear from the bill of exceptions before us that any objection was made to the introduction of any testimony on the trial of this cause. The rule on this subject is that, where no objection is made to the introduction of testimony, it is considered as received by consent, and no objection can be urged here that was not taken in the court below, except as to its sufficiency. Tuten v. Gazan, 18 Fla. 751. No objection having been made to any testimony in the circuit court, such objections cannot be raised here.

The third and fifth assignments of error are the same, and present as error the overruling of the motion for a new trial. The various grounds of the motion for a new trial may be considered under two heads: First, that the verdict of the jury is unsupported by the evidence; and, second, that the jury permitted the bailiff to come into their room during their deliberations, and was asked something in reference to his opinion about the case then under consideration. The bill of exceptions shows that the motion for a new trial was overruled, but it is silent as to what evidence, if any, was introduced on the hearing of the motion to sustain any ground thereof. A mere recital of a ground for a new trial, based upon matters in pais, in a motion, is no evidence that the matters so recited are true. See authorities supra.

We find copied into the record an affidavit made by one J. R. Tucker, who says that he was bailiff of the jury in the case of C. E. Howell, plaintiff, v. G. D. McSwain, defendant, and that "during the deliberations he is satisfied the jury asked him something in reference to the case then under consideration; the exact words or language he does not now remember." We do not concede that the statements of this affidavit are sufficient to authorize the setting aside of the verdict, but, if we were to admit this much, we would be unable to refer to the affidavit in passing upon the ruling of the motion, for the reason that there is nothing to show us that it was used in evidence on the hearing of said motion in the circuit court. In reviewing decisions of trial courts based upon matters in pais, a bill of exceptions, or something tantamount thereto, is necessary in order to bring such matters before the appellate court. Hellen v. Steinwender, 28 Fla. —, 10 South. Rep. 207. Here we have no such evidence, and hence nothing to sustain the ground alleged in reference to the bailiff going into the jury-room.

We have examined the evidence certified to us by the bill of exceptions, and, without going into a discussion of it in this opinion, state our conclusion that there is no error in the action of the court in overruling the motion for a new trial on the ground that the verdict is unsupported by the evidence. In Wilson v. Dibble, 14 Fla. 47, it is said: "Where a verdict is so palpably against evidence, or against such a very strong preponderance of evidence, that great injustice seems to have been done, leading to the conclusion that the verdict was the result of prejudice or excitement or other improper influences, there should be no hesitation in setting it aside." Here it was held that a new trial should not be granted as against the weight of evidence, unless the preponderance is such as to warrant the opinion that the verdict was produced by improper influences. In the case before us there is a conflict between the evidence produced by plaintiff and the defendant, and, under the rules on this subject announced in our decisions, we are unable to say that the verdict was unsupported by the evidence. Nickels v. Mooring, 16 Fla. 76; Schultz v. Insurance Co., 14 Fla. 73.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

STATE ex rel. CITY OF JACKSONVILLE v. JACKSONVILLE ST. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Florida. Feb. 9, 1892.)

CONTROL OF STREETS—LEGISLATIVE POWER—HORSE RAILROADS—COMPENSATION TO ABUTTERS—REPAIRS—ORDINANCE—MANDAMUS.

1. The dominant control of highways and streets is vested in the legislative power of the state, and, by virtue of legislative enactment, a railroad, operated either by steam or animal power, may be constructed across or along them without the consent of the municipal authorities.

2. It is competent for the legislature to authorize the construction of a street railway, operated by horse-power, as distinguished from one operated by steam, in the public streets, without providing any compensation to abutting property holders along the street through which such road may be constructed. This is upon the theory that such roads are not additional burdens upon the soil of the street, but are legitimate uses of the highway, in furtherance of the purposes for which they were originally dedicated.

3. It is within the power of the legislature to delegate to municipal corporations the right to license or permit railroad companies to lay railroad tracks in the streets in such manner as not to divert them from their original uses; but a difference exists between the power of a municipal corporation to grant a corporate franchise and the right to permit a corporation vested with such franchise to place railroad tracks in the public streets. If the municipal body can ever grant a corporate franchise, such power must be expressly conferred by the legislature.

4. The authority of a general nature to regulate and control the streets usually granted to municipal bodies is generally deemed sufficient to clothe the municipal body with the right to grant or refuse, or otherwise to regulate, the use of the streets for street railways operated by horse-power.

5. The general powers conferred upon municipal bodies by the act of the legislature, chapter 1688, Laws of Florida, as amended by the act of 1877, c. 3024, to regulate, improve, alter, extend, and open streets, and to regulate and control the construction, grading, and repairs of streets, pavements, and sidewalks, invested such bodies with authority to impose by ordinance upon street railways operated by horses, thereafter to be constructed, the duty to keep the portions of the streets between the tracks of said railways and two feet on each side in as good repair and condition as the city keeps the balance of the street, and of even grade with the street.

6. Under an ordinance requiring a street-railway company to keep the portions of streets between its railway tracks and two feet on each side thereof in as good repair and condition as the city keeps the balance of the streets, and of even grade with the street, it is the duty of said street-railway company not only to keep the space between its tracks and two feet on each side of even grade with the balance of the street, and in as good repair as the city keeps the balance of the street, but also to pave the portions of streets between its said tracks and two feet on each side thereof when the city paves the balance of the streets.

7. Where the measure of duty imposed by ordinance on a street-railway company is to keep the portions of streets between its railway tracks and two feet on each side in as good repair and condition as the city keeps the balance of the street, if the balance of the street has in fact been paved under the supervision and control of the city, and is kept in this condition, this is sufficient to require said company to pave under said ordinance; and it is immaterial that there may have been irregularity in the procedure, or a departure from prescribed methods for procuring the pavement of streets.

8. To pave a street is not necessarily to change its grade, as a paving may be done in any way that will make a compact, even, hard surface.

9. Mandamus will lie against a street-railway company to compel it to perform a clear legal duty to the public.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Original proceedings in mandamus by the city of Jacksonville against the Jacksonville Street Railroad Company to compel the performance of duties in relation to the improvement of certain streets.

Cooper & Cooper and S. E. Foster, for plaintiff. John E. Hartridge, for defendant.

MABRY, J. This is an original proceeding here by mandamus, instituted by the city of Jacksonville against the Jacksonville Street-Railroad Company to coerce the performance of certain alleged duties in reference to the paving and repairing portions of certain streets of said city upon and through which said street-railroad company has constructed and is now operating its street railroad.

It is alleged in the alternative writ substantially as follows: That the city of Jacksonville is a municipal corporation existing under the laws of the state of Florida, in Duval county, and through its officers has charge and control of the streets within the city limits; and that the Jacksonville Street-Railroad Company is a public corporation and common carrier for hire, existing under the laws of Florida, and as such owns, maintains, and operates a street railway upon and through certain public streets of the said city, among which are Hogan, Bay, Newnan, Union, Cedar, and Beaver streets. That on the 14th day of January, A. D. 1880, the said city of Jacksonville, by ordinance, granted to the said Jacksonville Street-Railroad Company the right to construct a railway along the streets of said city, a copy of the ordinance being attached as an exhibit to the alternative writ. That the provisions of said ordinance required of said street-railroad company, and by accepting the same said company engaged, contracted, and agreed with said city, that the tracks of said street railroad should be laid down in the best and most approved mode of constructing street railways, and said streets and parts of streets so used by said company for their railroad track, switches, turnouts, crossings, and sidings should be kept, for at least two feet outside of said tracks, in as good repair and condition as the said city keeps the balance of said streets, and of even grade with the streets, (except in cases of regrading,) so that carriages and other vehicles can cross said street-railway track with ordinary ease; and thereby it became and is the duty of said Jacksonville Street-Railroad Company to keep the parts of said streets so occupied by its tracks, switches, turnouts, crossings, and sidings, and for at least two feet outside of said tracks, in as good repair and condition as the said city keeps the balance of said streets. That thereafter the said city paved or caused to be paved with cypress blocks certain of the streets occupied by the tracks of said street railway, to-wit: In the year 1885, Bay street, from Bridge street to the east side of Market street; in the year 1890, Hogan street, from Bay street to the north side of Adams street; and Bay street, from the east side of Market street to Liberty street; and thereupon it became, and still is, the duty of said street-railroad company, under the terms of said ordinance, to pave the space between the rails of its said tracks, and two feet on each side thereof, in said streets where, by the authority of said city, the said streets were so paved, in like manner, and with like material, and of even grade, with the paving of the balance of said streets by the authorities of said city. That, although it was the duty of said street-railroad company to pave the portions of said streets, and keep the same in such condition, it has failed so to do at the following points and places, to-wit: On Bay street, at the intersection of Laura street with said Bay street, for a distance of 30 feet, more or less; on Bay street, from the east side of Market street to Liberty street; and on Hogan street, from Bay street to the north side of Adams street. That, under the provisions of said ordinance, it was and is furthermore the duty of said street-railroad company to keep the said streets and parts of streets so used by it for its railway tracks, switches, turnouts, crossings, and sidings, and at least two feet outside of the same, of even grade with the streets, and in such manner that carriages and other vehicles could and can cross said tracks with ordinary ease; but, although such was and is the duty of said company, it has failed and refused to keep the parts of said streets occupied by its said tracks, switches, turnouts, crossings, and sidings of such grade with the balance of said streets, and in such manner that carriages and other vehicles could and can cross the same with ordinary ease, to-wit: On Bay street, from the east side of Liberty street to a point 20 feet, more or less, east of Laura street; on Newnan street, from Bay street to Union street, thence eastwardly along Union and Cedar streets, to a point near the south-east corner of the old city cemetery, where the boundary line, as it formerly existed, crosses said Cedar street; and on Hogan street, from the north side of Adams street to Beaver street, thence along Beaver street west to a point about half way between Bridge and Clay streets, where the boundary line of said city, as it formerly existed, crosses Beaver street. That said street-railroad company has been often requested by the authorities of said city to perform its said duties in reference to the paving and keeping in condition and repair said streets, but has absolutely refused to perform its said duties, or any of them, and still refuses so to do, to the wrong and injury of the public of said city. By reason of the failure of said street-railroad company to perform its said duties in the premises, the use of said streets by the public as public highways for public travel and transportation is greatly impaired and lessened, and the parts of streets at the points above mentioned rendered unsafe, and unfit for use and travel by the public, and many points almost impassable by the public in vehicles on account of depressions between the paved portions of the streets and the tracks, and between the rails of the tracks of said street railway, varying from six to twelve inches in depth; and on unpaved portions of said streets, on account of the tracks and the space between the rails not being kept of even grade with the streets, but having depressions and elevations between the rails of the tracks, caused by the use of said streets by said railroad company for its railway, said depressions and elevations causing a difference in the level with the balance of the street of from six to twelve inches.

The answer of the respondent, the street-railroad company, is, in substance, as follows: It is admitted that the city of Jacksonville, as alleged in the alternative writ, caused certain streets mentioned to be paved; but it is averred that said streets were not paved by reason of any ordinance of the city of Jacksonville or law of the state of Florida, or by reason of any tax levied for the purpose of paving streets. That said streets were paved under an agreement between the abutting property holders and the city of Jacksonville, by the terms of which the abutting property holders were to pave the streets in front of their several properties, and the city was to pave the intersections of streets and crossings; and that the same was done under the supervision of the city. That as to those certain portions of said streets paved between the rails of respondent's railway, when called upon to pay for same, after consideration, it did so with the express stipulation and averment that it did it as a gratuity and contribution, and not as a recognition of any right to compel it to pave. That as to others of the streets not mentioned in the alternative writ as paved, where the abutting property holder declined to contribute for paving purposes, the street, so far as his property's frontage was concerned, was not paved; and, so far as the property holder's property who contributed was concerned, it was paved in front of his holding; presenting a picture of one-half of the street being paved where the property holder was willing to furnish the means, and the other half unpaved where the property holder declined to contribute. That the city of Jacksonville has never adopted any ordinance for carrying into execution the charter under which it now exists, so far as providing for a method of paving is concerned; and that no ordinance of the city was in force at the time of the incorporation of respondent, regarding the paving of the streets, or providing the method for paving the streets, and no ordinance has since been adopted for such purposes. That the city of Jacksonville did adopt the ordinance set forth in the alternative writ, but avers that it was not adopted until the 14th day of January, A. D. 1880, long after respondent's corporate existence, and could in no way lawfully impair or infringe any of respondent's rights; and that its rights in the streets of the city existed without regard to this ordinance and at the time of its adoption. That it was incorporated under an act of the legislature of the state of Florida, providing for the incorporation of railroads and canals, approved February 19, 1874, and that its letters patent bear date the 24th day of December, A. D. 1879, a copy of which is attached to and made a part of its answer; and that at the time of the granting said letters patent the streets of said city, each and every of them, were unpaved, and so remained until the time of the paving, as alleged in the alternative writ. That, as to filling in said streets between the rails of its tracks, it admits that it is its duty to keep them in condition relative to the grade established at the time of the construction of its tracks, but avers that it is not its duty to keep them plumb with the balance of the street, when the grades have been changed, and that in changing the grades it is the duty of the city to fill them in; and in reference to the allegation in the alternative writ, that it accepted the provisions of said ordinance, it accepted the same no further and to no greater extent than the same was valid and binding in law, and only in the way as other citizens accepted the same, by remaining passive; and admits its track was laid and road built subsequent to the passage of said ordinance.

To this answer of respondent the municipal corporation, relator, has filed a demurrer, assigning the following grounds: (1) That the allegations thereof are uncertain; (2) that the allegation, the streets were not paved by reason of any ordinance or law, is irrelevant and immaterial to case made by alternative writ; (3) that the answer is uncertain and evasive as to what streets respondent contracted to pave, does not allege same to be at places named in writ; (4) answer is irrelevant as to some streets—not those mentioned in writ—being paved only in part; (5) answer is not responsive, and is irrelevant, in that it alleges no ordinance exists in city of Jacksonville as to paving; (6) the answer presents no defense when it alleges that the ordinance mentioned in writ does not interfere with its corporate rights under its act of incorporation; it neither admits nor denies that it acquired its right to construct said street railway from the ordinance, and inspection of the act of incorporation and ordinance shows the respondent operates its railroad in said streets by virtue of said ordinance; (7) the streets in said city of Jacksonville, under general incorporation act of 1868, in force in 1880, were under control of said city council, and respondent could not lawfully construct street railroad thereon without consent of city council; (8) the ordinance set out in the writ fixes the duties of the street-railroad company in the respect sought to be enforced by this proceeding, and the answer shows no reason why respondent should not perform the duties set out in the writ; (9) the answer presents no defense or response to the writ.

The duties of respondent, it is alleged, are imposed by the ordinance in question; and, as it is maintained in the answer that the rights of respondent in the streets of Jacksonville exist without regard to this ordinance, the first question to be settled is to what extent the said ordinance is binding upon the respondent street-railroad company. It is admitted that the ordinance was passed before the street railway was constructed. The allegation in the alternative writ is that "the city of Jacksonville, by ordinance, granted to said Jacksonville Street-Railroad Company the right to construct a railway along the streets of said city," and "that the provisions of said ordinance required of said street-railroad company, and by accepting the same said company engaged, contracted, and agreed with said city, that the tracks of said street railroad should be laid down in the best and most approved mode of constructing street railways, and said streets and parts of streets so used by said company for their railroad track, switches, turnouts, crossings, and sidings should be kept for at least two feet outside of said tracks in as good repair and condition as the said city keeps the balance of said streets, and of even grade with the streets, (except in cases of regrading,) so that carriages and other vehicles can cross said street-railway track with ordinary ease, and thereby it became and is the duty of said street-railroad company to keep the parts of said streets so occupied by its tracks, switches, turnouts, crossings, and sidings, and for at least two feet outside of said tracks, in as good repair and condition as the said city keeps the balance of said streets."

In reply, respondent alleges that said ordinance was passed long after its corporate existence, and by virtue of its incorporation it had the authority to construct, equip, maintain, and operate a street railroad upon and through the streets of said city; and that said ordinance can in no way lawfully impair or infringe any of its rights, and that its rights in said streets exist without regard to said ordinance. In reference to the allegation that respondent corporation accepted the provisions of said ordinance, it is alleged that "it accepted the same no further and to no greater extent than the same was valid and binding in law, and only in the way as other citizens accepted the same, by remaining passive."

The position of counsel for respondent is that, said street-railroad company having become incorporated before the passage of said ordinance to construct a street railway in the streets of the city of Jacksonville, it has the right, by virtue of article 5, section 10, of chapter 1987, Laws of Florida, approved February 19, A. D. 1874, to construct its road across, along, and upon any street of said city, without regard to the action of the city council, and that no ordinance of said city could impose any other obligations upon said company than those prescribed by said act of the legislature. It is proper to state here, our understanding is that the Jacksonville Street Railroad is a horse railway, as distinguished from one whose cars are propelled by steam.

The first section of the ordinance, after granting the right of way through the streets, provides that said street-railroad company may operate its road with all necessary motive power; but the third section provides that it may use steam motive power on certain streets mentioned; and, as the question of paving here does not relate to any streets where steam-power is permitted by the ordinance, we conclude that the right of the city to deal with horse railways is alone involved.

The legislature has undoubtedly supervision and control of highways and streets, and may authorize the construction of a railroad, operated either by steam or animal power, across or along them. This results from the dominant power which the state possesses over all its highways; and it may be done without the consent of municipal authorities. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 656; Elliott, Roads & S. pp. 562, 563; Pierce, R. R. p. 246; Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 4003; Eickels v. Railway Co., 78 Ind. 261; Railroad Co. v. Mayor, etc., 45 Ga. 602; Hodges v. Railway Co., 58 Md. 603.

It is also true that the legislature can authorize the construction of a horse railway, as distinguished from one operated by steam, in public streets, without providing any compensation to abutting property holders along the street through which such road may be constructed. This is upon the theory that it is a legitimate use of the highway, and the exercise of a public right of travel over it. Such are not considered as additional burdens upon the soil of the street, but as improvements in the use of the same for the very purpose for which they were dedicated. In the progress of civilization they are regarded as the best and cheapest mode yet devised of utilizing streets without at the same time diverting them from the use to which they have been devoted, and in which the public have a special interest. Our own court has adjudicated this point in the case of Randall v. Railroad Co., 19 Fla. 410, and it is sustained by many authorities. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) § 725; Cooley, Const. Lim. 556, and authorities cited to sustain the texts; Eickels v. Railway Co., supra.

As we are dealing with questions relating to the rights of horse railways, or railways operated by animal power, in public streets, it is not necessary to refer to the conditions upon which the legislature can authorize the appropriation of streets by railroads propelled by steam. It is furthermore true that the legislature can delegate to municipal or local bodies the power to grant or refuse the right to place railroad tracks in public streets. Here it may be proper to say that there is a material difference between the power of a municipal corporation to grant a corporate franchise, or authority to construct a street railroad and take tolls and emoluments for services, and the right to license or permit corporations vested with such franchises to lay tracks in streets in such manner as not to divert them from their original uses. If the municipal body can ever exercise the power to grant such corporate franchises, it must be expressly conferred by the legislature. The cases of Davis v. Mayor, 14 N. Y. 506; People's Railroad v. Memphis Railroad, 10 Wall. 38,—were decided, we understand, upon the theory that the municipal bodies had no such power. It is conceded that the Jacksonville Street-Railroad Company is a corporation organized for the purpose of constructing the street railway, and the only question under this branch of the case is to what extent the municipal body can impose conditions upon the laying of the tracks on the streets. The legislature unquestionably has the power to confer upon the municipal government the right to control and regulate such matters. Elliott, Roads & S.; Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. supra.

In reference to the terms of the legislative grant to municipal bodies in such matters, the distinction between ordinary railways operated by steam and horse railways is still maintained. While the legislature has the power to confer upon municipal corporations the right to permit or refuse the use of the streets for railways operated by either steam or horse power, the authority of a general nature to regulate and control the streets usually granted to such bodies is not deemed sufficient to authorize the appropriation of the streets by steam railways, but such powers are usually ample to clothe the municipal body with the right to grant or refuse or otherwise to regulate the use of the streets by horse railways. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) § 724; State v. Railway Co., 85 Mo. 263; Atchison Street Ry. Co. v. Missouri Pacific Ry. Co., 31 Kan. 660, 3 Pac. Rep. 284; City of Indianola v. Railway Co., 56 Tex. 594.

The respondent, the street-railroad company, it is alleged became incorporated in December, A. D. 1879, before the ordinance in question was passed, and that by virtue of chapter 1987, supra, it is claimed that it acquired the right to lay its tracks in the streets of said city, free from the imposition of any burdens other than those prescribed by said act. It is not claimed that by laying down its railway tracks it could interfere with the use of the streets as highways, or would not be liable to repair and keep them in the condition in which they were when the road was constructed. Railroad Co. v. State, 23 Fla. 546, 3 South. Rep. 158. Its contention is that the measure of its obligations in reference to the condition of the streets is found in the said act of the legislature, and not in the said ordinance. The ordinance was passed in January, A. D. 1880, and the act of the legislature which respondent claims prescribes its duties in the premises was approved February 19, A. D. 1874. In March, A. D. 1877, the legislature, by an amendment of the act of 1869, conferred upon city or town councils the power to regulate, improve, alter, extend, and open streets, lanes, and avenues; to cause encroachments and obstructions, decayed buildings and ruins, to be removed; and to regulate and control the construction, grading, and repairs of all streets, pavements, and sidewalks within the city or town limits. Sections 2, 3, c. 3024, Laws Fla.; sections 17, 19, pp. 248, 249, McClel. Dig. The grant of authority over streets conferred by the sections above mentioned without doubt invested the city with authority to regulate and control the construction, improving, grading, and repairing of all streets within her limits. Such powers are conferred upon the local bodies, which are agencies of the state government, to be exercised by them in behalf of the public and for the public good. Not only are they invested with control and authority over the construction, improvement, and repair of the streets for the benefit of the inhabitants of the local government, but such grants impose certain important duties to the public. City of Jacksonville v. Drew, 19 Fla. 106. The respondent company was incorporated after the passage of the act of 1877, supra; and, if any conflict should exist between this act and the one of 1874, upon which the defense here is based, the former would control; but we perceive no conflict between them, at least as to street railways. Conceding that the respondent company had the franchise right to construct the railroad, yet the manner in which it was to be done, and the amount of contribution to be made by it to the municipal body for the maintenance of the street, in consideration of the benefits thereby derived, were left by the act of 1877 to the regulation of the municipal body. Under the decisions, the general powers conferred upon municipal bodies by said act to regulate and control the construction, improvement, and repair of streets are sufficient to authorize them to impose such conditions as are contained in that portion of the ordinance now under consideration, and hence we conclude that the respondent company is bound thereby.

The next inquiry is, what duties are imposed on the respondent company by the provision of the ordinance in question? The failure to perform two distinct duties under the ordinance is averred. The first one is a failure to pave the portions of the street between the railway tracks of respondent, and two feet on the outside thereof, in certain streets where the city has paved, or caused to be paved, the other portions of the streets; and the second is a failure to keep certain streets and parts of streets used by respondent for its railway tracks, switches, turnouts, crossings, and sidings, and at least two feet outside of the same, of even grade with the streets, and in such manner that carriages and other vehicles can cross said tracks with ordinary ease. The ordinance in question requires the respondent to keep the said portions of streets in as good repair and condition as the city keeps the balance of said streets, and "of even grade with the streets, (excepting in cases of regrading,) so that carriages and other vehicles can cross said street-railway track with ordinary ease." Independent of the allegation that said ordinance is not binding upon respondent, the only other averment in the answer in reference to the charge that said portions of streets are not kept of even grade with other portions is "that, so far as the filling in of said streets between its rails is concerned, it admits that it is its duty to keep them in condition relative to the grade established at the time that this respondent constructed its track, but avers that it is not its duty to keep them plumb with the balance of the street when the grades have been changed, and that in changing the grades it is the duty of the city to fill them in." There is no averment in the alternative writ that the grades of the streets have been changed where respondent has failed to keep the portions of the streets between its tracks, and two feet on either side, of even grade with the balance of the street. The allegation is that it is the duty of respondent, under the ordinance, to keep the portions of the streets therein mentioned of even grade (except in cases of regrading) with the balance of the streets, and that it has failed to do so in certain places mentioned. The only reply is that it is not respondent's duty to keep said portions of streets plumb with the balance of the streets when the grades have been changed, and that in changing the grade it is the duty of the city to fill them in. This allegation constitutes no answer to the branch of the case now under consideration. It is not claimed that the city has changed the grades of the streets at the points mentioned, or that the portions required by the ordinance to be kept of even grade with the balance of the street are so kept. Under the ordinance, the grade established at the time the railroad track was laid cannot be altered by the city at the expense of respondent; but, as no question of a change of the grade has been presented, it is not necessary to say anything in reference to the relative rights and duties of the respective parties under such conditions. The answer shows no sufficient reason for the failure of respondent to keep the portion of the streets between its railway tracks, and two feet on the outside thereof, of even grade with the balance of the streets in the places mentioned in the alternative writ. This is true of the answer in reference to a failure to keep portions of streets of even grade with the balance of the streets at points where no paving is alleged to have been done on the part of the city.

The duty of the respondent to pave under the circumstances appearing upon the record will now be considered.

The first ground interposed as a defense to the demand on the respondent to pave certain portions of streets between its railway tracks and two feet on either side is that the balance of the streets were not paved by reason of any ordinance of said city, or tax levied therefor, or any law of the state of Florida, but under an agreement between abutting property holders and the city, by the terms of which the former were to pave in front of their respective properties, and the latter were to pave intersections and crossings of streets. It is admitted that the city caused the said portions of streets to be paved, and it was done under the supervision of the city, but it is alleged that no ordinance has ever been passed providing for said paving. It is not claimed that the city has no power to pave the streets, but, as we understand the position of counsel for respondent, it is that no duty devolved upon said street-railroad company to pave the portions between its said tracks and two feet on each side until the city has provided by ordinance for paving the balance of the streets. The respondent's obligation, as has been determined, is measured by the ordinance in question, and by virtue of this ordinance the duty is imposed on respondent to keep the portions of streets between its track, and two feet on each side, in as good repair and condition as the city keeps the balance of the street; and, if the balance of the streets has in fact been paved under the supervision and control of the city, and is kept in this condition, as is alleged here and not denied, this is the measure of respondent's duty under the obligation assumed by it under the ordinance of 1880. It is immaterial to respondent that there may have been irregularity in the proceeding, or a departure from prescribed methods of procuring the pavement of streets, but it is sufficient to require the performance of its obligation that the streets have been actually paved, and are kept or maintained in this condition, by the city in the exercise of its municipal powers.

The remaining question is, does the ordinance in fact impose the duty of paving upon respondent? It is insisted by counsel for respondent that no further duty is imposed by the ordinance than to repair the portions of the streets in question, and that the duty to repair does not include the obligation to pave. The latter part of this proposition we accept as true. It is clear, we think, both from reason and authority, that the duty alone to repair does not carry with it the obligation to pave in the first instance. To repair a street is to restore it to a former condition or state, after decay or partial destruction. Railway Co. v. City of Pittsburg, 80 Pa. St. 72; State v. Railway Co., 85 Mo. 263. Under the duty to repair would doubtless be included the liability to restore any pavement that might be put down by the city, but simply to repair cannot be construed into a duty to place the pavement primarily. Mayor, etc., v. Scharf, 54 Md. 499; Chicago v. Sheldon, 9 Wall. 50; Elliott, Roads & S. pp. 594, 595; State v. Railway Co., supra. Counsel for the city contend that the ordinance in question means more than simply to repair. It, they say, involves the obligation not only to keep the said portions of streets in good repair, but also in as good condition as the city keeps the balance of the streets, and of even grade with the streets, (excepting in cases of regrading,) so that vehicles can cross the same with ordinary ease. In determining the rights and duties of the respective contestants here, a liberal construction should obtain in favor of relator. The grant to the respondent of the right to use the streets for the prosecution of its business for profit is a benefit and privilege, and the rule is that such grants are construed against the beneficiaries. People v. Newton, 112 N. Y. 396, 19 N. E. Rep. 831; Birmingham & Pratt Mines St. Ry. Co. v. Birmingham St. Ry. Co., 79 Ala. 465. Taking the language of the contract between the parties here in its literal meaning, independent of the rule above stated, we think it cannot be confined simply to repairs. The respondent must not only keep the portions of streets in good repair, but in as good condition as the city keeps the balance of the streets. The word "condition" is defined by Mr. Webster to mean "mode, or state of being; state or situation with regard to external circumstances; essential quality; property; attribute." We must arrive at the meaning of this ordinance from the language employed in it; and under the rule of construction applicable in such cases we think that when the city paves the balance of the streets the duty under it devolves upon the respondent company to pave between its tracks and two feet on each side. When the city paves, if the railroad company declines, it cannot be said that it keeps the parts of the streets in question in as good condition, or in as good state of being or essential quality, as the city keeps the balance. In order to meet this obligation, the railroad company must also pave. The cases cited by counsel for respondent hold that the duty to repair does not include the duty to pave. They do not go beyond this, we think. In Mayor, etc., v. Scharf, 54 Md. 499, the ordinance required the railroad company "to keep the streets occupied by its tracks, and two feet on each side of its tracks, in thorough repair." It was here held that the company must repair, but not to repave with a new and different material. In State v. Railway Co., supra, the language of the ordinance was that "the space between the rails of said track and the street, for a space of two feet on either side and along the line of said track, * * * shall be kept and maintained in good repair by said railroad company;" and it was held the only duty imposed was one to repair, and not to pave. The provision of the ordinance involved in the case of Chicago v. Sheldon, supra, reads as follows: "The said company shall, as respects the grading, paving, macadamizing, filling, or planking the streets or parts of the streets upon which they shall construct their said railroads, or any of them, keep eight feet in width along the line of said railway on all the streets wherever one track is constructed, and sixteen feet in width along the line of said railway where two tracks are constructed, in good repair and condition during all the time to which the privileges hereby granted to said company shall extend, in accordance with whatever order or regulation respecting the ordinary repairs thereof may be adopted by the common council of said city." In construing this ordinance the court held that it confined the duty of the railroad company to repairs simply. This result is apparent when it is observed that the ordinance provides that the parts of streets should be kept in good repair and condition in accordance with regulations of the common council respecting ordinary repairs. Great weight was also given by the court to this conclusion, because it accorded with the practical construction of the ordinance by both parties. In special assessments subsequently made by the council no attempt was made to assess the railroad property, and after the passage of the ordinance the city entered into another contract with the same company to lay tracks in other streets, and provided therein, in addition to the stipulations in the first contract, that when any new improvements and paving should be ordered, the said company, at its own cost, should make the pavement between its tracks. The construction of this ordinance, in the light of the surrounding circumstances, was that it imposed the duty to repair, and nothing more. There is nothing in the record before us to indicate that the parties understood the contract to require repairs only, and, as we have said, its language carries its meaning beyond this. Railway Co. v. City of Pittsburg, 80 Pa. St. 72; Railway Co. v. Birmingham, 51 Pa. St. 41.

We deem it proper to state that no question of regrading or changing the grade of the street is presented by the pleadings. The ordinance provides that the portions of streets shall be kept in as good repair and condition as the city keeps the balance of the street, and of even grade with the street, excepting in cases of regrading. The thirteenth section of the ordinance expressly provides that the grade of the railway tracks shall not be changed at the expense of the railroad company.

The case made in the alternative writ is that the city paved, or caused to be paved, with cypress blocks, certain portions of the streets, and thereupon it became the duty of respondent, by virtue of the ordinance, to pave the portions between its tracks, and two feet on each side. Paving a street is not necessarily changing its grade, and this may be done in any way that will make a compact, even, hard surface. Burnham v. City of Chicago, 24 Ill. 496; Warren v. Henly, 31 Iowa, 31; In re Phillips, 60 N. Y. 16. The allegation is that, after the paving on the part of the city, it became the duty of respondent under the ordinance to pave. The answer does not set up that the grade was changed. It is true it avers that it is not the duty of respondent to keep its tracks "plumb with the balance of the street when the grade has been changed, and that in changing the grades it is the duty of the city to fill them in." But this is not alleging that the paving by the relator in the case before us was a changing of the grade of the streets.

That mandamus is the proper remedy in this case is not denied. It is settled by authority that the writ will lie against such a corporation to compel it to perform a clear duty to the public. Railroad Co. v. State, 37 Ind. 489; State v. Railway Co., 35 Minn. 131, 28 N. W. Rep. 3; State v. Railway Co., 39 Minn. 219, 39 N. W. Rep.

153; People v. Railroad Co., 67 Ill. 118; In re Trenton Water-Power Co., 20 N. J. Law 659; Elliott, Roads & S. 592; High, Extr. Rem. § 320.

Our conclusion is that the answer presents no sufficient defense to the case made in the alternative writ, and the demurrer should be sustained.

STATE v. DEFFES. (No. 10,975.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Feb. 8, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE MARKETS—DISTANCE BETWEEN—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.

The words "six blocks" in Act No. 116 of 1888 have the same meaning as "six squares" in the former Act No. 100 of 1878. They mean standard squares or blocks of 300 feet each, with the addition of 50 feet for each intervening street, making 2,100 feet by the nearest walking route, regardless of the number of actual squares, short or long.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from recorder's court of New Orleans; MARIUS S. BRINGIER, Jr., Judge.

Prosecution against S. Deffes for violating a statute against maintaining a private market within six blocks of a public market. From a judgment on conviction, defendant appeals. Reversed, and the charge dismissed.

Branch K. Miller, for appellant. Carleton Hunt, City Atty., and Henry Renshaw, Asst. City Atty., for the State.

FENNER, J. The case presents a single question, viz., as to the meaning of the words "six blocks," as employed in Act No. 116 of 1888, which provides: "No private market shall be established within a walking distance of six blocks from any public market; the said distance to be interpreted as meaning that represented by six blocks in a walk from the public market to a private market." Whatever difficulty the question might present if it were res nova, we regard it as settled by our decisions already rendered. In several cases we held that the words "six squares," as employed in the former Act 100 of 1878, on the same subject, meant standard squares of 300 feet each, together with the width of the intervening streets of 50 feet each, making a uniform distance, by the shortest walking route, of 2,100 feet. State v. Berard, 40 La. Ann. 172, 3 South. Rep. 463; State v. Barthe, 41 La. Ann. 46, 6 South. Rep. 531; State v. Schmidt, 41 La. Ann. 27, 6 South. Rep. 530. In a later case we had before us the new act of 1888, and the ordinance of the city based thereon, No. 4,145, C. S.; and we then said, after referring to those decisions: "Thus, we have it effectually proved by these opinions that the word 'square' in the former ordinance and law meant what was generally understood by that term, and the word 'block' in the later ordinance and law means just the same thing; in other words, 'square' and 'block' are, strictly speaking, convertible terms." State v. Natal, 42 La. Ann. 612, 7 South. Rep. 781.

It being conceded that defendant's private market is distant more than 2,100 feet, by the nearest walking route, from a public market, he is within the protection of the law, as thus interpreted by us, although, owing to their excessive length, there are not six actual blocks or squares between him and the public market. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be avoided and reversed, and that the charge against defendant be dismissed; appellee to pay costs of this appeal.

PRACTICE—DEATH OF DEFENDANT BEFORE ISSUE JOINED.

1. When a defendant in a cause dies, and has "not answered," further proceedings against his heirs must be conducted in conformity to article 120 of the Code of Practice, and the citation or notice and the delays therein prescribed must be allowed.

2. The case is not affected by the fact that issue had been joined by default. A default is not an answer.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of St. James; HENRY L. DUFFEL, Judge.

Suit by the Union National Bank against P. F. Choppin, L. H. Choppin, and Joseph E. Choppin. From the judgment, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Pugh & Lambremont, for appellants. Sims & Poche, for appellee.

FENNER, J. Appellants assign as error patent on the face of the record that judgment was rendered without citation of the legal representatives of deceased defendants, and without allowing the delays prescribed by law. The facts are: The plaintiff's suit was brought against P. F., L. H., and Joseph E. Choppin. P. F. and L. H. appeared and filed answers. Joseph E. Choppin never answered, but judgment by default was entered against him. At this stage Joseph E. Choppin died. Plaintiff then applied for and obtained an order of court making his legal representatives parties. A copy of this order was served on the representatives, but no citation was served. Subsequently one of these representatives, Mrs. Choppin, died, without having appeared or filed answer. Thereupon plaintiff obtained another order making her heirs parties. A copy of this order was served on said heirs on the 29th and 30th of May, 1891, also without citation. On the 2d of June, 1891, only two clear days after service of above order, the cause was, on plaintiff's motion, set down for trial on June 10th. On that day, over the objection of appellants' counsel, who thereupon withdrew and refused to take part, the case was taken up, tried, and decided.

The law governing the case is found in article 120 of the Code of Practice: "If one against whom there was a cause of action die, leaving one heir only, the suit shall be carried on against such heir as it would have been against the deceased. If the suit had already been brought against the deceased, and he had not answered, it shall not be interrupted, but shall be continued against the heir by a mere citation or notice served on him to that effect, within the delay for original citations, according as the distance may be from his domicile to the court where the action has been brought." "If, on the contrary, the deceased have one or more heirs, the plaintiff may proceed personally against each of them for the share which he inherits," etc. "If the suit had been already commenced against the deceased, it shall be continued against his several heirs by citing each of them separately, as if there was only one." This article is found in part 1 of the Code. In part 2 are found the two following articles: "Art. 360. When the defendant suffers judgment by default to be taken against him, the issue is joined tacitly, because such defendant is presumed, by his silence, to have confessed the justice of his adversary's demand; therefore the plaintiff is allowed to proceed with his proofs in order to have the judgment confirmed. Art. 361. If, after issue joined, either the plaintiff or defendant die, it is not necessary to recommence the action. It continues between the surviving party and the heirs of the one deceased, pursuant to the provisions enacted in the first part of this Code." Thus the last article (361) expressly refers to the "provisions enacted in the first part of this Code" as defining the methods to be pursued in the continuance of the action. We do not understand plaintiff's counsel to deny that, in a case within the terms of article 120, citation or equivalent notice, allowing the same delays as in original citations, is necessary. His contention is that defendants' case is not covered by that article, because, he claims, default is equivalent to answer. We cannot approve this contention. The Code of Practice recognizes two modes of joining issue,—by default, or by answer. They are not identical, but entirely different and distinct. Both are equally effective in joining the issue. But a default is certainly not an answer; on the contrary, the default is only allowed because the defendant has not answered.

When the respective defendants in this case died they "had not answered;" and the case falls squarely within the exact letter and meaning of article 120, by which alone further proceedings must be governed. We are therefore bound to hold that the precipitate proceedings of plaintiff were in disregard of the legal rights of appellants. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be avoided and reversed, and that the case be remanded to the lower court, to be there proceeded with according to law; appellee to pay costs of appeal.

Action by Berthole Barrios against E. H. Lacroix and W. W. Hunter, Jr., on certain notes executed by Hunter. From a judgment for plaintiff, Lacroix appeals. Modified.

FENNER, J. Plaintiff was the holder of six negotiable notes made by one W. W. Hunter, Jr., secured by mortgage and vendor's privilege on a tract of land sold by him to said Hunter. He avers that these notes were fraudulently obtained from him by E. H. Lacroix, under the false pretense that he wanted to have them examined by his lawyer, and that, if found correct, he would buy them; that he never bought the notes, but kept them, and failed to return them, and, while thus in possession, conspired with Hunter to have the said notes, together with their accessory mortgage and privilege, canceled and erased, and did illegally cancel them without plaintiff's knowledge or consent. The only defendants are Hunter and Lacroix. The first filed a general denial. Lacroix also filed a general denial, together with a special denial of the fraud and misconduct charged, and an averment that he bought the notes from plaintiff at a fixed price, and by a completed sale. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, ordering the reinstatement of his mortgage and privilege, and the return of the notes, or, in default thereof, allowing judgment for the amount thereof, with recognition of mortgage and privilege. Lacroix alone has appealed. We have no concern with the rights of Hunter, who has not appealed, nor with possible intervening rights of third persons, who are not parties. The sole question for our determination is the issue between plaintiff and Lacroix of sale vel non. If the allegations of plaintiff's petition be true, certainly Lacroix has no cause to complain of the judgment rendered against him. The issue is purely one of fact. The testimony is conflicting. We have studied and weighed it very carefully. Independently of the consideration justly due to the finding of the judge a qua, we have no hesitation in saying that the evidence, taken as a whole, leaves upon our minds an overwhelming conviction that it is correct; that Lacroix never bought or owned the notes; and that his dealings with them were wrongful, and in fraud of plaintiff's rights. We might sustain our conclusion by a discussion of the evidence; but that would be useless, and certainly not agreeable to defendant. It is admitted, however, that the judgment should only cover five of the notes, and that the note maturing January 1, 1891, was validly acquired by Lacroix. The judgment must be amended accordingly. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be amended by striking therefrom all that part relating to the first note for $1,000, maturing January 1, 1891, and that, as thus amended, the same be now affirmed, plaintiff and appellee to pay costs of this appeal.

STATE v. DENNISON. (No. 10,973.)

HOMICIDE—INSTRUCTIONS—PREMEDITATION.

1. A charge to a jury in a criminal case, in which the judge limits himself to instructing the jury as to the law in the case, and refrains from recapitulating the evidence so as to influence them, and does not repeat or state the testimony of a witness, and does not give an opinion as to what facts have been proved or disproved, affords no ground of complaint.

2. A charge in the following words is not error: "And whilst malice and premeditation involve a prior intention to do the act in question, it is not necessary that the intention should have been conceived for any particular time. It is as much premeditation if it entered into the mind a moment before the act as if it entered years before."

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Natchitoches; DAVID PIERSON, Judge.

Prosecution against E. V. Dennison for murder. From a conviction of manslaughter, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Jack, for appellant. W. H. Rogers, Atty. Gen., and D. C. Scarborough, Dist. Atty., (M. H. Carver, of counsel,) for the State.

MCENERY, J. The accused was tried on a charge for murder, and convicted of manslaughter, and was sentenced to hard labor for a period of 10 years. From the verdict thus rendered, and sentence thus imposed, he has appealed on grounds stated in two bills of exception to portions of the written charge of the trial judge. In the first bill it is urged that the district judge trenched upon the facts of the case, and intimated his opinion as to the legal bearing of the evidence to the prejudice of the accused. The part of the charge complained of is as follows. "Although it may be the unwritten law of the land that a husband, father, and brother may lawfully slay one who debauches or deflours his wife, daughter, or sister, no law, written, or unwritten, justifies the settlement of other domestic troubles or infelicities by resort to deadly weapons. Therefore, even if you believe from the evidence that the deceased, Hazlewood, either persuaded the wife of the prisoner to leave his bed and board, or afforded her shelter or protection, (if she quit him of her own accord,) in neither case would such fact excuse the killing. Such family troubles cannot lawfully be adjusted by the deadly bullet. The extreme legal effect of such provocation would be to support the charge of malice." The following are the reasons, appended to the bill by the judge, for the charge: "The defense set up by the prisoner was that the deceased, in conjunction with his father-in-law, had interfered with his domestic relations, and had persuaded his wife to leave him, and go to her father's house. The prisoner had been married about two months to a girl of 16 years of age, without the consent of her parents, and by elopement with the girl. The deceased had been married about six months to a sister of the prisoner's wife, and was living, at the time of the killing, with G. W. Hawthorn, the father of both. The young wife of the prisoner left his bed and board about six days before the killing, for what reason it does not clearly appear; the prisoner claiming that it was on account of the persuasion of the deceased, and her father and the prosecution claiming that it was on account of ill treatment and dissipation of the prisoner, both propositions being supported by some presumption, but unsatisfactory evidence. In the fatal rencounter that took place, the prisoner was the aggressor, assaulting the deceased with a heavy cane, the deceased being unarmed, and offering such resistance as he could with his hands. Upon the interference of three several by-standers, each endeavoring to prevent further violence, the cane was taken from the prisoner, the deceased retired from the conflict followed by the prisoner, who drew a pistol from his pocket, and fired the fatal shot, the parties being about 12 feet apart at the time. The counsel for the accused, in his argument, urged that, by the higher law of the country, not found or sanctioned by the authorities, the jury would be justified in excusing the act of killing, on account of the alleged interference by the deceased in the domestic affairs of the prisoner, as above recited. Much discussion was had before the jury upon the question, and this discussion gave rise to the charge complained of." The second bill of exception is taken to the following charge: "And whilst malice and premeditation involve a prior intention to do the act in question, it is not necessary that this intention should have been conceived for any particular time. It is as much premeditation if it entered into the mind a moment before the act as if it entered years before, and when deliberate malice is shown and established, its continuance down to the perpetration of the homicide will be presumed, unless rebutted."

In the parts of the charge complained of we fail to perceive where there is any violation of section 991, Rev. Laws. The trial judge limited himself to giving the jury a knowledge of the law applicable to the case. He refrained from stating or recapitulating the evidence, so as to influence their decision on the facts, and he did not repeat or state to them the testimony of any witness, nor did he give any opinion as to what facts had been proved or disproved. Rev. Laws, § 991. In the second bill it is urged that the trial judge erred in "assuming a condition of things wholly incompatible with the idea of premeditated malice, and highly prejudicial to the rights of the defendant." In the brief of counsel this objection is explained as referring to the time when the prior intention to kill was conceived; that when it was conceived a "moment" or an "instant" before the homicide the time is "indefinite" and "indivisible," and is "incompatible with the idea of deliberation and premeditation." The defendant was charged with murder. The trial judge, by law, was compelled to charge as to malice. There is no time fixed at which the intention may enter the mind of the accused. As stated by the trial judge, it may be a moment or immediately before the homicide, and when so conceived is as much malice as if entertained a year or more.

Judgment affirmed.

STATE v. DONALD et al. (No. 10,961.)

HOMICIDE—NEW TRIAL—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In the allowance or rejection of new trials, particularly in cases resting upon the sufficiency of the evidence administered at the trial to justify a conviction, much reliance must be placed upon the discretion of the trial judge, and his rulings will not be reversed except in very clear cases of error.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Jefferson; EMILE ROST, Judge.

Indictment against Abraham Donald, Andrew, alias Ben, Ward, and others, for murder. Defendant Ward was convicted, and appeals. Affirmed.

Hamilton N. Gautier, for appellant. W. H. Rogers, Atty. Gen., for the State.

WATKINS, J. Appellant, Andrew, alias Ben, Ward was jointly indicted with Donald, White, and Dixon for the murder of Cornelius Langman. There was a joint trial, and all were acquitted except Ben Ward, who was found guilty of manslaughter, and, after an ineffectual attempt to obtain a new trial, was sentenced to five years at hard labor, from which sentence he appeals.

Appellant's contention is that the death was inflicted by a gunshot wound, the ball entering the cavity between the seventh and eighth ribs, "ranging in a downward direction of about 43 degrees; * * * that the only shooting done by the accused was while he was standing at the foot [or base] of the levee, some fifteen (15) feet below the deceased, who was standing on the top of the levee;" and from that hypothesis defendant's counsel argues the necessary incompatibility therewith of the verdict, and assigns this as a conclusive reason why the trial judge should have granted the defendant a new trial.

The foregoing constitutes the purport of defendant's application for a new trial, and, as supporting that statement, there was annexed to his bill of exceptions the official certificate and proces-verbal of the coroner. Resting upon this certificate and the affidavit of the accused for the governing facts of the case, there is some plausibility for the defendant's contention; but in the record we find the affidavits of three at least of the eye-witnesses of the homicide, which are wholly at variance therewith. One of the affiants says that in the course of a quarrel between several persons, whose names are given, "I left them. Neally [Langman] ran over his wife, knocking her down while doing so, with Abraham Donald and Andrew Ward pursuing him with drawn pistols, shooting at him all the time. * * * Ward and Donald fired pretty near all the chambers of their revolvers." Another of the affiants states that "Neally Langman came down the levee towards Andrew Ward with a drawn pistol. Some firing took place then. I cannot say who fired first. Andrew Ward had his pistol drawn. I am certain they were both shooting at each other. Andrew Ward pursued Langman until he fell against his wife, and then jumped up and ran again, with Ward behind him, from the pigeon-house to the store, where he fell. There Ward hit at Langman with the butt-end of his pistol, while running by. He then had both revolvers in his hands, having taken Langman's pistol from him," etc. Another affiant states that "Ward ran down the levee, and, as he reached the base of the levee, he half wheeled around, and Neally [Langman] went towards him. Then they were shooting at arms-length. When Neally had fired his last shot, he broke and run, and Ward and Donald ran after him. Neally fell on his wife, and the others stumbled over him. Then Ward took the pistol away from him, and hit him [Neally] over the head with the butt." This testimony puts a wholly different phase on the affray from that stated in defendant's motion. The judge did not assign any reasons for his overruling the motion, but on the foregoing statement we are of the opinion that his ruling was manifestly just and correct. Judgment affirmed.

STATE v. JACKSON. (No. 10,950.)

HOMICIDE—SELF-DEFENSE—EVIDENCE OF CHARACTER—IMPEACHING WITNESS—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In order to excuse a homicide, the accused must be under the belief that his life is in danger, or he fears some great bodily harm may be inflicted upon him; and said belief must be the result of some overt act or hostile demonstration made by the deceased against the accused.

2. In attacking a witness' general character for infamy, the investigation cannot be restricted so as to define it to particular acts or to particular associates. It must be as to his whole conduct and character, so as to establish such moral depravity that no one would be justified in believing his sworn statement uncorroborated.

3. Whether a witness who was not connected with the homicide, and who was with the deceased at the time of the homicide, was or was not a dangerous character, is immaterial, and no evidence of his character in this respect is admissible.

4. Fear that one's life is in danger will not excuse a homicide, in the absence of an overt act or hostile demonstration on the part of the deceased.

5. When the judge charges substantially what the defendant requests in a special charge, it is sufficient.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of St. Landry; E. T. LEWIS, Judge.

Indictment against William Jackson for murder. Defendant was convicted, and appeals. Affirmed.

Charles W. Du Roy, for appellant. W. H. Rogers, Atty. Gen., for the State.

MCENERY, J. The defendant was indicted for murder, tried, and found guilty without capital punishment, and sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for life, from which judgment he has appealed.

The first bill of exceptions was taken on the refusal of the trial judge to allow the following question to be propounded to a witness: "Was Ivory Guidry, the deceased, a man capable of carrying out such threats?" The trial judge, in his statement appended to the bill, says: "That the accused shot the deceased down in the public road, and without even the slightest effort on his part to make an assault upon the accused. The accused watched deceased while passing the accused's house in the public road, and fired twice across a fence about ten paces distant, killing deceased almost instantly while deceased was standing still, being halted by accused, and making no demonstration whatever against him." It appears from the statement that the deceased made no hostile demonstration against the defendant. It is immaterial, therefore, what were the previous threats of the deceased against the defendant. They are inadmissible unless a proper foundation is first laid by evidence of some overt act or hostile demonstration made by the deceased at the time of the fatal assault upon him. The ability of the deceased, therefore, to execute threats, when he had shown no intention by any overt act to carry them out, is inadmissible. State v. Demareste, 41 La. Ann. 617, 6 South. Rep. 136; State v. Paterno, 43 La. Ann. 514, 9 South. Rep. 442. There was no demonstration made by the deceased which justified the defendant in believing that his life was in imminent danger. State v. Cosgrove, 42 La. Ann. 753, 7 South. Rep. 714.

The second bill was reserved to the ruling of the trial judge in refusing the following questions to be propounded to the witness Moreau in relation to the character of Jeanbette, a witness for the prosecution: "Do you know the man Jeanbette, and is he not a man who lives and associates with criminal people? Isn't it a fact that his principal associates are lewd and abandoned women?" These questions were asked for the purpose of impeaching the witness' general character. The district attorney urged several objections to the questions, any one of which we think was good. The following objections are conclusive: The question was leading, suggesting the answer, and that the general reputation of the witness only can be inquired into. The question was leading, and therefore properly ruled out. In the case of State v. Parker, 7 La. Ann. 83, this court had occasion to review the law, and to determine the extent to which the investigation of the witness' character can be gone into. In that case the question was as to the infamous character of the witness, which was compounded of a notorious character for acting falsely and fraudulently, of extorting money by force and cheating from the unwary and feeble, and of living among low and abandoned women; that he was idle, dissolute, and profligate, and had no means of support, and no means of obtaining money, other than those set forth. The witnesses swore that although they could not say that the impeached witness had formed any character as to lack of truth, and was false in oath and words, yet from his vices and general bad character they believed he was unworthy of credit, and they would not believe him under oath. In the opinion this court said: "All agree that a man proved by respectable testimony to possess the character described in the bill of exception under consideration would not be entitled to equal credit with a pure and virtuous witness; yet such a man, unless proof is allowed, would stand as fair before the jury as one of the most spotless character." The inquiry, therefore, must be into the general character of the witness, and not permitted to run into collateral facts and particular inquiries as to any particular act or any particular associates. In other words, the inquiry into general character must be of that kind which will show such moral turpitude in the witness that no one would be justified in believing his uncorroborated statement. The inquiry into the witness' character in the instant case did not tend to show that he was infamous, but that his associates were taken from a certain class of people. The inquiry was restricted, and therefore did not come within the reasons stated in the case quoted.

Bill No. 3 was taken to the exclusion by the judge of the following question to a witness: "Was Ivory Guidry, deceased, a dangerous man, and was he a man capable of carrying threats into execution?" The reason stated in sustaining the ruling of the trial judge on bill No. 1 will apply to this.

Bill No. 4 was reserved to the questions: "What is Jeanbette's general reputation for peace and quiet? Isn't he a notoriously dangerous man?" These questions are also leading and objectionable on that account. Jeanbette was a witness. He was in no way concerned in the homicide, and therefore the question was irrelevant.

Bill No. 5 is to the ruling out of threats made by the deceased prior to the homicide. There was no overt or hostile demonstration made by the deceased; therefore, the testimony sought to be introduced was properly rejected. This bill has also been disposed of by the reason given in sustaining the ruling of the trial judge on bills 1 and 3.

Bill No. 6 was taken to the refusal of the trial judge to charge the jury as requested by defendant. The charge requested was: (1) "If a man reasonably and fairly believes his life is in imminent danger, he is excusable in killing his adversary, although it afterwards appear that there was no danger." The imminent danger in which the defendant imagines or believes himself to be must result from some act of the deceased. It is then a question of fact for the jury to find whether the demonstration was of such a character as to impress the accused with a belief that his life was in danger, or that he feared great bodily harm would be inflicted upon him. The law does not excuse a homicide, coolly planned and deliberately executed, committed when the deceased was making no demonstration whatever, and was unarmed, on the public road. (2) "That, if the jury had any reasonable doubt on any material point of the case, they were bound to give the benefit of such doubt to the accused." Instead of the charge requested by defendant, the trial judge instructed the jury "that they must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the state had made out its case as to every constituent element of the crime charged, each element thereof being fully explained." The charge was fair, and a concise statement of the law. The defendant had no cause to complain of it. Judgment affirmed.

BOSTIC v. STATE.

HOMICIDE—PROTECTION OF ANOTHER—INSTRUCTION—EVIDENCE.

1. On a trial for murder, it appeared that defendant and one P. went at night to the house of decedent, where P. addressed decedent in abusive language, and decedent attempted to shoot P., who left the house, pursued by decedent. While decedent was pursuing P., he was struck by defendant on the head, causing death. There was evidence that while going to decedent's house P. said, "I expect we will have it to-night," and defendant answered that he would "stand up to" him, (P.) Defendant requested an instruction that if the jury found that defendant killed deceased under an honest belief that it was necessary to prevent deceased from killing P. "without just cause," they should acquit defendant. Held, the instruction was properly refused, as it ignored the facts (1) that P. initiated the conflict, and had not manifested a desire to withdraw from it; (2) that defendant had designed to "stand up to" P. if a personal encounter ensued.

2. A request to charge is properly refused, though embodying correct principles, where there is no evidence in the case to support it.

3. Decedent's attending physician testified that, after being wounded, decedent was twice removed from one place to another, and that "it was drizzling" at the time. On cross-examination the witness was asked, "Is it not possible that removing deceased about in his condition in bad weather, over a rough country, caused his death?" There was no evidence that decedent was removed "over a rough country." Held, that the answer to such question was properly excluded.

Appeal from circuit court, Limestone county; H. C. SPEAKE, Judge.

Richard Bostic was indicted with John Puryear for the murder of Jesse Brock. A separate trial of Bostic resulted in his conviction of manslaughter in the second degree, from which he appeals. Affirmed.

W. T. Sanders and W. H. Turrentine, for appellant. Wm. L. Martin, Atty Gen., for the State.

STONE, C. J. It is said in 4 Bl. Comm. 213, that "homicide committed for the prevention of any forcible and atrocious crime is justifiable by the law of nature, and also by the law of England, as it stood so early as the time of Bracton, and as it was declared by statute, (24 Hen. VIII., c. 5.) If any person attempts a robbery or murder of another, or attempts to break open a house in the night-time, (which extends also to an attempt to burn it,) and be killed in such attempt, the slayer shall be acquitted and discharged." Greenleaf states the doctrine substantially the same way. 3 Greenl. Ev. § 115. In Gray v. Combs, 7 J. J. Marsh. 478, this subject was discussed, and the authorities cited. And the subject has been frequently considered in this state. The principle declared is somewhat analogous to that laid down in the older books. In Oliver's Case, 17 Ala. 594, (opinion by DARGAN, C. J.,) is this language: "The law, it is true, will justify the taking of life when it is done from necessity, to prevent the commission of a felony," etc. See, also, Dill v. State, 25 Ala. 15; Noles v. State, 26 Ala. 31; Simpson v. State, 59 Ala. 1; Storey v. State, 71 Ala. 329. Modern decisions have hedged this principle about with some modifying qualifications. If the defense be that the blow was struck to prevent the homicide of another, then that other, as well as the actor, must be in a condition to invoke the doctrine of justifiable defense. Neither he who provokes a difficulty nor his voluntary helper can with impunity resist to extreme results the assault he has provoked, unless he has clearly retired from the conflict; and, to restore him to the full measure of se defendendo, his conduct must plainly show that his purpose has ceased to be hostile. Gibson v. State, 91 Ala. 64, 9 South. Rep. 171; Parker v. State, 88 Ala. 4, 7 South. Rep. 98. After night-fall the defendant and Puryear, with two others, went together to the house in which the difficulty occurred. Before reaching the house they learned that deceased was there. Soon after entering the dwelling the altercation commenced. Its first introduction was an inquiry by Puryear, addressed to Brock, asking him why it was that he (Brock) had spoken of him (Puryear) in the manner he had. He answered that what he had said would stand. Very soon Puryear addressed Brock in angry and offensive language, whereupon the latter drew a pistol, and attempted to shoot Puryear. He fired once, the ball passing through Puryear's clothes, and was pursuing him, snapping his pistol at him, but it did not fire. Puryear ran out at the door, Brock pursuing him, when the defendant, Bostic, attempted to disarm him. While he was grappling for the pistol, Brock was struck on the head with a hard substance, probably a rock, which felled him to his knees, and the combat then ceased. Three days afterwards Brock died, and the attending physician gave it as his opinion that the blow on the head caused his death. Up to this point there was no material discrepancy in the testimony. On some very material inquiries the testimony is irreconcilable. Some witnesses testified that when Puryear and his friends were approaching the house in which the difficulty occurred, and after they learned Brock was there, Puryear remarked, "I expect we will have it to-night," and that Bostic said if he did he would stand up to him. Bostic, in his testimony, denied this. There was testimony that Bostic struck the blow which proved fatal, while he and some other witnesses testified that he did not; and there was testimony that when Puryear fled from the house he seized a pole, and was returning into the house to renew the rencounter. On this question the testimony was by Puryear himself, and there was no testimony that, after the combat commenced, Puryear made any remark of any kind. His intention in leaving the house must, therefore, be gathered from what he did, and not from anything said, for he said nothing. We have stated this much of the testimony because it exerts a material influence on some of the instructions requested by the defendant. Several charges were requested, invoking the doctrine referred to above,—the right of a mere stranger to interfere, even to extreme results, to prevent the commission of a felony attended with force. The charge so asked which most nearly comes up to legal requirements is in the following language: "If you believe from the evidence that the defendant killed the deceased, Jesse Brock, under a well-grounded and honest belief, created by all the circumstances, that it was necessary for him to kill the deceased to prevent the deceased from killing, without just cause, John Puryear, then the defendant is not guilty, and your verdict should be for acquittal." It will be remembered that there was testimony in this case that John Puryear commenced the conversation, and used the first insulting language, which brought on the difficulty. There was also testimony that defendant, Bostic, had promised Puryear to stand up to him should a difficulty ensue. Each of these facts, if believed, exerted an important bearing on the inquiry of defensive resistance, whether made or attempted by Puryear or Bostic. As to the former (Puryear) it imposed on him the duty of withdrawing from the conflict by manifest acts or positive language, one or both, before he could place himself on the solid ground of self-defense, with the rights which pertain thereto; and as to the latter (Bostic) it was not enough that Puryear should have placed himself on defensive ground, as stated above. Certain conditions as to Bostic himself were necessary before he would be justifiable in striking to save Puryear from the threatened violence which his own insulting language had provoked. Bostic was not authorized to strike in defense of Puryear until the latter had clearly manifested a desire and purpose to withdraw from the combat, nor even then, if the blow was struck pursuant to a formed design and purpose to stand up to him in the event that a personal rencounter ensued. The words "without just cause" are neither clear enough nor full enough to authorize the giving of the charge asked, under the testimony found in this record. For reasons still stronger the other kindred charges were rightly refused.

Another charge asked by defendant was in this language: "Although a person originally provoked the conflict, if he withdrew from it in good faith, and clearly announced his desire for peace, and was afterwards pursued by the other person, his right of self-defense revives." The presiding judge refused this charge, giving as a reason that it was abstract. Ignoring all other inquiries involved in this charge, there was not a semblance of proof that after the encounter was entered upon, or after Puryear uttered the insulting language, he announced any desire for peace. This of itself rendered the charge abstract. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 109, § 33; Id. p. 113, § 106.

Dr. Wilkerson attended the deceased, Brock, after he was wounded, and testified that he died of concussion of the brain, caused, as he believed, by the wound he had received. He testified that after being wounded he had been twice removed from one place to another, and "that it was drizzling at the time he was moved." On cross-examination the doctor was asked two questions, substantially the same, namely: "If it was not possible that removing deceased, in his condition, about, in bad weather, over a rough country, caused his death." The second question was: "Might not the moving deceased in inclement weather over rough roads, deceased being exposed while he was in a condition of mental excitement resulting from the wound, have caused his death?" These questions were objected to by the prosecution, the objections sustained, and the defendant excepted. This exception raises in substance the same question as that considered above. The record contains no testimony that the removals of the deceased were over a "rough country," or over "rough roads." Without considering any other ground of objection to the questions, we are forced to hold the objections well taken, because one of the postulates on which the opinion of the physician was invoked had no testimony to support it. There is nothing in the other questions raised. Affirmed.

LUCAS v. PITTMAN.

ACTION BY ADMINISTRATOR — CAPTION OF COMPLAINT—WORDS OF DESCRIPTION — AMENDMENT OF PARTIES—COMPLETED SALE—DETINUE—TITLE TO SUPPORT—GENERAL ISSUE.

1. The words "as administrator," following the plaintiff's name in the caption of a complaint, are sufficient to show that plaintiff sues in a representative capacity, though no allegation with reference thereto is made in the complaint. The word "administrator," following alone the plaintiff's name in the caption, is a mere word of description personal, but, if the body of the complaint following such a caption contains a sufficient statement to show that plaintiff sues in his representative capacity, the body of the complaint will govern the caption. Montgomery Co. v. Barber, 45 Ala. 237, overruled.

2. Under Code, § 2833, providing that during the progress of a cause the complaint may be amended by striking out or adding new parties plaintiff, or by striking out or adding new parties defendant, where a defendant is sued in a representative character the complaint can be amended so as to make the action against him in his individual character. Christian v. Morris, 50 Ala. 586, and Taylor v. Taylor, 43 Ala. 649, overruled.

3. H. and L. executed a writing reciting, "Contract made this day between" H. and L. for two certain horses with harness and wagon, to be paid in work at $2.50 per day, L. agreeing to work for H. until the debt is paid, only reserving right to pay cash for balance at any time. "Such balance being paid by L., then H. has no further claim on said team." At the time, L. was the teamster of H., and the property was in his possession as such, and after the execution of the contract he remained in possession of the property. Held, that the sale was complete, H. reserving only an equitable claim on the property for unpaid balance.

4. Such a claim is not sufficient title to authorize a recovery of the property in detinue.

5. In detinue the general issue is presented by a plea of "non detinet."

Appeal from circuit court, Shelby county; LE ROY F. BOX, Judge.

Detinue by Lomax Pittman, as administrator de bonis non of J. W. Hardy, deceased, against Ransom L. Lucas. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

The action was brought originally "by Minnie Hardy, as the administratrix of the estate of J. W. Hardy, deceased," against the appellant, R. L. Lucas, for the recovery of certain described personal property. Upon the resignation of Minnie Hardy as administratrix being suggested to the court, the cause was revived in the name of Lomax Pittman as the administrator de bonis non. The defendant pleaded "not guilty." The property so sued for originally belonged to the said J. W. Hardy, but the defendant claims that by the following contract, which was dated October 3, 1881, the said property was sold to him: "Contract made this day between J. W. Hardy and Ransom Lucas for two (2) horses, known as 'Lightning' and 'Old Joe,' one double harness, and double wagon, for three hundred dollars, same to be paid in work at two dollars and fifty cents per day. This means $2.50 per day for one man and the double team, Ransom Lucas agreeing to work for J. W. Hardy until said debt is paid, only reserving the right to pay cash for balance at any time. Such balance being paid by Ransom Lucas, then J. W. Hardy has no further claim on said team. Anything said Lucas may buy from J. W. Hardy is to be sold him cash price, with small allowance for hauling same from Calera." It was recited by an agreed statement of facts that, at the time of and before the execution of said contract, the defendant, Lucas, was employed by said Hardy as teamster, and had charge of the property mentioned in the said contract and which is here sued for, and that after the execution of said contract he continued in possession of said property. It was further shown that the defendant, after the execution of said contract, did hauling for the said J. W. Hardy between that time and the time of Hardy's death, and after Hardy's death the defendant did some hauling under the contract for Mrs. Minnie J. Hardy, widow of said Hardy, "but on many occasions refused to haul for Mrs. Hardy." The value of the property was shown. It was further shown that after being credited at the rate agreed on in the contract for all hauling done for Hardy and his administratrix, and having been charged for all goods purchased from the said Hardy at the prices named in the said contract, the defendant was indebted to said J. W. Hardy in the sum of nine cents. At the written request of the plaintiff, the court gave the general affirmative charge in his behalf, and to the giving of the general affirmative charge the defendant duly excepted.

W. S. Cary, for appellant. Lomax Pittman, for appellee.

COLEMAN, J. The suit is in detinue. The caption to the complaint, when filed, was, "Minnie Hardy, as the Administratrix of J. W. Hardy, Deceased, Plaintiff, v. Ransom L. Lucas, Defendant." The complaint itself is as follows: "The plaintiff claims of the defendant the following personal property, viz., [describing the property,] with the value of the hire or use thereof during the detention," etc. The proof shows that plaintiff relied upon the title of his intestate for a recovery. The court gave the general affirmative charge in favor of the plaintiff. The first question presented is to determine whether the complaint sets forth a cause of action in the name of Minnie Hardy individually, or in her representative capacity. In the case of Gibson v. Land, 27 Ala. 117, the plaintiff, Land, styled himself in the caption or commencement of the complaint "as trustee for his wife, Elizabeth Land," and it was held these words were mere descriptions personal, and the action was in his individual capacity. In the case of Crimm v. Crawford, 29 Ala. 623, the caption was, "Crawford, Admr. de bonis non of Nancy Cullens, v. Thomas Crimm." The complaint itself proceeded as follows: "The plaintiff, as administrator de bonis non of Nancy Cullens, deceased, claims," etc.; and the court held that the complaint sufficiently showed the action was by plaintiff in his representative character, and authorized plaintiff to recover on the title of his intestate. Referring to the case quoted above from 27 Ala., the court held that, since the adoption of the Code simplifying the pleadings, "all averments as to title are dispensed with." In Graham v. Gunn, 45 Ala. 577, in the caption the plaintiff styled himself "as admr. of Moses Green," and averred in the declaration that the note sued on was assets of the estate of his intestate. The court held that the suit was in his representative capacity. In the case of Montgomery Co. v. Barber, 45 Ala. 237, the caption was, "Robert Barber, as Sheriff of Montgomery County, v. Montgomery County," etc. The complaint itself proceeded as follows: "The plaintiff, as sheriff, claims of the defendant," etc. The court held that the words "as sheriff," in the caption and in the complaint both, were mere surplusage, and that plaintiff was entitled to recover upon proof of an indebtedness due him individually. In Wright v. Rice, 56 Ala. 44, the summons and complaint were in the name of John P. Rice, "who sues by the name and description of administrator of H. Pippen, deceased." The court held that John P. Rice individually was plaintiff, and all else mere surplusage; citing Agee v. Williams, 27 Ala. 644. There seems to be some confusion in the authorities as to what is necessary to distinguish when an action is brought in the name of the individual and when in his representative character. We hold the proper rule to be that when the plaintiff's name appears in the caption, followed by the words "administrator," "guardian," and there is no statement of averment in the body of the complaint to indicate differently, the words "administrator," "guardian," are all mere words of description personal; that if the name of the plaintiff in the caption to the complaint is followed by the use of such words as "as administrator," or "as guardian," or "who sues as," or words of equivalent meaning, these words are sufficient to show that the plaintiff sues in a representative capacity when the complaint proceeds in the usual form, such as, "The plaintiff claims of the defendant," etc. In the latter case the words in the complaint, "The plaintiff," will be referred to the character of the plaintiff as expressed in the caption. We further hold that where the words in the caption are mere words of description, yet, if in the body of the complaint there is a sufficient statement or averment to show that the suit by plaintiff is in his representative character, the body of the complaint must govern the caption. Tate v. Shackelford, 24 Ala. 510; Watson v. Collins, 37 Ala. 588; Espalla v. Richard, (Ala.) 10 South. Rep. 137. From these conclusions it follows that the case of Montgomery Co. v. Barber, 45 Ala. 237, and authorities in that line, must be overruled. It may be regarded as settled that under the statute of amendments, when a complaint is filed in the name of one suing in his individual capacity, if the facts authorize it the complaint may be amended so as to make the suit stand in his representative capacity, and vice versa. Longmire v. Pilkington, 37 Ala. 296; Crimm v. Crawford, supra. There are some authorities which, while admitting the rule of amendments as thus stated to be applicable to plaintiff, deny that it applies to defendants, and hold that, if a defendant is sued in his representative character, the complaint cannot be amended so as to make the cause of action stand against him in his individual character. We perceive no just foundation for the distinction, and it finds no warrant in the statute itself. The statute is broad in its provisions, and applies equally and alike to plaintiffs and defendants. Code, § 2833. The case of Christian v. Morris, 50 Ala. 586, and Taylor v. Taylor, 43 Ala. 649, are contrary to the strict meaning of the statute, and must be overruled. The case of Kirkman v. Benham, 28 Ala. 501, cited, does not support the construction given to the statute, and the older cases cited in support of a contrary proposition were rendered before the adoption of the present act allowing amendments.

The plaintiff introduced in evidence an instrument in writing signed by his intestate and the defendant; and plaintiff's title and right to recover depend upon the construction to be given to this contract. It is exceedingly indefinite. Whether the parties intended the contract to be a sale of the property so as to pass the title, or whether a sale on condition was intended, the title not to pass until the payment of the purchase money, or a sale with a reserved lien, is indefinitely expressed and imperfectly manifested by its terms. There are certain rules of law applying to contracts for the sale of personal property to which the courts must resort to aid them in their construction of contracts of this character. The proof shows that at the date of the contract the property was then in the possession of the defendant, as a teamster in the employment of Hardy. No further actual delivery or change of possession could be made. It is evident, however, the possession of Lucas after the making of the contract was not that of an employe, but that of a purchaser. Nothing remained for the seller to do. The property was specified, and the price definitely fixed, and the manner of payment agreed upon, and possession delivered and the right of possession transferred to the purchaser. Mr. Justice CLIFFORD, in the case of Hatch v. Oil Co., 100 U. S. 131, states the law as follows: "Where the specific goods to which the contract is to attach are not specified, the ordinary conclusion is that the parties only contemplated an executory agreement. Reported cases illustrate and confirm that proposition, and many show that where the goods to be transferred are clearly specified, and the terms of sale, including the price, are explicitly given, the property, as between the parties, passes to the buyer without actual payment or delivery." After citing the authorities, he proceeds: "Standard authorities also show that where there is no manifestation of intention, except what arises from the terms of the sale, the presumption is, if the thing to be sold is specified, and it is ready for the immediate delivery, that the contract is an actual sale, unless there is something in the subject-matter or attendant circumstances to indicate a different intention. Well-founded doubt upon that subject cannot be entertained, if the terms of bargain and sale, including the price, are explicit. * * * In such case [he continues] there is no reason for imputing to the parties any intention to suspend the transfer, inasmuch as the thing to be sold and the price have been specified and agreed upon by mutual consent, and nothing remains to be done." To the same effect may be cited 1 Benj. Sales, § 309, and note. That the contract created a liability upon Lucas to pay Hardy $300 for the property sold and purchased is manifest from the contract itself. That this was the understanding of the parties themselves is equally clear, not only from the payments made and credited as such, but the demand upon the defendant that he complete the payment by further work and labor or in cash. There is but one clause in the contract from which any contention can arise, and that is this: "Such balance being paid by Ransom Lucas, then J. M. Hardy has no further claim on said team." Applying the general principles of law applicable to sales of personal property, we hold that the sale was complete, that the title passed to the purchaser, and all that plaintiff reserved was a mere equitable claim to or lien upon the property for any balance that might remain unpaid. There is no reservation of title by the seller under this contract, nor any terms or provisions, which show a conditional sale, by which the parties intended the title to pass at some future time, or upon the payment of the purchase money. Under such circumstances there must be a clearly manifested intention by the agreement itself or attending circumstances that the parties did not intend a sale and transfer of title, to overcome all the presumptions of law which arise in cases of sales of personal property where the property is definitely specified, the price fixed and agreed upon, and delivery complete, and nothing remains to be done by the seller. A mere equitable title or claim will not authorize the plaintiff to recover in an action of detinue. The plea of defendant to present the general issue should have been "non detinet." Reversed and remanded.

JOLLY v. STATE.

CONSPIRACY—ACTS OF CONSPIRATORS—TIME OF FORMATION—EVIDENCE—INTENT—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL.

1. Where the evidence in a trial for assault with intent to murder shows that defendant conspired with two others to attack one P., and that defendant was present, aiding and abetting, or ready to aid and abet, in the execution of their design, defendant is guilty, though he struck no blow; Code 1886, § 3704, abolishing the distinction between principals of the first and second degrees, and between principals and accessories before the fact, and directing that all persons concerned in the commission of a felony be dealt with as principals.

2. Such conspiracy need not have been entered into previously to the assault.

3. It being shown that defendant was present as an accomplice to encourage or assist in the assault, no malice on his part against P. need be shown.

4. Where the evidence tended to show that defendant committed the assault in person, there was no need of proving conspiracy.

Appeal from city court of Anniston; B. F. CASSADY, Judge.

James Jolly was convicted of an assault with intent to murder one Powell, and appeals. Affirmed.

The testimony for the state tended to show a conspiracy between defendant and his father and brother to make an attack on Powell. The only question reserved for consideration in this court arises upon charges given and refused. The court in its oral charge to the jury, among other things, charged them as follows: "That if they believed beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was present at the time of the difficulty, and was aiding and abetting the same, that he would be as guilty as the one who struck the blow, although they might believe that some one else engaged in the difficulty struck the blow; and that if he was concerned in the matter by previous agreement with the parties who engaged in the difficulty to have the same, and the difficulty was had in pursuance thereof, then the defendant would be as guilty as the party who struck the blow, although he was not present at the time the blow was struck. The law makes no distinction between accessories before the fact and principals; they are all regarded under the law as alike guilty, and are to be indicted, tried, and punished as principals." Defendant duly excepted to this portion of the oral charge of the court, and also excepted to the court's giving the following written charges at the request of the state: (3) "Unless the jury find from all the testimony that Jim Jolly, the defendant, assaulted Powell, with malice aforethought, with intent to murder him, he cannot be found guilty as charged in the indictment as an accomplice; unless the jury find beyond a reasonable doubt from the testimony that there had previously been a conspiracy between the defendant and others, they cannot find the defendant guilty." (7) "In this case the law requires the state to make out, by testimony from the stand by witnesses, every fact necessary to prove the guilt of the defendant beyond any and all reasonable doubt and, unless the state has made out by proof the facts charged, it is not necessary for the defendant to offer any testimony, and the jury under such a state of facts should find the defendant not guilty." (8) "Before the jury can find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment they must find that he was an accomplice, and that the proof must show that there had been a previous conspiracy between them to commit the offense charged in the indictment." (11) "It is necessary, in order to convict the defendant, that the state must prove beyond all reasonable doubt each allegation in the indictment; and unless the state proves in this case that Jim Jolly had malice against Powell, and that this malice was in him before the difficulty or cutting, then the defendant cannot be found guilty as charged in the indictment." (12) "Before the jury is authorized to find the defendant guilty, they must find from all the testimony, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Jim Jolly had malice in his heart against Powell, and that the malice existed before Powell was cut." After the verdict of guilty, defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled.

James H. Caldwell and Savage & Coleman, for appellant. Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., J. H. King, and John B. Knox, for the State.

WALKER, J. There was evidence tending to show that the defendant conspired with his father and brother to attack James Powell, and that there was a concert of action between the three when the assault was made, though the evidence was conflicting as to whether the wound received by Powell was inflicted by the defendant or by his brother Joe Jolly. Even if Joe Jolly was the active perpetrator in the commission of the offense, the defendant is, in the eye of the law, equally guilty if he was present, encouraging, aiding, abetting, or assisting, or was ready to aid, abet, or assist in the execution of the unlawful design. If the three combined together to attack Powell, each of them would be criminally responsible for any act of the other which was a probable or natural consequence of the execution of their common purpose, though the particular act done was not expressly agreed to or contemplated in advance. Tanner v. State, 92 Ala. 1, 9 South. Rep. 613; Gibson v. State, 89 Ala. 121, 8 South. Rep. 98;

Williams v. State, 81 Ala. 1, 1 South. Rep. 179; Martin v. State, 89 Ala. 115, 8 South. Rep. 23. "The distinction between an accessory before the fact and a principal, and between principals in the first and second degrees, in cases of felony, is abolished, and all persons concerned in the commission of a felony, whether they directly commit the act constituting the offense, or aid or abet in its commission, though not present, must * * * be indicted, tried, and punished as principals, as in the case of misdemeanors." Code 1886, § 3704. The portion of the oral charge of the court to which an exception was reserved, and charges 2 and 3 given at the instance of the state, were correct, under the rules above stated. Charge 1 given at the instance of the state is fully supported by the decision in the case of Walls v. State, 90 Ala. 618, 8 South. Rep. 680. It was contended for the defendant, as shown by a number of charges requested, that on an indictment charging him with an assault with intent to murder he could not be convicted on proof that he was a conspirator, and aided or abetted in the commission of the offense, but that it must be shown that he committed the assault in person. That this contention was not well founded is shown by the above statement of the law on the subject. Charges 1, 4, 9, 10, 13, and 15 involved the erroneous proposition just stated, and were properly refused. If the defendant was concerned in the commission of the felony, or aided or abetted his father and brother therein, either of them could be convicted, though the jury could not determine from the evidence which of the three inflicted the wound, if they were satisfied from the evidence that it was inflicted by one of the conspirators, in the execution of the common design. Charges 2, 5, 6, 14, 16, and 17 requested by the defendant were incorrect in predicating a right to an acquittal upon the existence of a doubt as to who did the cutting, without regard to the absence of doubt in the evidence that the cutting was done by one of the three persons who were acting in concert, with a common purpose to attack Powell. The defendant could be charged as a principal if the conspiracy to attack Powell was formed at the time of the difficulty, and the cutting was done in the execution of a plan to which the defendant then became a party. The conspiracy need not have been entered into previously. Tanner v. State, 92 Ala. 1, 9 South. Rep. 613. This consideration discloses a fault in charges 3 and 11 requested by the defendant. If Joe Jolly was the assailant, and the defendant knew that the assault was made with intent to murder, and was present as an accomplice to encourage, aid, or assist in its execution, it was not necessary to show that the defendant himself entertained the intent or malice against Powell. Tanner v. State, 92 Ala. 1, 9 South. Rep. 613. For this reason, charge 12 was properly refused. Charge 7 was calculated to convey the impression that it was necessary to prove that the defendant committed the assault in person. In view of the evidence tending to show a conspiracy, it had a tendency to mislead the jury. Charge 8 ignores the evidence which tended to show that the defendant did commit the assault in person. If that tendency of the evidence was believed, it was unnecessary to prove the conspiracy. The proceeding on the motion for a new trial was not properly made a part of the record. Besides, the action of the trial court on such an application is not revisable here. Walker v. State, 91 Ala. 76, 9 South. Rep. 87. The act of February 16, 1891, (Acts Ala. 1890-91, p. 779,) allowing appeals to this court from decisions granting or refusing to grant motions for new trials, applies only to civil cases at law. No error is discovered in the record. Affirmed.

FERRIS et al. v. MONTGOMERY LAND & IMP. CO. et al.

PARTITION—IMPROVEMENTS BY A CO-TENANT—COMPENSATION—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—DEFECT OF PARTIES.

1. Where a tenant in common has been in sole possession, and has in good faith, and without any intention of embarrassing his co-tenants or hindering partition or gaining an advantage therein, improved the land, while his co-tenants have neglected their claim thereto, equity will, in partition proceedings, whenever possible, allot to such tenant the portion of the land improved by him, or, if this be impossible, require his co-tenants to reimburse him for such improvement.

2. Compensation for improvements will be allowed only when the co-tenant, at the time of making them, believed himself to be the sole owner of the land.

3. This rule does not apply to cases where the improved portion of the land can be allotted to the improving tenant, since the rights of his co-tenants are in no wise affected thereby.

4. Where a specified portion of the land has been purchased in good faith from such improving tenant by a stranger, equity will extend to the latter the same protection as it would have done to his grantor.

5. Where it is alleged and proven in partition proceedings that the United States has an interest in the land, there can be no partition unless the United States consents to become a party.

Appeal from chancery court, Montgomery county; JOHN A. FOSTER, Chancellor.

Bill in equity by the Montgomery Land & Improvement Company for a partition of land. Cross-bill by the Southern Cotton-Oil Company. Demurrer to bill and cross-bill, and plea filed by Catherine J. Ferris and others. From the judgment of the chancellor, all parties appeal. Reversed.

The demurrers involved substantially but four points: First, that, the Montgomery Land & Improvement Company having no interest in the lands owned by the Southern Cotton-Oil Company, the Southern Cotton-Oil Company was not a proper party to the bill filed by the land company for partition, and, vice versa, the land company was not a proper party to the bill filed by the Southern Cotton-Oil Company; second, that the Southern Cotton-Oil Company, having wrongfully dispossessed the respondents of their lands, and improved the same with notice of respondents' rights, had no right in equity to a partition so as to exclude the respondents from the benefits of the improvements; third, that the interest of each person in the lands sought to be divided was not shown by the bill; fourth, that the bill did not seek a partition of the said lands to each of the parties in severalty, but asked that certain of them should receive their shares in common. In addition to these demurrers, a plea was filed, setting up that the United States claimed an undivided one-fourth interest in the said lands. It shows that the claim was denied, and that a suit was pending between the parties, involving the validity of that claim. Both causes were submitted to the chancellor on a motion to require a larger injunction bond, on the demurrers, and on the sufficiency of the plea. No evidence was introduced to support the motion requiring a larger injunction bond. The chancellor rendered a decree—First, sustaining the demurrers on the ground that the original complainant had no right to ask a partition of the property it had sold to the cross-complainant, and that cross-complainant had no right to ask that the Henshaw heirs be given their respective shares out of the lands remaining in the hands of the original complainant; second, the court sustained the motion to require a larger injunction bond; third, it overruled the other grounds of demurrer; and, fourth, it sustained the exceptions to the plea. The plea sets up the claim of the United States in bar of the partition proceedings, and asks that the bill be dismissed by reason of the facts set up therein. The original complainant assigns as error the first ruling of the court hereinabove set out. The cross-complainant assigns as error the ruling of the court sustaining the motion to increase the injunction bond, and the ruling assigned by the original complainant. The defendants to the original bill and cross-bill assign as error the other rulings of the court on the demurrer and its rulings on the plea.

Semple & Gunter, for appellants. Tompkins & Troy, for appellees.

WALKER, J. Josiah Morris, being seised in fee of a tract of land containing 79 acres, in June, 1873, by a deed in which his wife joined, conveyed an undivided one-half interest therein to Eugene Beebe and Ferrie Henshaw, who were partners doing business under the firm name of Beebe & Henshaw. Henshaw died intestate in 1879. In January, 1887, Morris conveyed his remaining undivided half interest in the land to the Montgomery Land & Improvement Company. At the same time, Beebe, claiming and representing that, as the surviving partner of Beebe & Henshaw, he was fully authorized and empowered by the heirs of Henshaw to sell and convey the entire half interest of himself and the deceased, Henshaw, executed to the same company a deed purporting to convey to it that undivided half interest in the land, and that company, relying upon Beebe's statements and declarations, received from him the conveyance undertaking to convey the undivided half interest of Beebe & Henshaw, and paid him therefor. Immediately after the execution of the deeds to it, the land and improvement company entered upon and took possession of the entire tract of land. That company, in September, 1887, undertook to sell and convey to the Southern Cotton-Oil Company a part of said tract. The part so attempted to be sold and conveyed was a lot containing about 10 acres. The oil company took possession of this lot in good faith, believing that the land and improvement company had a good title thereto, and had conveyed the same to it, and erected permanent improvements thereon of the value of $150,000. Thereafter it was discovered that Beebe had no right to convey the interest of his deceased partner, Henshaw, and the heirs of Henshaw have recovered a judgment at law against the oil company for their undivided interests in the lot upon which the improvements had been erected. The original bill in this case was filed by the land and improvement company against the oil company and the heirs of Henshaw for a partition of the whole tract above mentioned. The bill alleges that the tract can be equitably divided, so that the Henshaw heirs may have their respective interests allotted out of the unimproved portion of the tract which the complainant has not attempted to convey, and the complainant offers to allow them to receive, on the partition, their respective portions out of the unimproved part. The oil company, in its answer and cross-bill, admits the allegations of the original bill, and alleges that at the time of its purchase from the land and improvement company it had no notice or information that the Henshaw heirs, or any one other than its vendor, had any interest in or title to the land; that it took the land described in its deed in good faith, believing that it acquired a good title to the entire interest therein, and that, acting under such belief, it erected the valuable improvements before it had any knowledge or information of the interest or claim of the Henshaw heirs. The oil company accepts the offer of the original bill that the interest of the Henshaw heirs be allotted to them out of the unimproved land remaining in the possession of the land and improvement company. The cross-bill prays for a writ of injunction to restrain the issue and execution of writs of possession on the judgment at law in favor of the Henshaw heirs. Demurrers and a plea were interposed for the Henshaw heirs to the original bill and to the cross-bill. The plea and some of the grounds of demurrer to the original bill and to the cross-bill were overruled. Other grounds of demurrer were sustained. The appellants are the Henshaw heirs, who assign as errors the rulings adverse to them. There are also cross-assignments of errors by the complainant in the original bill and the complainant in the cross-bill, respectively.

When the land and improvement company took possession of the entire tract under the deeds from Morris and Beebe, though, in ignorance of the interests of the Henshaw heirs, it claimed the land as sole owner, yet, in reality, the extent of its right was that of a tenant in common with them. The interest which it had acquired gave it an equal right with them to occupy the premises. One tenant in common cannot be deprived of the right to use and enjoy the common property because his co-tenants are willing to let the property lie idle, or fail or refuse to set up any claim to it; and while he is thus left in sole possession he may manage the common property in any way he pleases, provided he does not injure his co-tenants. Newbold v. Smart, 67 Ala. 326; Gayle v. Johnston, 80 Ala. 395. He may cultivate or improve the property, and the plain dictate of justice is that he be permitted to enjoy the fruits of his own labors unless that result involves some infringement upon the rights of the co-tenants who stand off and forbear to make any use of the property. The tenant out of possession may at any time assert his right to share in the possession, or he may have the property partitioned by a division among the co-tenants in severalty, each taking a distinct part according to the extent of his interest. He cannot complain of the mere possession of a co-tenant so long as he refrains from setting up any claim to share in that possession. And if in the partition the part of the property which he receives is as much as he would have been entitled to if his co-tenant had not been in possession at all, then, certainly, it cannot be said that his share in the property has been diminished by the fact that his co-tenant has improved the part which is allotted to him in the division. This court has not been unmindful of the equitable claim of a tenant in common who has in good faith expended his labor and capital in the improvement of property of which he has had sole possession, while his co-owners have abandoned or neglected it; but this equitable claim is not permitted to impair the right of the co-tenant out of possession, or to hinder or burden him in the partition of the property. Improvements which have been made by the tenant in possession either cover so much of the common property that the parts which the co-tenants out of possession are entitled to receive on a partition cannot be set off to them without including a portion of the improvements, or they cover no more than the part which may be allotted to the occupying tenant. In the former case the tenant who has made the improvements must suffer a loss as to part of them, unless his co-tenants are required to compensate or reimburse him therefor. In the latter case the co-tenants who have not been in possession may get their full shares of the property without any of the improvements. In the one case, if the tenant who has had nothing to do with making the improvements is required to contribute to the payment therefor, to this extent his right to a partition is burdened and incumbered as the result of the fact that improvements have been made. In the other case he may get his full share of the property, and he is no injured by the allotment to the occupying tenant of the part of the land which the latter has improved. There have been cases in this court involving the claim of one tenant in common to compensation from his co-tenants for improvements made by him on the common property, and also cases in which the claim of the improving tenant was merely to have the part of the property which he had improved allotted to him, so that his co-tenants, who had contributed nothing to the improvements, should receive their parts of the common property out of the unimproved portion thereof. In the former class of cases the claim to compensation for improvements made was not denied, but the amount of the compensation was not permitted to go beyond the amount of the rents charged against the improving tenant. Horton v. Sledge, 29 Ala. 478; Ormond v. Martin, 37 Ala. 598; Turnipseed v. Fitzpatrick, 75 Ala. 304. In the latter class of cases there has been a full recognition of the equitable rule that the court, if it is practicable, should so order the partition as to give the benefit of any improvements made on the premises to him who may have erected or made them, and this is done by assigning to such part owner the portion of the estate on which such improvements are situated. Donnor v. Quartermas, 90 Ala. 164, 8 South. Rep. 715; Wilkinson v. Stuart, 74 Ala. 198; Sanders v. Robertson, 57 Ala. 465. In each of the classes of cases the equitable claim of the one who has made the improvements is recognized and is enforced, so far as such enforcement does not involve an impairment of the rights of his co-tenants. There is a conflict in the authorities upon the question of allowing a co-tenant, in partition, to recover compensation for improvements made by him without the assent of his co-tenants; but, in cases where one co-tenant has improved only a parcel of the premises, which does not exceed his share of the whole tract, the generally, if not universally, recognized rule in courts of equity is to have allotted to him, in a partition, the parcel which has been enhanced in value by his expenditures and industry. Freem. Co-Ten. (2d Ed.) §§ 509-511; Robinson v. McDonald, 62 Amer. Dec. 480, and note; Nelson v. Clay, 23 Amer. Dec. 387; St. Felix v. Rankin, 3 Edw. Ch. 323. When the equitable claim of the improving tenant can be fully recognized and protected by awarding him the part which he has improved, the question of requiring the other co-tenants to make compensation for the improvements is not involved. They get their full shares of the property without any charge or burden upon them because of the improvements. The equity of a co-tenant to have the part of the common property which he has improved allotted to him on a partition is not founded upon the idea that he made the improvements with the consent, express or implied, of his co-tenants. In Donnor v. Quartermas, supra, and in Sanders v. Robertson, supra, the co-tenants in whose favor, respectively, this equity was recognized had made the improvements while claiming to be sole owners of the common property, and while in adverse possession thereof; and in Wilkinson v. Stuart, supra, the rule is so stated by the court as to cover the case of a tenant who makes improvements upon the common estate without the authority of his co-tenants. In Henton v. Sledge, supra, it was declared that the improving tenant was not entitled to compensation for improvements to the extent of the rents charged against him, unless he made the improvements at a time when he really and bona fide believed himself to be the true owner of the land, and unless he was induced to make those improvements by that belief, really entertained. The authorities generally, both in cases where compensation for improvements is allowed and in cases where the improved portion of the estate is allotted to the co-tenant who has expended his labor and capital thereon, treat the fact that the improvements were made by one who supposed himself to be legally entitled to the whole premises as an equitable consideration in his favor. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 655; Sedg. & W. Tr. Tit. Land, §§ 693, 694; Pitt v. Moore, (N. C.) 5 S. E. Rep. 389, 6 Amer. St. Rep. 495, note; Patrick v. Marshall, 4 Amer. Dec. 670; and authorities cited supra. Where it is practicable, without injury to the other co-tenants, to allot the improved portion to the one who made the improvements, the reason for making such allotment depend upon the existence of the fact that he believed himself to be the sole owner of the entire tract does not apply, as in cases where compensation for improvements is charged against the other co-tenants; for the allowance of compensation, though it is not permitted to go beyond the amount of the shares of the rents to which the other co-tenants would be entitled, is still a charge upon them to that extent, while, if they get their shares in full out of the unimproved portion, and are not required to make compensation in any way, the fact that improvements have been made does not affect their rights in the partition. The recognition in this way of the equitable claim of the tenant who has made improvements in no way impairs the rights of his co-tenants on a partition. A court of equity will not allow one man to deprive another of the fruits of his labors and expenditures if such an unconscionable result may be avoided consistently with the security to each of them of the full measure of all that he is entitled to claim. In such case we think that the true rule is expressed in the opinion in Hall v. Piddock, 21 N. J. Eq. 314, where it was said: "The only good faith required in such improvements is that they should be made honestly, for the purpose of improving the property, and not for embarrassing his co-tenants, or incumbering their estate, or hindering partition." The co-tenant, whether he supposes himself to be the sole owner, or knows that there are others who are owners in common with him, is entitled to occupy and use the property, though his co-tenants fail or refuse to share with him in the enjoyment thereof; and if, in the course of his use and occupation, he makes improvements on a part of the common property, in good faith, and without any intention of embarrassing or obstructing a partition, or gaining an advantage therein, there is no good reason why he should not be allowed to retain the part improved by him, if his improvements in fact do not constitute a hindrance or obstacle in the way of the other co-tenants getting their full shares on the division of the property. A court of equity will simply so order the partition as to secure the rights of all parties without visiting an unnecessary hardship upon any of them. In the present case, if the facts were just as they are disclosed by the original bill, except that the land and improvement company had made no conveyance of any of the land, but had erected the improvements on the parcel now held by the oil company, there could be no doubt of the propriety of allotting that parcel on a partition to the land and improvement company.

It is insisted, however, that the conveyance to the oil company cannot be allowed to have the effect of conferring upon that company an equity to have allotted to it, on a partition of the whole property, the parcel which it holds under a conveyance from only one of several tenants in common. So far as the grantor's co-tenants are concerned, the extent of the operation of his conveyance was to transfer to his grantee his undivided interest in the particular parcel therein described. Such a conveyance is ineffectual to prejudice or abridge the rights of the co-tenants who do not join in it; for each tenant in common has an undivided interest in the whole tract, and in every part of it, and the right of one of them in any part of the property cannot be impaired by the act of another. The conveyance does not, so far as the co-tenants who did not join in it are concerned, sever the special tract therein described from the general tract, to which the tenancy in common extends. They still have the same interest in the part of the property described in the conveyance as they had before it was executed. They are still entitled to a partition, and may have their shares in the property set off to them in severalty, just as if no conveyance had been made. Their rights are not increased or diminished. The grantee is simply clothed with the rights of his grantor in the special tract described in the conveyance. Ward v. Crobett, 72 Ala. 438. The tenants in common who did not join in the conveyance do not acquire, in consequence thereof, any greater rights in the common property or in any part of it than they had before. They have no more right to demand that the particular tract described in the conveyance, or any part of it, be allotted to them on a partition, than they would have had if the conveyance had not been made. We have seen that if one tenant in common deals in good faith with a part of the common property as if he were the sole owner thereof, by erecting improvements on his own account, he will be allowed, on a partition, to retain the improved part, if that does not involve any prejudice to the rights of his co-owners. If the improvements are made, not by the original tenant in common, but by his grantee, we can perceive no good reason why the latter should not have the benefit of the same measure of protection which a court of equity would have afforded to his grantor if no conveyance had been made. There is abundant support in the best authorities for the rule that, in making the partition in such a case, if the part sold and conveyed by one tenant in common can be assigned to the purchaser as a part or the whole of the share of his grantor without prejudice to the grantor's co-tenants in the original tract, it will be so assigned. Young v. Edwards, (S. C.) 11 S. E. Rep. 1066; Gittings v. Worthington, 67 Md. 146, 9 Atl. Rep. 228; Boggess v. Meredith, 16 W. Va. 28, 29; Worthington v. Staunton, Id. 208; Teal v. Woodworth, 3 Paige, Ch. 472; St. Felix v. Rankin, 3 Edw. Ch. 323; Camoron v. Thurmond, 56 Tex. 22; 11 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1092, 1093; Freem. Co-Ten. §§ 199–205. Under this rule the grantee merely has the benefit of the equitable claim which would have been recognized in favor of his grantor if no conveyance had been made. The other tenants in common are not allowed to disregard the conveyance so far as it could prejudice their rights, and, at the same time, give it such effect as to secure to them an inequitable advantage, which they would not have had if the grantor had made no transfer, but had improved part of the property himself. "There can be no doubt that the grantee of the specified parcel will become seised thereof in severalty if, upon partition, it should be assigned to him or to his grantor, and that, if not so assigned, he will lose his entire interest. He is more deeply interested in the partition than are any of the tenants in common of the entire tract. It matters little to them where their respective purparties may be located. But with the grantee of a special location it is all-important that such a division may be made as will allow his deed to become operative. He is entitled to the consideration of the court, and will, whenever his claims are known to the court, be protected, as far as possible, without doing injustice to the co-tenants of the whole tract. He has therefore been regarded as a proper party defendant even in states where his conveyance has been spoken of as void against the co-tenant of his grantor." Freem. Co-Ten. (2d Ed.) § 465. Whether the partition is sought by the grantor, who retains an undivided interest in the remaining portion of the original tract, or by his co-tenants, who did not join in his conveyance, it is proper to make the grantee of a specific portion a party defendant, so as to afford him an opportunity to assert his derivative equitable claim, to the end that the rights of the co-tenants, who are still entitled to a partition of the entire tract, may, if practicable, and without prejudice to them, be satisfied by an allotment of their shares out of that part of the original tract which was not included in the conveyance. The equitable claim of the purchaser from one tenant in common, founded upon the fact that he has, in good faith and without any purpose of embarrassing a partition, undertaken to acquire, and has improved, the parcel of land described in his deed, is not to be defeated by denying him the right to be a party to the proceeding in which the claims of other parties to the property in question may be so adjusted as to afford him protection. This can be done effectually only in a suit for a partition of the original tract. The grantee in a conveyance of a part of that tract from one of the tenants in common is a proper party to such a suit because of his interest in having the partition so directed as to protect him, so far as that may be done without prejudice to the rights of the other tenants in common. Gates v. Salmon, 35 Cal. 588; Sutter v. San Francisco, 36 Cal. 115; Harlan v. Langham, 69 Pa. St. 235; Whitton v. Whitton, 38 N. H. 127; Batterton v. Chiles, 54 Amer. Dec. 539. The claim of such grantee constitutes an equity which is involved in a partition of the original tract, and may be recognized and brought to the attention of the court in an original bill filed by others interested in the partition of the common property, or the grantee may propound it in a cross-bill.

The averments of the bill show that the land and improvement company acquired Beebe's undivided one-fourth interest in the entire tract. The plea of the Henshaw heirs alleges that that interest belongs to the United States. This is merely a denial of a part of the title claimed by the complainant in the original bill and the complainant in the cross bill. "In suits for the partition of lands, if the defendant denies the title of the complainant, the chancellor need not dismiss the bill or delay the suit until a trial can be instituted and had at law, but may direct the issue as to the title of the complainant to be tried as other issues of fact are triable." Code Ala. § 3588; McMath v. De Bardelaben, 75 Ala. 68; McQueen v. Turner, 91 Ala. 273, 8 South. Rep. 863. If the denial of the plea is sustained by the proof, there can be no partition unless the United States becomes a party to the suit so as to be bound by the result thereof; for it is indispensable, in a suit for partition, that all co-tenants not uniting in the bill be made parties defendant. Freem. Co-Ten. (2d Ed.) § 466. The United States cannot be made a party defendant without its consent. If the denial of the plea is not supported by the proof, there will be no obstacle to the rendition of a final decree. If the proof sustains the averments of the plea, the complainant may desire to have the United States made a party to the cause. It will then be a question whether the bill should be summarily dismissed because of the inability of the complainant to bring a necessary party before the court, or should be retained, and the equities of the parties now before the court protected, until the absent party shall choose to submit itself to the jurisdiction of the court, or to assert its right to a partition in some other proceeding, in which the equities of all the parties in interest may be adjusted. As that question is not now presented, we will not undertake to decide it. The demurrers to the original bill and to the cross-bill should have been overruled. The plea of the Henshaw heirs is sufficient, and should have been sustained. The ruling on the motion to require the cross-complainants to give an additional bond will not be disturbed. As each of the assignments of errors is sustained in part, the costs of the appeal will be equally divided between the three parties. Reversed and remanded.

WESTON et al. v. MOODY et al.

(Supreme Court of Florida. March 12, 1892.)

APPEAL—RECORD—DISMISSAL—FAILURE TO FILE PETITION.

1. A statement in a petition of appeal, that the trial court "admitted improper evidence," or "rejected proper evidence," is insufficient. The particular evidence admitted or rejected should be designated.

2. Where appellees move, at the term to which an appeal was taken, to dismiss the appeal on account of the failure of appellants to file a petition of appeal in the time prescribed by the rules, and pending such motion the appellants move for leave to file the petition, accompanying the motion with a petition which is too general in its designation of alleged errors, the court will, under the liberal practice obtaining in such cases, permit the petition to be filed on terms. Payment by appellants of the costs of both motions and filing a proper amended petition of appeal within a stated time, required as terms of allowance of appellants' motion; motion to dismiss denied; motion to file petition granted.

Appeal from circuit court, Marion county.

Motion by S. D. Moody and others to dismiss an appeal taken by W. J. Weston and others from a judgment. Motion denied.

Bullock & Burford, for the motion. L. N. Green, opposed.

RANEY, C. J. Appellees moved to dismiss appeal taken to this term, on account of failure of appellants to file a petition of appeal within the time prescribed by rule 8. Appellants have presented a petition of appeal, and move to be permitted to file the same. The appellees object to the petition as being too general, in stating that the court below "admitted improper evidence," and "rejected proper evidence," without pointing out the particular evidence admitted or rejected. This objection to sufficiency of these statements of the errors complained of is well taken, yet we do not think it justifies a dismissal of the appeal. Pittman v. Myrick, 16 Fla. 401. We will, under the liberal practice obtaining in such cases, permit the appeal to stand upon the following terms: The costs of both motions will be taxed against appellants, and the appellants must within 10 days file an amended petition of appeal, designating such rulings, orders, and decrees as they claim to be erroneous. Should they fail to file such amended petition, the court will, of its own motion, dismiss the appeal. The motion of appellees will be denied, and that of the appellants granted, on the terms indicated as to each.

ELLSWORTH v. HAILE et al.

(Supreme Court of Florida. Feb. 26, 1892.)

NOTICE OF APPEAL—SERVICE OF CITATION—ABANDONMENT.

1. Where 30 days do not intervene between the entry of an appeal and the next succeeding term of the supreme court, only 20 days' notice of the appeal is necessary; and, to enable the appellant to give the appellee this notice, the appeal may be made returnable to a day in term subsequent to the first day of the term. The practice does not, however, contemplate that the appellant may enter his appeal and use his own convenience as to the time of issuing and serving citation, nor that an appeal shall be brought to a term prior to which there has been no issue of citation.

2. Delinquency on the part of the clerk in preparing an appeal transcript is not an excuse for the failure of an appellant or his counsel to observe ordinary diligence in obtaining an appeal citation, and having it served.

3. An appeal was entered on the 2d day of a month, and the next term of the appellate court began on the 12th day of the month, and on the 5th day of the next succeeding month appellant filed the appeal transcript in the appellate court, and moved for a citation returnable to the same term. Held, that the appeal was abandoned.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Alachua county.

Bill by E. S. Haile and others against E. S. Ellsworth. From an order overruling defendant's demurrer to the bill, he appeals. Appeal dismissed.

W. W. Hampton and A. F. Odlin, for appellant. F. E. Hughes and Syd. L. Carter, for appellees.

RANEY, C. J. An appeal was entered in this cause, on the 2d day of January of the present year, to the present term of the court, which term began on the 12th day of the same month. The appeal is from an order made on the 16th day of December last, overruling certain grounds of a demurrer to a bill in chancery. The transcript was not filed here till the 5th day of the present month, (February,) at which time a præcipe or application to the clerk, followed by a motion entered on the docket, was made for a citation returnable to the present term. We shall consider the motion as if it had been entered on the day the præcipe was filed.

Where 30 days do not intervene between the entry of an appeal and the succeeding term of this court, 25 days' notice of the appeal is not indispensable, but 20 days' notice is necessary; and, to enable the appellant to give the appellee 20 days' notice, he may make his appeal returnable to a day in the term subsequent to the first day thereof.

The purpose of this provision as to appeals between which and the next term of the court 30 days do not intervene is to avoid the delay incident to the appeal going over to the second succeeding term of this court; and to this end not only is the period of notice reduced to 20 days, but the time actually intervening between the appeal and the first day of the term is permitted to be supplemented by so many days of the term as will reasonably enable the appellant to give the appellee 20 days' notice. The statute, however, does not contemplate that the appellant may enter his appeal, and use his own convenience as to the time of issue and service of the citation, nor that any appeal shall be brought to a term prior to which there has been no issue of the citation. The provision of chancery rule 95, that the appellant shall, at the time of entering his appeal, apply to the clerk of the circuit court to issue a citation, or that he shall apply to the clerk of this court upon filing the transcript here, was not intended to change the policy of the statute as to the time of the service of the citation. Appellant might have taken a citation from the clerk of the circuit court when he entered this appeal. Delinquency, if there was any, upon the part of the clerk, in not preparing the transcript until the 29th day of January, might excuse the mere failure to file the transcript in this court, but does not excuse counsel from the observance of ordinary diligence in obtaining citation and having it served, or change the policy of the law. By waiting till the twenty-fifth day of the term, and 34 days after entering his appeal, he has abandoned it, and it should be dismissed. The motion will be denied, and the appeal dismissed.

RAY, County Treasurer, v. WILSON.

(Supreme Court of Florida. Feb. 1, 1892.)

COUNTY WARRANTS — VALIDITY — MANDAMUS TO COUNTY TREASURER — PLEADING — RETURN — REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. Where a clerk of the circuit court is ex officio auditor of his county, and it is his official duty to audit all accounts against the county, in the manner prescribed by the statute, and to keep on file in his office the vouchers for all claims audited by him, and the law also provides that all accounts against a county shall be approved by the county commissioners before they are audited by the clerk, warrants or orders in favor of third parties, issued by the clerk under his seal of office, directed to the county treasurer, and expressed upon their face to be "chargeable under head of county expenditures," or to be payable "out of any money in the treasury appropriated for county purposes," are prima facie valid claims against the county.

2. Mandamus lies against a county treasurer to compel the payment of a valid warrant or order drawn on him as such treasurer, and for the payment of which he has the necessary funds applicable thereto.

3. Where an alternative writ of mandamus, brought to compel the payment, by a county treasurer, of county warrants, shows that warrants, regular upon their face, were issued by the proper officer, and for value received, and that the treasurer has the funds for their payment, it is not demurrable.

4. The fact that an ordinary action at law obtains against a county on a county warrant, does not constitute a specific and adequate remedy avoiding a mandamus for its payment in favor of the holder of such warrant against a county treasurer having the necessary funds for its payment.

5. A return to a sufficient alternative writ of mandamus must state all the facts relied upon by the respondent with such precision and certainty that the court may be fully advised of all the particulars necessary to enable it to pass upon the sufficiency of the return, and its statements cannot be supplemented by inference or intendment. A return that the warrants whose payment is sought are spurious, illegal, and void is, being a mere conclusion of law, insufficient, as likewise is a return that the warrants were issued and are held without valuable consideration; such statement being made, not as a positive averment of such fact, but as an inference or argument drawn from or based upon allegations which do not support the inference or argument.

6. Assuming that an order by a board of county commissioners, duly entered upon its records, authorizing the issue of county warrants, to be necessary to the validity of warrants of which payment out of the county treasury is sought by mandamus, a return stating that no such order appears upon the records of the board is insufficient. It is not incompatible with the fact that such an order was duly made and entered upon the records, nor tantamount to an allegation that no such order was ever passed and entered.

7. An order of a board of county commissioners requiring that county warrants previously issued shall be presented for re-examination by the board, and providing that all such scrip not presented by a stated day shall be of no effect, or "repudiated," is, though published according to the terms of the order, no defense to the payment of warrants not presented.

8. The statement of a return to an alternative writ of mandamus should be positive, and not on information and belief.

9. The delay of the relator in instituting proceedings by mandamus should be taken advantage of by proper pleading in the trial court. It cannot be urged primarily in the appellate court.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Brevard county; JOHN D. BROOME, Judge.

Mandamus proceedings by Thomas E. Wilson against S. H. Ray, treasurer of Brevard county, to compel him to pay certain warrants. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Minor S. Jones, for appellant. Thos. E. Wilson, in pro. per.

RANEY, C. J. This is an appeal from a judgment awarding a peremptory writ of mandamus requiring the appellant, the county treasurer of Brevard county, to pay certain county scrip or warrants.

The warrants consist of two pieces, each of the denomination of $10, dated October 26, 1876, and purporting to have been issued in the office of the clerk of Brevard county, at Lake View, by John M. Lee, clerk of the circuit court of that county, and ex officio auditor, and sealed with the official seal of such clerk, and in favor of William Shiver or order, and "chargeable under head of 'County Expenditures,'" and indorsed by Shiver; and of seven other pieces, six of which are for $20, and one for $10, drawn in favor of the relator, and dated May 2, 1876, at Lake View, in the above county, signed by John M. Lee, clerk of such court, and sealed as above indicated, and payable "out of any moneys in the treasury appropriated for county purposes." They are all drawn on the county treasurer, and numbered as indicated in the alternative writ. The alternative writ alleges that these warrants were regularly issued, for value received, and that the defendant has in his hands, as such county treasurer, the necessary funds to pay them, and that they have been presented to him, as such treasurer, for payment, but have never been paid, and that defendant is such treasurer.

By the constitution of 1868, as by the present revision thereof, the clerk of the circuit court was made clerk of the boards of county commissioners and ex officio auditor of the county. Section 19, art. 6, Const. 1868, and section 15, art. 5, Const. 1885. The act of June 6, 1870, (section 31, p. 179, McClel. Dig.,) provides that the clerks of the different counties shall audit all accounts against their respective counties in the same manner as prescribed for the comptroller to audit accounts against the state, and that they shall require the same evidence of the legality of claims against counties as is required to establish claims against the state, and he shall keep on file in his office vouchers for all claims audited by him. By the act of February 16, 1872, (page 316, McClel. Dig.,) the county commissioners were given power to approve all accounts against the counties before the same should be audited by the clerk. The legislature of 1877, (sections 12, 13, pp. 317, 318, McClel. Dig.,) being subsequent to the issue of these warrants, need not be considered.

The alternative writ was demurred to on four grounds, one of which was that the relator had filed no cause of action; which ground was sustained and the others overruled; and, the relator filing the cause of action, the defendant answered as required.

The writ states, in our judgment, a prima facie case of pecuniary liability on the part of the county; or, in other words, sets up a sufficiently valid claim against the county to call for a defense.

Under the above constitutional provision and the legislation of 1870, it is clearly an official duty of the clerk of the circuit court to audit all claims against the county, and these warrants issued by him, under his hand and official seal, are the usual and proper evidence then given a creditor of the auditing of his claims against the county, the vouchers for which are presumed to have been duly required by the clerk or auditor, and to have been filed by him in his office. County and city orders issued by the proper officers are prima facie binding and legal. Such officers are presumed to have done their duty, and the orders constitute a prima facie cause of action, the impeachment of which must come from the defendant. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 502; Commissioners v. Day, 19 Ind. 450; Commissioners v. Keller, 6 Kan. 510; Clark v. City of Des Moines, 19 Iowa, 199, 211; Cheeney v. Town of Brookfield, 60 Mo. 53; City of Cornersville v Hydraulic Co., 86 Ind. 184. It is, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, to be presumed that the accounts upon which the warrants were issued were approved by the county commissioners under the act of 1872 before the clerk audited them and issued the warrants sued on. It was not necessary to specify the consideration of the warrant in the writ. Commissioners v. Day, supra. An alternative writ is not demurrable, if it states a prima facie case. State v. Mayor, etc., of Jacksonville, 22 Fla. 21. This writ shows that the scrip was issued by the proper officer, and for value received, and that the treasurer has funds to pay it; and the judgment must be affirmed, unless we find either that the relator has another specific and adequate remedy, or that the matters set up in the return are sufficient to bar a recovery in this proceeding. To these questions, in the order stated, we shall address ourselves.

In Com. v. Johnson, 2 Bin. 275, the decision was that mandamus lay to compel road supervisors to pay orders drawn on them in favor of surveyors by justices of the peace, under the provisions of a statute. "It is said," observes the opinion, "that the supervisors may be indicted for neglect of duty. But, if they were indicted and convicted, the orders might still be unpaid. It is said, also, that, if they withhold payment without just cause, they are liable to an action. Granting that they are, it must be brought against them in their private capacity, and there is no form of action against them which, being carried to judgment, will authorize an execution to be levied on the treasury of the Northern Liberties. Now it was to this treasury that the surveyors had a right to look when they acted under their commission from the governor." In Baker v. Johnson, 41 Me. 15, mandamus was granted to compel a county treasurer to pay the account of a sheriff for his services and those of his subordinates in attending court. His bills were audited and allowed by the presiding judge. Some objection was made that the judge did not, in terms, order the bills to be paid, yet it was conceded that they were allowed in the same manner as had ever been the practice in the county. In Potts v. State, 75 Ind. 336, a supervisor of highways had allowed a laborer for work done, and given him an order on the trustee of the township for its payment; but the trustee, on demand of payment, refused to pay the order out of the moneys in his hand applicable to its payment, and a peremptory mandamus was granted on relation of the supervisor. In State v. Gandy, 12 Neb. 232, 11 N. W. Rep. 296, the writ, after describing the warrants and their assignment to the relator, stated, in substance, that the warrants were legally issued by the board of county commissioners, duly presented to, and audited and allowed by, the board when in session, and that they had been presented for payment, and payment refused, and that there were, at the institution of the proceeding, sufficient funds in the treasury to pay the same after paying all prior warrants on that fund. These facts being conceded by the failure of the defendant to answer, a peremptory writ was awarded. See, also, Johnson v. Campbell, 39 Tex. 83; Hendricks v. Johnson, 45 Miss. 644; Clayton v. Williams, 49 Miss. 311; State v. Treasurer, 43 Mo. 228; People v. Edmonds, 15 Barb. 529, 19 Barb. 468; People v. Haws, 36 Barb. 59. In People v. Wendell, 71 N. Y. 171, there was an application, primarily, for a peremptory mandamus requiring a county treasurer to pay a claim of the relator which had been audited by the board of supervisors of the county. The papers used in opposing the motion showed quite clearly that a fraud had been perpetrated upon the board of supervisors in reference to a considerable portion of the claim, and it was also apparent that another portion of it was allowed without any authority or sanction of law. The order denying the application was affirmed. Recognizing it as a settled principle that a remedy by peremptory mandamus cannot be invoked unless there is a clear and unquestioned legal right, (People v. Mott, 64 N. Y. 600,) it is yet observed by the court, subject, however, to the fact that in this case an alternative writ did not seem to be desired, that it is the duty of the court, in such cases, to see that the rights of the relator are fully protected, and it is authorized to direct the issuing of an alternative writ in cases where the facts relied upon by the relator are in dispute, or where the parties wish to review the case on appeal, or upon the suggestion of either party.

The above authorities hold that where the claim of the relator is one of a character whose payment the law imposes on the county or municipality, and it has been audited, and ordered to be paid by officers having the authority to audit it and order its payment, a county treasurer, or other paying officer, should not refuse to pay, if he has the money to pay it with, unless the claim is for some reason fraudulent. The duty to pay, where the paying officer has the funds to pay with, and the officers auditing and ordering payment have acted within the scope of their powers, and there is no fraud attached to the claim, is merely ministerial, and mandamus will lie to compel its payment. It is true the right to this remedy was doubted, though not decided, in People v. Lawrence, 6 Hill, 244, but such right is affirmed in the later New York cases. If the claim is not one of a character payable by the county or municipality, or if the board auditing it and ordering its payment had no authority to do so, or if there is fraud, (or, it may be, mistake,—Shirk v. Pulaski Co., 4 Dill. 209,) neither of which conditions is pretended to exist here, the paying officer should refuse to pay it. It is true that in some cases the right to the writ is put on the ground that an ordinary action at law will not lie against the county or municipality on the claim. We fail to see that such an action against the county is a sufficient remedy. If the claim is lawful, and has been audited and ordered paid by the proper authority, and the officer whose function it is to pay has been furnished with and has the public money for its payment, there is a palpable insufficiency in a remedy which would give him a personal judgment against the county or municipality, to be followed, it may be, by a mandamus to compel the levy of a tax to pay the same in case the money in the treasury should have been used, or there was not enough to pay the accrued interest, and all this, too, simply because an officer whose duty it is to pay lawful claims sees fit to refuse to do his duty. The holder of such a claim has an immediate right to the money provided and held for his payment, and a remedy which imposes any of the delay indicated, and its attendant expense, is entirely inadequate. A remedy which will avoid mandamus must be both specific and adequate. Baker v. Johnson, supra; Tapp. Mand. 18, 19; High, Extr. Rem. §§ 9, 15, 16, 17.

The contention that the relator has another sufficient legal remedy is answered by the authorities and observations set out above. This case is of course clearly distinguishable from those holding that a mandamus will not issue to compel the levy of a tax to pay a warrant or order of this character without putting it in judgment. State v. Clay Co., 46 Mo. 231; State v. Justices, 48 Mo. 475; State v. Trustees, 61 Mo. 155; Coy v. City Council, 17 Iowa, 1; Chase v. Morrison, 40 Iowa, 620. We are not called upon to notice the distinction made between cases where a warrant is payable expressly out of a particular fund and those where it is not.

The return "charges" that the scrip is spurious, illegal, and void, and was issued and is held by relator without valuable consideration; such charge being made upon the basis of an allegation that "no order or resolution appears upon the records ordering or authorizing the clerk to issue or sign said scrip to relator;" and of another allegation that on the first Monday in January, 1880, the board of county commissioners passed an order "that all Brevard county scrip issued between January 1, 1870, and January 1, 1880, be called in, and handed to the clerk of the board for the purpose of being examined by the board, and that all scrip found to be good should be restamped, and that all scrip not in or before the board by the first Monday of March, A. D. 1880, would be repudiated; and that such order should be published, up to March 1, 1880, in the Orange County Reporter, and also be posted at the several voting precincts of Brevard county." The cause of the adoption of this order is stated by the respondent, upon information and belief, to be that, prior to the year 1880, a large amount of spurious scrip or orders upon the treasurer of Brevard county had been placed in circulation, and had been and was being circulated and transferred by mere delivery; "that is to say, it appeared that scrip to a large amount had been issued without the sanction or order of the board of county commissioners of Brevard county; that this fact appears from the records of said county, the records of said county showing that no accounts for said scrip are filed, and no account is filed, and no account for said scrip was acted upon or approved by the board of county commissioners for said county; and that no such accounts were audited by the auditor of said board of county commissioners, and that said board of county commissioners never issued said scrip, or authorized the same to be issued;" and the purpose of the order is charged to have been "to protect the county from being defranded by the payment of such fraudulent, spurious, and illegal scrip."

The charge that the scrip is spurious, illegal, and void is a mere conclusion of law, and insufficient as a return, (High, Extr. Rem. § 472;) and the charge that it was issued and is held without valuable consideration is also insufficient in law, it being made, not as an independent or positive averment of such fact, but as an inference, argument, or conclusion of law drawn from or based upon allegations which, as appears in the preceding paragraph of this opinion, in no wise support the inference, argument, or conclusion; and for this reason the charge or averment is insufficient. Id. 472. Unwarrantable inferences do not constitute of themselves a defense, whether the facts from which they are drawn be a defense or not. It is of course altogether immaterial that the relator may not hold these warrants for a valuable consideration, if it be that they were issued for one, and are otherwise legal. It is not properly denied that they were so issued, nor that they are so held.

The allegation that no order or resolution appears upon the records, meaning, of course, the records of the board of county commissioners, ordering or authorizing the clerk to issue or sign this scrip, "to relator," is an entirely insufficient defense to a recovery on the scrip issued to the relator directly, as it is to that issued to Shiver, if we may ignore the words quoted, which confine the averment to that issued to the relator individually. If, before the issue of the scrip, the county commissioners, by an order or resolution duly entered upon their records, if such entry was necessary, (Johnson v. Wakulla Co., 28 Fla. —, 9 South. Rep. 690,) or otherwise, (if the entry was unnecessary,) duly approved the accounts upon which it was issued, the fact that no such order or resolution appeared at the time of the application for the writ of mandamus, or at the time of the signing or filing of the return, is not fatal to the validity of the scrip. Its averment is not incompatible with the fact that such an order or resolution was legally passed and duly entered upon the records, nor is it tantamount to an allegation that no such order was ever passed or entered. The facts necessary to make it so should have been stated in the return. The rules governing returns in mandamus do not permit us to supplement their statements by either inference, intendment, or otherwise. All of the facts relied upon by the respondent must be stated with such precision and certainty that the court may be fully advised of all the particulars necessary to enable it to pass upon the sufficiency of the return. Commissioners v. Johnson, 21 Fla. 578; State v. Mayor, 22 Fla. 21; High, Extr. Rem. §§ 470, 472, 474.

An order or resolution like that passed by the board of county commissioners in January, 1880, is not a defense to the payment of an obligation of a county, nor will its publication, in accordance with directions contained in it, render it so. It is to be observed, however, that neither the return nor the entire record informs us that there was any publication of the order, or even that the relator had notice of it. County commissioners cannot impose on the holders of prior claims of this character against a county the presentation thereof for the mere purpose of examination and indorsement, nor make it a condition of their validity or recognition. Their non-presentation under the resolution is of itself no bar to their recovery, nor to the proceedings now before us, and this, too, no matter how much other scrip may have been issued during the same period without being duly audited, or without the order, sanction, or approval of the board of county commissioners or of other legal authority, and had been, and was being, circulated in the manner alleged, nor that the fact of such unauthorized issue appears from the records of the county. The statement made in the return of the causes leading to the adoption of the resolution in question fails to show that the particular scrip now sued upon was issued in the manner stated, and this scrip is consequently not affected by such statement. The infirmities of any other warrants or claims, whatever such infirmities may be, or however great is the quantity of such warrants or claims, cannot be extended by argument, inference, or intendment to these.

The return also charges, upon information and belief, that the scrip is not shown by the records of the county of Brevard to be genuine, and issued in accordance with law, and for a full and valuable consideration inuring to the county, and that hence it is spurious and fraudulent, and issued in total disregard of law, and without valuable consideration. What has been said above, upon practically similar allegations of this return is, upon the authorities there cited, applicable to this attempted defense, and conclusive of its insufficiency.

Certain charges or allegations of the return are made on information and belief. We do not think this the proper form of averments in such pleadings, (State v. Commissioners, 22 Fla. 1;) but, as in the case just cited, do not hold the return insufficient merely on that ground.

The point as to delay in instituting this proceeding should have been made by the pleadings in the lower court. It, if apparently good, might have been satisfactorily answered there had this course been pursued. Logan v. Slade, (Fla.) 10 South. Rep. 25.

The peremptory writ commands the payment of the warrants, identifying them, and stating their aggregate amount, $150, as it is stated in the alternative writ. A reference to a master was neither necessary nor proper.

The judgment is affirmed.

VONDERBANK v. SCHMIDT. (No. 10,853.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Feb. 8, 1892. 44 La Ann.)[1]

GOOD-WILL—WHAT CONSTITUTES—ASSIGNMENT—TRADE-NAME.

1. Good-will is the favor which the management of a business wins from the public, and the probability that old customers will continue their patronage, and to resort to the old place.

2. It may be said to consist of those intangible advantages or incidents which are impersonal so far as the vendor is concerned, and attach to the thing conveyed. When it consists in the advantage of location it follows an assignment of the lease of the location; and, if not assigned, it passes to the lessee of the property at the termination of the lease.

3. A trade-mark has no separate existence, but owes its existence to the fact that it is actually affixed to a vendible commodity, whereas a trade-name or a fictitious name may be considered as a quasi trade-mark,—a mere property which is somewhat allied to good-will.

[1] Rehearing denied, March 8, 1892.

4. The only restraint the grant of good-will imposes upon the grantor is to prevent his subsequent employment of his own name so as to deceive and mislead the public.

5. A surname may become impersonal when attached to an article of manufacture, and becomes the name by which such article is known in the market, and, in case of sale of the right to manufacture, the same passes also, though it does not pass as good-will, but as a trade-mark.

6. By giving a particular name to a building as a sign of the hotel business, a tenant does not thereby make the name a fixture to the building, and the property of the landlord upon the expiration of the lease.

7. One may consent to the employment of his own name as that of a place of refreshment, but, if such consent be purely gratuitous he may withdraw it at pleasure; particularly if such name be his surname, it being personal to the proprietor, and not an element of good-will of the business.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FRANCIS A. MONROE, Judge.

Suit by Matthieu Vonderbank against John Schmidt to enjoin the unlawful use of plaintiff's name in operating an hotel. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and judgment entered for plaintiff. Rehearing refused.

Buck, Dinkelspiel & Hart, for appellant. Bernard McCloskey, for appellee.

WATKINS, J. For many years the plaintiff in this suit was engaged in the conduct and management of an hotel, which was kept in a rented building, situated on Magazine street, in the city of New Orleans. It was kept upon what is popularly known as the "European Plan," i. e., rooms and lodging without board. While thus conducted, this hotel was customarily styled and denominated the "Hotel Vonderbank" or "Vonderbank Hotel." While thus conducting said hotel, the plaintiff was also engaged in a business on Common street, in said city, between Camp and St. Charles streets, under the name and style of "Cafe Restaurant Vonderbank," which consisted of a bar-room, or saloon, and restaurant, and a few rooms for lodgers. Plaintiff represents that the theory upon which he conducted the two businesses was that his hotel on Magazine street was to be a boarding-place for the patrons of his restaurant, the two being conducted co-operatively That in April, 1889, he made a sale of the hotel to Charles Dormitzer, who carried on the business for some time thereafter, though unsuccessfully, and assigned it to his creditors. An arrangement was made whereby it was conveyed to the defendant. Under the administrations of Dormitzer and Schmidt, the hotel was operated as it had been by the plaintiff, under the name "Hotel Vonderbank" or "Vonderbank Hotel;" and he complains that was done in plain violation of his rights, and much to the detriment and injury of his business as a restaurateur. Denying that defendant acquired or has the right to enjoy that privilege, petitioner enjoined his further use of his name, claiming damages, and from an adverse judgment he prosecutes this appeal.

The ground on which the defendant resists the plaintiff's demands is that by his purchase from Dormitzer he acquired all the right, title, and interest of said vendor in and to the Hotel Vonderbank, or Vonderbank Hotel, situated on Magazine street, including the good-will of the business and establishment, and particularly such good-will as said vendor acquired from the plaintiff, including the name or style of said hotel, which he, as purchaser, is of right entitled to use and enjoy. Plaintiff admits that he sold to Dormitzer "the shelving, counters, tables, crockery, beds and bedding, and all other movable effects in the building known as the 'Vonderbank Hotel' (or 'Hotel Vonderbank') situated on Magazine street, * * * and used in connection with his business, now the property of said Vonderbank, together with the good-will of said Vonderbank in and to said business." The business of which the plaintiff is now the proprietor, as he was at the time of his sale of the hotel, is styled and advertised as "Matthieu Vonderbank, Proprietor of Vonderbank's Cafe and Restaurant," situated at Nos. 126, 128, and 130 Common street. It is further admitted and conceded that at the date of these transactions the hotel was a going concern, in full operation as the "Vonderbank Hotel" or "Hotel Vonderbank," and that it is so now. It is of an interference with his restaurant business that plaintiff complains, on account of defendant's improper and unlawful use of his name in the style of his hotel. Neither in the sale of plaintiff to Dormitzer, nor in that of the latter to the defendant, is there any mention of the name "Hotel Vonderbank" as a factor in the contract, it appearing from the two acts of sale that there was conveyed all the movable property belonging to the hotel situated in the building known as the "Hotel Vonderbank," on Magazine street, together with the good-will of said Vonderbank, and subsequently of Dormitzer, in and to said premises.

On this state of facts the only question raised is whether, under Dormitzer's purchase from Vonderbank and his sale to Schmidt, including specifically the good-will of the hotel establishment, the latter acquired and is entitled to use the name "Hotel Vonderbank" or "Vonderbank Hotel" as the style of his hotel. This must be determined by the true meaning of the term "good-will," as it is employed in commercial transactions. We have been referred to only three cases in our own reports in which the subject has been discussed, but in neither of which was the particular question we have here discussed, i. e., what passes by the term "good-will" in an act of sale? The cases referred to are the following, viz.: Wintz v. Vogt, 3 La. Ann. 16; Succession of Journe, 21 La. Ann. 391; Bergamini v. Bastian, 35 La. Ann. 60. In treating of the good-will of a market-stall, the court said in the second case that it is "understood [to be] the run of custom which the transferrer had obtained by the patronage of the friends resorting to his stand to purchase, and, generally, from the reputation his stand had acquired as one at which good and wholesome meats were sold, and where customers were accommodated and fairly dealt with." This definition appears to have been paraphrased from that of Judge Story, which is frequently quoted by judges and authors. Story, Partn. § 99; 8 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1366, in which brief quotations from English adjudications are found. The third of the three cases above referred to treated of an act of sale of an eating-house at No. 21 Royal street, city of New Orleans, which contained no stipulation of good-will having been conveyed; the plaintiff's complaint being that his vendor had soon afterwards begun a similar business at No. 18 Royal street, in violation of his contract. But the court substantially held that, inasmuch as there was no stipulation in the contract that the vendor should not resume business in his own name, the injunction should be dissolved. We have referred to those decisions for the sole purpose of showing that our own jurisprudence affords no light on the present controversy, and of illustrating the necessity of looking into the decisions of other courts, and the opinions of text-writers, for its correct solution; and we make the following quotations as conveying a clear idea of what good-will is. For instance, the Michigan court say, in Chittenden v. Witbeck, 50 Mich. 401, 15 N. W. Rep. 526: "Good-will has been defined by this court to be the favor which the management of a business wins from the public, and the probability that old customers will continue their patronage;" or, as stated by Lord ELDON in Cruttwell v. Lye, 17 Ves. 335, say the court, "the probability that old customers will resort to the old place." The same court say, in Williams v. Farrand, 50 N. W. Rep. 446: "Good-will may be said to be those intangible advantages or incidents which are impersonal so far as the grantor is concerned, and attach to the thing conveyed. When it consists in the advantage of location, it follows an assignment of the lease of the location." Or, as previously said by that court in the Chittenden Case: "Good-will attaches to the property, and, in case of a lease, it belongs to the lessee, only during its continuation. * * * The claim to an interest in the good-will is inseparable from the claim to an interest in the lease, and, when one fails, the other falls with it." To a like effect is the opinion of the same court as expressed in Myers v. Buggy Co., 54 Mich. 215, 19 N. W. Rep. 961, and 20 N. W. Rep. 545. A standard author, in his treatise on trade-marks, discusses and defines good-will as an analogous right, and quotes with approval the expressions of various English judges on the subject. Thus from Wedderburn v. Wedderburn, 22 Beav. 84, viz.: "There is considerable difficulty in defining accurately what is included under the term 'good-will.' It seems to be that species of connection in trade which induces customers to deal with a particular firm." From England v. Downs, 6 Beav. 269, viz.: "It is the chance or probability that custom will be had at a certain place of business, in consequence of the way in which that business has been previously carried on." From Story on Partnership, viz.: "It may be described to be the advantage or benefit which is acquired by an establishment, beyond the mere value of the capital stock, funds, or property employed therein, in consequence of the general public patronage and encouragement which it receives from constant or habitual customers, on account of its local position or common celebrity," etc. Section 90. Browne, Trade-Marks, (2d Ed.) §§ 522, 523. In further illustration of this principle, we have selected the following paragraph from Williams v. Farrand as giving a careful analysis, from a commercial point of view, of what passes by an act of sale containing no stipulations of good-will, viz.: "A retiring partner conveys without stipulating good-will, in addition to his interest in the tangible effects, simply the advantages that an established business possesses over a new enterprise. The old business is an assured success; the new an experiment. The old is a going business, and produces its accustomed profits on the day after its transfer. It is capital already invested and earning profits. The continuing partner gets these advantages. The new business must be built up. The capital taken out of the old concern will earn nothing for months, and, in all probability, the first year's business will show loss instead of profit. For a time, at least, it is capital awaiting investment, or invested earning nothing. The retiring partner takes these chances or advantages. He does not agree that the benefit derived from his connection with the business shall continue. He does not agree that the old business shall continue to have the benefit of his name, reputation, or service, nor does he guaranty the continuance of that patronage which may have been attached by his name or reputation. He does not pledge a continuation of conditions. He takes out of the business an element that he contributed to the success of the business. He sells only those advantages and incidents which attach to the property and location, rather than those which attach to the person of the vendor. He sells only so much of the custom as will continue in spite of his retirement and activity. He sells probabilities, and not assurances." Page 449. (Italics ours.) As a corollary of the foregoing opinion, an extract may be properly selected from that of the Connecticut court in Cottrell v. Manufacturing Co., 54 Conn. 138, 6 Atl. Rep. 791, in reference to what passed by a bill of sale of goods, etc., accompanied by a transfer of the good-will merely, viz.: "By purchasing the good-will merely, Cottrell secured the right to conduct the old business at the old stand, with the probability in his favor that the old customers would continue to go there. If he desired more he should have procured it by positive agreement. The matter of good-will was in his mind. Presumably he obtained all that he desired. At any rate, the express contract is the measure of his right; and since that conveys a good-will in terms, but says, no more, the court will not, upon inference, deny to the vendor the possibility of successful competition, by all lawful means, with the vendee in the same business. No restraint upon trade may rest upon inference. Therefore, in the absence of any express stipulation to the contrary, the vendor might lawfully establish a similar business at the next door," etc. (Italics ours.)

From the foregoing it appears that good-will is an advantage or benefit which is acquired by a business establishment beyond the mere intrinsic value of the capital stock; that it is the general public patronage and encouragement which a business receives from its customers on account of its local position; that it is the subject of value and price, and of bargain and sale, though intangible, but, in order to be conveyed, mention must be made of it in the act of sale. The discussion of the rights of a vendee of good-will more frequently arises in the course of liquidation of corporations and sales in partnership than elsewhere; but, as the principle involved is the same as in cases of bargain and sale between individuals, decisions involving such transactions may be examined, along with others, in ascertaining to what extent, and in what class of cases, such sales involve the assignment to the vendee of the right to use the name of the vendor. In Williams v. Farrand it was held that a retiring partner could not "use his own name * * * in such a way as to lead the public to suppose that he is continuing the old business," etc. In Myers v. Buggy Co., 54 Mich. 215, 19 N. W. Rep. 961, and 20 N. W. Rep. 545, three partners retired from the Kalamazoo Wagon Company, and thereafter organized and put into operation the defendant company. They were enjoined from prosecuting that business on the ground that they were guilty of an act of piracy, as they "were not using their own names," but an assumed name, calculated to deceive the public. Like cases are stated in Burgess v. Burgess, 3 De Gex, M. &. G. 896, and in Lee v. Haly, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 155. In the Williams Case the court stated "that when an express contract has been made * * * for the use by a purchaser of a fictitious name, or a trade-name, or a trade-mark, courts will enjoin the continued violation of such an agreement." Citing Grow v. Seligman, 47 Mich. 607, 11 N. W. Rep. 404; Beal v. Chase, 31 Mich. 490; Burckhardt v. Burckhardt, 36 Ohio St. 261; Tode v. Gross, (N. Y. App.) 28 N. E. Rep. 469. But the court further stated that such a stipulation need not have been made in the act of sale, because "an assignment of all the stock, property, and effects of a business * * * carries with it the exclusive right to use a fictitious name in which such business is carried on, and such trade-names and trade-marks as have been in use in such business. These incidents attach to the business * * * and pass with it. Courts have frequently held that a trade-mark has no separate existence; that there is no property in words, as detached from the thing to which they are applied; and that the conveyance of the thing to which it is attached carries with it the name." Citing Derringer v. Plate, 29 Cal. 292; Gage v. Publishing Co., 11 Ont. App. 402; Hoxie v. Chaney, 143 Mass. 592, 10 N. E. Rep. 713. In this last case it is stated that a bill of sale conveying "all the right, title, and interest in and to all and singular the partnership property belonging to the firm" was held to convey the company's trade-marks for the manufacture of certain soaps pursuant to the formulas of Hoxie, though not mentioned, but not to convey the good-will preventing Hoxie from manufacturing soaps otherwise than by such formulas. Bassett v. Percival, 5 Allen, 345; Cottrell v. Manufacturing Co., 54 Conn. 122, 6 Atl. Rep. 791. The same proposition is stated more clearly in Cement Co. v. Le Page, 147 Mass. 206, 17 N. E. Rep. 304, the court holding that it was legitimate for one to sell "the use of his name as a trade-mark," i. e., "as a description or designation of a manufactured article, so as to deprive himself of the right to use it as such, and confer the right upon another." Thus: "One who has carried on a business under a trade-mark name, and sold a particular article in such a manner, by the use of his name as a trade-mark or a trade-name, as to cause the business or article to become known or established in favor under such name, may sell or assign such trade-name or trade-mark when he sells the business or manufacture, and by such sale or assignment conclude himself from the use of it in a similar way." McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 245; Shaver v. Shaver, 54 Iowa, 208, 6 N. W. Rep. 188; Frazier v. Lubricator Co., (Ill. Sup.) 13 N. E. Rep. 639. Many of these cases are brought forward in the Williams Case, and, after recapitulating these different propositions, the court say: "These propositions are sustained by a long line of authorities, but in none of those cases does the question hinge upon a grant of good-will. Complainants insist, however, that a grant of good-will * * * imposes certain restrictions upon the vendors, and inter alios is the use that may be made of their own names;" but the court examined that question fully, and placed the proper limitation upon that contention by stating that its sole effect was to prevent the vendor's subsequent employment of his name so as to impair the good-will he had conveyed to the vendee. The court in the Williams Case then furnishes the following appropriate illustration of the rule, viz.: "A partnership name may become impersonal after the death of the partners, and it is then likened to a fictitious or corporate name. A surname may become impersonal when it is attached to an article of manufacture, and becomes the name by which such article is known in the market, and the right to use the name may, in consequence, follow a grant of the right to manufacture the article, or a sale of the business of manufacturing such article; and, when the right to manufacture is exclusive, the right to the use of the name, as applied to that article, becomes likewise exclusive." This is followed by this conclusive statement, viz.: "The rule that upon the dissolution of a firm neither party has the right to use the firm name, as well as the other rule, that a retiring partner has no right to use the old name, are both subject to the exception that a person has the right to use his own name unless he has expressly contracted otherwise. * * * The right to continue the use of a firm name, as well as a restriction upon the use by a retiring partner of his own name, are proper subjects of bargain, sale, and agreement." Hence the defendants, as retiring partners, without any restrictions having been placed upon them in the act of sale of their interest in the copartnership business, were recognized to "have the right to use their own names, or any collocation of their own names."

We cannot better illustrate the principle that is involved in the foregoing decisions than by citing the case of Meneely v. Meneely, 62 N. Y. 431, wherein an injunction restrained the defendant from in any way using the name and designation of "'Meneely' in the business of bell-founding in the city of Troy. The name of the defendant is Meneely, and he is engaged in the business mentioned. The necessary consequence of the injunction was to compel the defendant, Meneely, either to discontinue the business of bell-founding in Troy, or procure it to be done in the name of some other person. He was absolutely prohibited from the use of his own name in his own business, in any way." But the court ruled that "every man has the absolute right to his own name in his own business, even though he may interfere with or injure the business of another bearing the same name, providing he does not resort to any artifice or contrivance for the purpose of producing the impression that the establishments are identical, or do any thing calculated to mislead." Thus the right of one to the free and unrestricted use of his own name in a business enterprise is so strong that his right is not impaired, even if it operate an infringement of a trade-mark, so that no artifice be resorted to for the purpose of deceiving the public, notwithstanding the "owner's right of property in it is as complete as that which he possesses in the goods to which he attaches it." Derringer v. Plate, 29 Cal. 293; Sohier v. Johnson, 111 Mass. 238; Holmes v. Manufacturing Co., 37 Conn. 278. In Browne's Law of Trade-Marks, (2d Ed.) in the course of his treatment of good-will, he says: "Courts of equity will protect a party in the use of a name of an inn, hotel, or other place of business, when the sign is simulated. * * * If a man creates a reputation for his business, it is as the keeper of some particular house at a known location, and it is piracy to draw off the custom of his friends or customers who have identified him with the name of his house. It is a personal right. By giving a particular name to a building, as a sign of the hotel business, a tenant does not thereby make the name a fixture to the building, and the property of the landlord upon the expiration of the lease." Sections 528, 529. Clearly, such name or appellation of an hotel is not an incident of good-will, as good-will exclusively appertains to a given and designated locality and becomes a fixture of the leased premises, and, at the expiration of the lease, it passes to the landlord. This is conclusively shown by the author's subsequent observations, viz.: "One may consent to the employment of his name as that of a place of refreshment; but if such consent be purely gratuitous, or unless there is some valid agreement, binding upon the party who gives his consent, he may withdraw it at pleasure, and enjoin its further use." But the argument in favor of such a withdrawal of a business name is strengthened by the fact that the author only had in contemplation trade-names, or fictitious names, such as St. Charles, St. James, and Hotel Royal, which any one is free to use; for such a name might pass with a sale of the hotel business, and be changed at the caprice of the purchaser. This distinction makes it clear that the employment of one's own name to designate his place of business cannot be considered as an element of good-will; for, if so, following the principles just announced, it would necessarily result in its loss to the person possessing it, as at the termination of the business it would pass to the proprietor of the leased premises. Having conveyed it to a successor,—and we have ascertained that the disposition of good-will is matter of contract,—he could not thereafter come in competition with his vendee without violating his obligation of warranty. Therefore we conclude, with Mr. Browne, that while the employment of one's own name to designate his place of business may be transferred in like manner as good-will, yet if it be done by a purely gratuitous contract—in the absence of any valid and enforceable agreement for a consideration—he may withdraw it at pleasure. The conclusion is that such an employment of his own name in business forms no part of the good-will, but, on the contrary, it partakes of characteristics of a trade-mark, and may be classed as a quasi trade-mark, of which Mr. Browne says: "It should be borne in mind that a trade-mark carries the idea of a man's personality, like his ordinary autograph, and therefore preserves its essential characteristics, wherever it may go. This is not so with quasi trade-marks, as the name of an hotel or shop of trade." Id. § 90. The distinction between trade-names and trade-marks is stated as follows, viz.: "A trade-mark owes its existence to the fact that it is actually affixed to a vendible commodity, [sections 52, 382, 384,] whereas a trade name is more properly allied to the good-will of the business, [section 91.]" In Woodward v. Lazar, 21 Cal. 449, defendants were restrained from using the name "What Cheer House" as the name of an hotel in the city of San Francisco. Woodward, plaintiff, first erected an hotel building on a leased premises, and gave it that name. During his occupancy as tenant he purchased and built on the adjoining lot another hotel edifice, and occupied it also. Afterwards he surrendered the leased premises, and occupied the second, and continued to conduct an hotel business on his own premises under the name and style of "What Cheer House." Subsequently the defendants purchased the premises first described, and conducted thereon an hotel under the original name, "What Cheer House." In that case the contention of the plaintiff in injunction was that the name belonged to him as the proprietor of the hotel last established, and which he both owned and occupied, and which he had theretofore used continuously while proprietor of the hotel he had leased, and up to the date of its surrender, it being a trade-name. On the other hand, the contention of the defendant was that the name was a mere designation of the building in which the business, as first established, was conducted, and that it attached to the building at the termination of the plaintiff's lease, and passed to him by his purchase thereof from the plaintiff's lessor, it constituting a part of the good-will of said property and establishment.

Denying the latter proposition, the court said: "A person may have a right, interest, or property in a particular name which he has given to a particular house, and for which house, under the name given to it, a reputation and good-will may have been acquired; but a tenant, by giving a particular name to a building which he applies to some particular use, as a sign to the business done at that place, does not thereby make the name a fixture to the building and transfer it irrevocably to the landlord." Thus a clear distinction was taken by the California court between the reputation a name or appellation gives to a certain business locality, and which adheres to it, without any reference to the proprietor of the establishment personally, and the designation of a name for a locality at which a certain business is carried on, and which is not impersonal, and does not attach to the property, but remains subject to the control of the proprietor. The court, in treating of this distinction, said: "Defendant's claim to protection, so far as his right results from the good-will acquired for the name while it was applied exclusively to the leased premises, may not be maintainable, [yet plaintiff] is entitled to protection in the exclusive use of the name as proprietor of the new house." Had the name of that establishment formed an element of the good-will of the hotel business while it was being conducted on the leased premises by the plaintiff, it would, under all of the authorities, have passed to the landlord at the termination of plaintiff's lease, and by his conveyance to the defendant; but, as it was rather a personal perquisite of the proprietor while lessee, and not an impersonal ingredient of his business, it did not pass to the landlord, but remained subject to the control of the lessee at the termination of the lease.

Our conclusion is that on reason and authority the case is with the plaintiff; that the name given to a building in which an hotel is kept, which contains the name of the proprietor, does not constitute an element of good-will, though it may tend to enhance the business reputation of the place or situs of the business establishment, which is an ingredient of good-will; that while, under the authorities, such a name is a marketable article, and a proper subject of sale, yet it must be expressly understood in the act of sale, and, if no consideration be paid, same may be subsequently recalled. Such transactions, being esteemed to be in restraint of trade, are disfavored in commercial dealings. In this case there is some proof of injury sustained by the plaintiff on account of the defendant's improper use of his name; yet we are disinclined to rest a judgment upon it, because we are satisfied the defendant acted fairly and honestly, and under a mistaken belief that he had acquired a right to employ the plaintiff's name as he did. But we are clearly of the opinion that plaintiff's injunction should be maintained and perpetuated. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled and reversed; and it is further ordered and decreed that there be judgment in plaintiff's favor, and against the defendant, perpetually enjoining and restraining the latter from using or employing the name "Hotel Vonderbank" or "Vonderbank Hotel" as the name or style of an hotel or restaurant, at the former site of such establishment as that kept and operated by the plaintiff. It is further ordered and decreed that plaintiff's demands for damages be rejected in toto, and the defendant be taxed with the costs of both courts.

BREAUX, J., having a personal interest in the question, recuses himself.

CRIMINAL LAW — IMPEACHING STATE'S WITNESS — EVIDENCE IN REBUTTAL.

State may offer evidence of the good reputation for truthfulness of its own witness, in case his veracity is attacked by defendant's counsel in course of his cross-interrogation.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of St. Landry; E. T. LEWIS, Judge.

Prosecution of Joseph Z. Fruge for larceny. Defendant was convicted, and appeals. Affirmed.

Thos. H. Lewis, L. Dupre, and E. P. Veazie, for appellant. W. H. Rogers, Atty. Gen., for the State.

WATKINS, J. From a conviction of grand larceny, and sentence to six months' imprisonment at hard labor, the defendant appeals. In this court he has made no appearance by counsel, or otherwise, and we find in the transcript but one bill of exceptions which requires notice, and it appertains to the ruling of the judge below, permitting the state to introduce proof confirmatory of the reputation for truthfulness of the single witness offered by and relied upon by the state to establish the guilt of the accused; defendant's objection being that the veracity of a witness offered cannot be supported and strengthened by proof of good reputation for truthfulness until his veracity has been assailed.

Conceding the correctness of the rule invoked, the trial judge held that this case was an exceptional one in this, that while the single witness for the state was under cross-examination by defendant's counsel, an effort was made to impair, if not destroy, the witness' credibility by interrogating him with reference to his having been theretofore prosecuted for a similar offense, and admitted the testimony over objection. In so doing, we are of opinion that the ruling was correct, and the testimony properly admitted, because the case for the state might otherwise have been left in a crippled condition at its submission, without a further opportunity to repair it. This ruling is strictly in keeping with that we approved of in State v. Boyd, 38 La. Ann. 374, and it was based on 1 Greenl. Ev. § 469. Judgment affirmed.

ADAMS, President of Police Jury, et al., v. FORSYTHE et al., Enumerators. (No. 10,871.)

CREATING NEW PARISH—CONSTITUTIONALITY OF ACT.

Act 107 of 1890, purporting to create a new parish called "Troy," is illegal and unconstitutional, because it increases representation in the house of representatives beyond the maximum number fixed in the sixteenth article of the constitution.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Catahoula; CAREY J. ELLIS, Judge.

Suit by Isaac R. Adams, president of the police jury of the parish of Catahoula, and others, against A. A. Forsythe and E. S. Robertson, enumerators, to declare illegal and unconstitutional Act 107 of 1890, creating the new parish of Troy, and for an injunction. Decree for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

F. P. Poche, J. F. Ellis, H. B. Tallaferro, and D. N. Thompson, for appellants. Luce & Lemle, for appellees.

WATKINS, J. Suit was commenced on August 13, 1890, by the police jury of Catahoula parish, duly authorized by ordinance, joined by sundry tax-payers thereof, alleging the illegality and unconstitutionality of Act 107 of 1890, creating the new parish of Troy, and providing for the organization thereof; averring that said act provides for an enumeration of the inhabitants of said parish,—that portion of which the new parish is to be formed, and that portion, also, that will remain after its formation, — in order to ascertain whether there is the constitutional number in each, and designates three persons, who are specially authorized to make said enumeration, and return to the secretary of state the result thereof; and further averring the refusal and declination of one of said enumerators to act in the premises, and the apprehended illegality and nullity of any action that might be taken by the two remaining. Petitioners prayed for and obtained an injunction restraining further proceedings by them, pendente lite. On rule taken by the defendants, in limine, the lower judge quashed the writ, on the ground that it had been prematurely and improvidently granted, and from that interlocutory decree the plaintiffs appealed suspensively. On the trial of the merits, there was judgment in plaintiffs' favor, and the defendants likewise appealed. Therefore the case is practically consolidated,—the two appeals being presented under a single number and title,—and stands before us precisely in the same attitude it occupied originally in the court a qua.

The defendants prefaced their answer with several exceptions, the chief of which are (1) that the plaintiffs are without capacity or interest to stand in judgment; (2) that the subject-matter of this suit lies outside of the domain of judicial power; (3) the defendants are incompetent to stand in judgment for the determination of the constitutionality of the act; but, as it is apparent that these questions were decided and definitely settled in litigation, to which the defendants were parties, and settled adversely to present contention, there need be no further mention made of them. State v. Judge, 42 La. Ann. 1104, 8 South. Rep. 305. The same may be said of the prematurity and improvidence of the injunction, for, while not deciding the question, the logic and purport of our opinion in that case are conclusively against the ruling of the judge a qua; for it proceeds upon the theory that the enumeration contemplated by the statute was the first and fundamental step to be taken in the formation of the new parish, and a condition precedent to its consummation. Had plaintiffs awaited the completion of the enumeration and return made to the secretary of state, an injunction would have been, manifestly, too late. It is our opinion that the injunction was timely and provident, and quashing it was error. It is therefore plain that the injunction should be reinstated at appellees' costs in both courts, without reference to our decision on the merits.

There are several grounds assigned by petitioners for the unconstitutionality of the legislative act creating the new parish of Troy, but we deem it only necessary to take notice of one, and that is the fifth, which is as follows, viz.: That the act is in violation of, and in conflict with, the provisions of article 16 of the constitution in this: that said article fixes the total number of representatives in the general assembly at "not more than ninety-eight (98) nor less than seventy (70;)" and said act provides that the new parish of Troy shall have one representative, thus increasing the total number to 99, in excess of that limitation. There is, in our opinion, no escape from the conclusion that the act is unconstitutional on that ground. It appears from the terms of the act that the territory of which the new parish is proposed to be formed is to be taken from the existing parish of Catahoula, exclusively; and as it has but one representative, under the constitutional apportionment of 1880, by the formation of a new parish from part of its territory, which is entitled to one representative, also, the necessary result is to increase the total number of representatives by one, thus giving to the next general assembly 99 instead of 98 members, in violation of the constitution. The language of the constitution is imperative: "Each parish shall have at least one representative." "The number of representatives shall not be more than ninety-eight nor less than seventy." Article 16. In article 17 all the parishes of the state are designated by name, and to each is apportioned the representation in the general assembly; the total number aggregating 98, the maximum that is allowed by the preceding article. Hence, if the new parish of Troy is given one representative, the number will be increased to 99, thus violating one of those constitutional requirements; and if the new parish be disallowed representation altogether, the other will be violated. For it would not do for us to say that a new parish could be formed by an act of the legislature without a representative being provided for, in the face of the constitutional declaration that it shall have one. A further provision of article 17 is that "this apportionment," i. e., the apportionment that is made in that article, "shall not be changed or altered in any manner until after the enumeration shall have been taken by the state in 1890, in accordance with the provisions of articles 16 and 17." Looking to article 16 to ascertain the manner in which an enumeration is to be made, we find the declaration that it "shall be made in 1890, and subsequent enumerations every tenth year thereafter, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law," etc.

Now it is an admitted fact that an enumeration was made in the year 1890, in the manner required, but that no apportionment of representation was made by the general assembly; it is therefore clear that, until some future general assembly shall make an apportionment different from that designated in article 17, it must remain in force. But article 16 further declares that, "at its first session after each enumeration, the general assembly shall apportion the representation among the several parishes," etc., thus clearly indicating, in the most emphatic language, the duty of the general assembly to take prompt and immediate action in making an apportionment. We need not say that this precept is mandatory, and that an apportionment could not be legally made at a subsequent session of the general assembly; it is quite sufficient for us to say that the general assembly was fully authorized, and at least directed, to make an apportionment at its first session after the completion of an enumeration, and failed to do it. The consequence is that the general assembly of 1892-94 will remain just as that of 1888-90 was composed; and, if the plaintiffs' case fails, and the act creating the new parish of Troy is held to be constitutional, his representative cannot be permitted to take his seat in the house of representatives at the next session of the general assembly without violating the plain and unambiguous terms of the sixteenth article of the constitution, as he would evidently be the ninety-ninth representative. It appears, to our minds, self-evident that the legislature is powerless to increase the representation fixed in the constitution, and equally as much so to create a new parish which would be entitled to representation, but whose representative could not take any part in legislative proceedings as such. Under the express terms of the sixteenth article of the constitution declaring that "the number of representatives shall not be more than ninety-eight," etc., it would seem to be impossible for the legislature to increase that number, and to be clear that the only way in which new parishes, such as Troy, can be created, is by reducing the total number of representatives under a new apportionment, and thus leave a margin for their formation. But those are contingencies that must be provided for in the future, and the instant case must be determined by the state of facts existing at the time the law under consideration was enacted. For if it was at the time of its passage an unconstitutional law, circumstances subsequently arising could not rehabilitate it, and make it constitutional. A parish created without representation would be an anomaly. The constitution declares that "representation in the house of representatives shall be equal and uniform, and shall be regulated and ascertained by the total population." Article 16. The new parish of Troy would be quite as much entitled to share in the representation as any other parish in the state, quite as much as the parish of Catahoula. It is quite as impossible to conceive of a parish without representation as of one without the pale of any judiciary system. A parish is a complete political entity, possessed of judicial, political, and ministerial functions; and no act of the legislature creating a new parish can receive sanction, as constitutional, which does not guaranty the right of representation. The guaranty of the act in question is nugatory, because it is repugnant to the constitution. That guaranty being read out of the act, the new parish would be emasculated of all political power, the existence of which is essential to its existence. The act in question is null and void. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the interlocutory decree quashing plaintiffs' injunction be annulled, and that said injunction be reinstated, at defendants' cost in both courts; and it is further ordered that the judgment pronounced upon the merits be affirmed.

HYMAN et al. v. SCHLENKER et al. (No. 10,869.)

SCHLENKER v. ROBB, Sheriff, et al. (No. 10,869.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Feb. 8, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE — DATION EN PAIEMENT — CHANGE OF DOMICILE — PROPERTY RIGHTS.

1. A dation en paiement between husband and wife can only be made by authentic act, and, when the consideration is explicitly stated in the act, the parties are bound thereby, and cannot make proof of other and additional consideration, unless upon allegation and clear proof of error in the confection of the act by the notary.

2. The same tests are applied in establishing change of domicile from this to another state as from one parish to another. These tests are (1) actual residence in the new place; (2) the intention to fix there the principal establishment. These tests, applied to the facts, establish Schlenker's domicile at Natchez, Miss., since 1888.

3. Marriage creates a civil status, which is governed and controlled by the law of the domicile of the parties.

4. The statutes regulating the privileges and disabilities attaching to the status of married women are purely domiciliary in their character, and, unless otherwise expressly declared, do not affect married women domiciled in another state.

5. Personal property has no locality, and, as to the rights of husband and wife therein, is governed by the law of their domicile. Moneys of the wife domiciled in Mississippi, though received in Louisiana, belong to her as a citizen of Mississippi, and do not acquire the character or incidents of paraphernal funds under Louisiana law. If converted by her husband, she has no mortgage on his property in this state for their restitution, nor can she receive from him a dation en paiement to the prejudice of attaching creditors, citizens of this state.

6. The returning to the domicile where her marriage was contracted, which authorizes a non-resident wife to sue her husband for separation of property under article 2437, Civil Code, means a return for the purpose of living there under the protection of its laws.

7. In such action, in any case, the relief would only extend to the rights of the parties as they stood at the date of return.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Catahoula; CAREY J. ELLIS, Judge.

Attachment suit by Hyman, Lichtenstein & Co. against Schlenker & Hirsch. Mrs. C. Schlenker, the wife of defendant Schlenker, claimed the property attached. Judgment for intervener. Plaintiffs appeal. Modified.

J. N. Luce, Gus Lemle, D. N. Thompson, and Farrar, Jonas & Kruttschnitt, for appellants. Percy Roberts and J. L. Dagg, for appellee.

FENNER, J. This appeal presents for our determination a contest between the attaching creditors of a non-resident debtor and the non-resident wife of the debtor, who claims the property attached by virtue of a dation en paiement made to her by her husband while they were both non-residents of Louisiana, and domiciled in the state of Mississippi. The dominant facts are the following: Isaac Schlenker and his wife, Mrs. C. Schlenker, were married at their domicile in Trinity, La., in 1859. Between the years 1866 and 1874, while they were still domiciled in Louisiana, Mrs. Schlenker claims to have received from her uncle and from her mother certain paraphernal gifts of money and goods, amounting to about $7,600, which her husband took possession of, and converted to his own use. In 1878 her husband executed a dation en paiement in her favor, by which he conveyed to her various pieces of landed property, including (1) a tract of land known as the "Elba" or "Zenor" tract; and (2) sundry lots and buildings situated in the towns of Troyville and Trinity. The attaching creditors attack the consideration of this dation, and, if proof thereof were required, that found in the record is certainly not as conclusive as it should be; but we think the creditors, having become such long after the dation, have no right to attack it. Lewis v. Peterkin, 39 La. Ann. 780, 2 South. Rep. 577. Subsequently Mrs. Schlenker alienated several of these properties, and the sums are claimed to have been appropriated by her husband to the payment of his debts. These alienations were as follows, viz.: (1) In June, 1878, she conveyed the Zenor tract for the price of $3,500. (2) In March, 1881, she conveyed the Cates or Rawlings lots in Troyville, on which the price actually realized was $350. (3) In 1888 she sold a store-house and lots in Troyville, and a residence and lots in Trinity, for $2,500. She also claims to have sold another lot in Trinity to McCabe for $100, but the deed is not produced. In December, 1890, Isaac Schlenker made a second dation en paiement to his wife, from which we make the following extract: "Before me, J. F. Ellis, a notary public in and for Catahoula parish, Louisiana, personally appeared Isaac Schlenker, who declared to me, notary, that he is justly and legally indebted to his wife, Mrs. Charlotte Schlenker, in the sum of seven thousand two hundred and fifty dollars. * * * The said above amount of money being the proceeds of sale of one store-house and lots in Jonesville, (or Troyville,) Louisiana, the Cates or Rawlings house and lots in Jonesville, Louisiana, and dwelling-house and lots in Trinity, La. * * *" It thus appears that the only paraphernal debts expressed in the act as intended to be extinguished are those arising from the appropriation by the husband of "the proceeds of sale" of the particular pieces of paraphernal property therein mentioned. As we have seen, these "proceeds of sale," according to the wife's own showing, did not exceed the sum of $2,950, while the dation conveyed to the wife property estimated in the act itself at $6,560, and claimed by the creditors to be worth much more.

On the trial of the case counsel for the wife undertook to eke out the consideration by parol proof that the dation was intended to satisfy other paraphernal claims of the wife besides those expressed in the deed, including the sum of $3,500, received as the price of the Zenor plantation, $1,100 collected as rents of paraphernal property, and a balance due on the original claim, unsatisfied by the first dation, of $621.93. To such evidence objection was made on the following grounds, viz.: "Parol evidence cannot be admitted against or beyond what is contained in the alleged dation en paiement of intervener's husband to her; nor as to what may have been said or done before, at the time of, or since making said act; nor to vary, contradict, explain, or modify the written terms, considerations, or recitals of said act; nor to show source or origin of the consideration different from that expressed in the instrument; that such evidence, if otherwise admissible, could not be introduced by intervener, who has claimed under such act; that it is not admissible under the pleadings, there being no averments of such fact, and cannot be introduced to affect plaintiffs, who are third persons, and can only be bound by the record." The judge overruled these objections, and admitted and gave effect to the evidence.

In this we are bound to hold that the judge was in error. A dation en paiement by a husband to his wife cannot be made otherwise than by authentic act. The extraordinary and highly exceptional effects given by the law to this contract, exempting it from the revocatory action, and maintaining it as a preference over creditors, though made while the husband was insolvent, emphasize the necessity of holding the parties bound by the recitals contained in the act, and not permitting them to enlarge or extend its provisions by parol proof. The creditors, when they took out their attachment, had no notice of, and were not affected by, any dation between the debtor and his wife, except that evidenced by the authentic act extant upon the records of the parish, and could not be bound by any agreements or understandings between the parties not embodied in that act. Moreover, the wife herself, in her intervention, propounded that act as her title, and made no allegation of any error therein. The act specifically recites, as the only paraphernal claims satisfied by the dation, the moneys due by the husband for the price of the particular properties therein stated. To hold that other and different paraphernal claims entered into the consideration, and were satisfied by the dation, on mere parol proof, would be, to that extent, to give effect to a dation by parol. Even if proof of error were admissible, the proof found in this record is insufficient to establish it.

We dislike to speak with confidence touching the contents of this enormous transcript, which we have been left to eviscerate, with hardly any references to pages by the counsel; but, if there is any other evidence as to this error except the statement of Mrs. Schlenker herself, it has failed to attract our attention. She says that the intention of Mr. Schlenker and herself was to have the sale made in satisfaction of all her paraphernal claims, and, on the subject of the deed, she says: "I do not know if the deed properly recites the consideration, not having the same before me; but, if it does not, there must have been some error in drawing it up." Of course, we have nothing from the husband on the subject, because he was incompetent to testify. There is nothing to show that the notary who drew the act did not conform to the instructions given him, or that the parties who signed it did not read and know its contents, nor is any reason given why the alleged error escaped attention. Surely it would be a dangerous precedent to allow the recitals of such an act to be varied by the unsupported declarations of error by a single party thereto. As the deed stood, undoubtedly the paraphernal claims, outside of those mentioned therein, remained unaffected by the dation, and in after years might have formed a consideration for a third dation, when the interest of the parties required it; in which case the statement of the wife as to her intentions might have not been accessible.

We consider the case fully covered by a former decision, where, the dation having been made in satisfaction of a particular named paraphernal claim, which the court found to be invalid, the parties sought to sustain it by proof of other valid paraphernal claims, but we held them bound by the consideration stated in the deed. Chaffe v. Scheen, 34 La. Ann. 688.

Having thus defined the meaning and extent of the act as embracing for its consideration only the paraphernal claims therein recited, we will next consider the important questions arising from the domicile of the parties. The attaching creditors are citizens and residents of Louisiana. It is conceded that at the date of the dation Mr. and Mrs. Schlenker were domiciled in the state of Mississippi. It is claimed, however, on behalf of the wife, that the Mississippi domicile was only acquired in 1889, after the transactions here involved took place, and that prior thereto their domicile continued to be in Louisiana. No doubt the presumption of law is in favor of the continuance of a domicile once established, and that the party who asserts that it has been changed carries the burden of proof. The evidence of Mrs. Schlenker herself, which is candid and unequivocal, establishes that in 1882 her husband, with his family and the whole of his household effects, removed from their former domicile in Trinity, La., to New Orleans, La., discontinuing the mercantile business which he had theretofore conducted in Trinity, and establishing his residence in New Orleans, where he kept house for a year. In 1883 Schlenker moved with his family to Natchez, Miss., carrying all his household effects, established his residence there, went into mercantile business there, has resided and kept house and transacted business there ever since, and has had no other residence. He has reared his children and married two of them in Natchez. There has been his home. It was not only his principal, but his only, domestic establishment. It appears that in 1881 or 1882 he commenced a mercantile business in Troyville, La., and that he was in the habit of frequently visiting that place to look after his affairs; but he never had a domicile in Troyville, and kept no establishment there of any kind. His former residence in Trinity, La., was at first rented, and subsequently sold. There is proof that he voted at least once in Louisiana, while living in Natchez, and also that he was accepted as a surety on the bond of the sheriff of Catahoula parish. His wife and partner state that he continued to consider Catahoula parish as his home, but there is no evidence that he ever entertained the intention of returning or resuming his residence there. The law is chiefly concerned with persons as the subjects of obligations, and with the view of giving efficacy to their actions. One of its first tasks is to locate each person,—to fix a place at which the person shall be considered as always present, actually or constructively, and where the law can reach him when it has occasion to deal with him; in other words, to establish his domicile. The provisions of our Code on the subject are clear and direct. "Art. 38. The domicile of each citizen is in the parish wherein he has his principal establishment. The principal establishment is that in which he makes his habitual residence." "Art. 41. A change of domicile from one parish to another is produced by the act of residing in another parish, combined with the intention of making one's principal establishment there." "Art. 46. Domicile once acquired shall not be forfeited by absence on business, but a voluntary absence of two years from the state, or the acquisition of residence in any other state of this Union, or elsewhere, shall forfeit a domicile within this state." Applying these provisions of law to the facts of this case, we cannot doubt that, from the date of removal in 1883, Natchez, Miss., has been the legal domicile of Schlenker and his wife. Under a literal construction of the words of article 46, that "the acquisition of a residence in any other state of this Union shall forfeit a domicile within this state," the case would be too clear for discussion, since no one could doubt that Schlenker acquired a residence in Natchez. But we think the article should not be so strictly construed, and that the legislature meant the acquisition of such a residence as is mentioned in the prior article, (41,) i. e., one which combines "the act of residing" with "the intention of making one's principal establishment there." In other words, article 46 subjects the change of domicile from this state to another to the same tests which article 41 applies to change of domicile from one parish to another.

These tests require two elements, viz.: (1) Actual residence in the new place; (2) the intention to fix there his principal establishment. The French law applies the same tests. Code Nap. art. 103. Says Laurent: "The principle that a mere transient cause, which has induced a person to establish a temporary residence elsewhere, does not give him a new domicile, must not be extended so far as to hold that one who establishes himself in a new place, with the intention of returning to the old, preserves, by that fact alone, his former domicile. It is the nature of the establishment that decides the question. It must be the principal establishment in order to fix a new domicile. But if it be the principal establishment, that operates the translation of domicile, even though there be an intention of returning." 2 Laurent, No. 79; 1 Mourlon, Nos. 325, 326, 327. The French Code does not define the words "principal establishment." Our Code expressly declares: "The principal establishment is that in which he makes his habitual residence." Said this court: "The law which fixes the domicile of each citizen at the place where his principal establishment is situated means the principal domestic establishment." Succession of Franklin, 7 La. Ann. 400. Again: "It is there he sleeps, takes his meals, has established his household, and surrounded himself with his family and the comforts of domestic life. His dwelling-house there is emphatically his permanent home." Hill v. Spangenberg, 4 La. Ann. 554.

The evidence in this case, as we have stated it, establishes beyond a doubt that Schlenker fixed, and intended to fix, his principal establishment, his habitual residence, his home, in Natchez; not for any transient purpose of health or convenience, but in permanence, as indicated by his entering commercial business there, and by his whole conduct. He had, in fact, already abandoned his domicile in Catahoula parish when he removed to New Orleans with his family and household effects, and established himself there. There is no pretense that he ever intended to return to New Orleans, his last domicile in this state. There is none really that he intended to return to Catahoula; but, if he did, he would have had to establish a new domicile there, which could not be done without an actual residence. This is not a case like Steele's Case, where the party preserved two establishments, and where the purposes for which he placed his family in Natchez were clearly shown, and the intention to preserve his domicile at the establishment which he kept in Tensas parish is fully proved. We then said: "We do not wish to be understood as saying that, in order to have a domicile at a particular place, it is unnecessary there to have a residence, actual or constructive, with a representative living therein, at which and on whom, in case of absence therefrom, legal process can be served. However that may be, it is established that the defendant had such a residence in the parish of Tensas, at which service could have been legally made." State v. Steele, 33 La. Ann. 912.

The rules which govern the change of domicile from this state to another are the same which apply to such a change from one parish to another, and we think no one could doubt that, if Schlenker had established a home in another parish similar to that adopted in Natchez, it would be held to establish a new domicile. It thus appears that at the time when the dation was made, and also at the time when he received and converted to his use much the larger portion of the personal funds of his wife, which form the consideration thereof, both husband and wife were residents and citizens of the state of Mississippi, and not of the state of Louisiana; and the question is whether such a dation, made on such a consideration, is protected by the law of Louisiana, especially when conflicting with the rights of resident creditors. Marriage creates a civil status. Each state attaches to this status such privileges and disabilities as it deems wise and proper; but these laws are purely domiciliary in their operation, and apply only, as a general rule, and when not otherwise expressly provided, to citizens of the state, or to acts done while they are citizens. When married persons remove to a different state, their married status is governed and controlled by the laws of the new domicile. The law of Louisiana attributes to the status of marriage certain peculiar privileges and restraints,—it establishes a community of acquests and gains between the spouses; it gives to the separate property of the wife the character of dotal or paraphernal property; it protects such property from depredation by the husband, by giving the wife a mortgage and privilege on all the property of the husband for the restitution of her dotal effects converted by him, and a mortgage for the restitution of the paraphernal effects so converted; it authorizes the wife, in certain cases, to bring suit against her husband for a separation of property, wherein she may not only obtain a dissolution of the community, and a protection of her future separate earnings, but may recover judgment for her paraphernal or dotal funds appropriated by him, which may be executed against all his property; and it authorizes the wife, with or without such judgment, to receive from the husband a dation en paiement in satisfaction of her paraphernal or dotal rights, which is valid against creditors even though, when made, the husband was utterly insolvent. There is no greater reason why this exceptional privilege of dation should be enforced in favor of non-resident married women than there is to recognize their rights of mortgage and privilege, which are not more exceptional. Yet, in dealing with the question whether there existed a legal mortgage for paraphernal funds on the husband's property in this state, this court, after quoting the provisions of law, said: "These, and other provisions of the Code on the same subject, clearly apply only to persons residing in the state. They repel the idea that the law-giver ever intended to extend the same extreme favor to non-residents, wives, and minors, whose rights would ever remain a mystery to our citizens. The removal of opponent, with her husband, into this state, placed her under the protection of our law for the future. It entitles her to a tacit mortgage for all moneys her husband may have received since for her account; but to extend back this mortgage so as to recover funds received by the insolvent in 1822, when he resided in Campeche, would be to declare at once that a tacit mortgage exists, even though the husband, the wife, the tutor, or the ward never were in Louisiana. Such a mortgage we cannot recognize, nor do we believe it was ever contemplated by our laws." Prats v. Creditors, 2 Rob. (La.) 501. In considering the same question in a subsequent case, the court said: "But every law must be construed, not only with reference to the policy which dictated it, but in connection with similar legislation on the same subject. In imposing such incumbrances upon real estate as that which necessarily results from legal and tacit mortgages, the legislature evidently contemplated the protection of a class of persons who were unable to protect themselves, and whom they were therefore bound to protect. For this reason they have subjected the rights of their own citizens to incumbrances which, though of doubtful policy, it cannot be supposed were intended to operate in favor of those whom it was no part of their duty to protect. It is the duty of the state to protect its own widows and orphans, and those of its own people who are laboring under legal incapacities." Continuing, the court said: "But, from a review of the various articles of the Code on the subject of legal mortgages, it appears to us they point conclusively, not only to the supposed residence in the state of the party whose property is sought to be subjected to their operation, but to the security of a debt originating in the state. The whole tenor of our legislation on this subject appears to us to repel the idea that it was in contemplation of the legislature to extend the operation of our system of mortgages to cases where the debt itself originated out of the state, at a time when the debtor was also a non-resident." Stewart v. Creditors, 12 La. Ann. 89. Moreover, the right of the wife to enter into such a contract with her husband as this dation is confined to the case where it is made for the restitution of her dotal or paraphernal effects alienated by him; and it cannot be said that the consideration in this case was of that character. The consideration is for personal funds of the wife, received and converted by the husband while he and his wife were residents of Mississippi. That these funds were personal property does not admit of question, and it is a well-settled rule that personal property has no locality, and is governed exclusively by the law of the owner's domicile as to its character, transfer, alienation, etc. 3 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 574, 575, and authorities cited. Mobilia ossibus inhærent et personam sequuntur. These funds, though accruing to the wife in Louisiana, were received by her as a citizen of Mississippi, and her rights thereto were governed by the law of Mississippi. They never acquired the character of paraphernality under the laws of Louisiana, and the husband's conversion of them subjected him only to the liability imposed by the law of the domicile.

It is urged, however, by the learned counsel for the wife, that these general principles are controlled by the special provisions of article 2437 of our Civil Code, which is as follows: "Whenever a marriage shall have been contracted in this state, and the husband after said marriage shall remove, or shall have removed, to a foreign country with his wife, if the husband shall have behaved towards his wife in such foreign country in such a manner as would entitle her, under our laws, to demand a separation of property, it shall be lawful for her, on returning to the domicile where her marriage was contracted, to institute a suit there against her husband, for the purpose above mentioned, in the same manner as if they were still domiciled in said place. In said case, an attorney shall be appointed by the court to represent the absent defendant, the plaintiff shall be entitled to all the remedies and conservatory remedies granted by the law to married women, and the judgment shall have force and effect in the same manner as if the parties had never left the state."

We are of the opinion that this article is inapplicable for two reasons: (1) The wife here has not returned "to the domicile where her marriage was contracted," within any reasonable intendment of the law. It is true she came to Louisiana and accepted this dation, and returned immediately to her domicile in Mississippi. The law obviously means a return to the domicile for the purpose of living there under the protection of its laws, and was intended only to dissolve the community, which articles 2399 and 2400, Civil Code, extend in favor of non-residents, and to protect her property and her future earnings from control or interference by her husband. This is rendered more clear by reference to the origin of the article. It is taken from Act No. 9 of 1855, which is as follows: "That, whenever a marriage shall have been contracted in this state, and the husband, after such marriage, shall remove, or shall have removed, to a foreign country with his said wife, and shall behave, or have behaved, towards his wife in said foreign country in such a manner as would entitle her, under our laws, to demand separation from bed and board, or a separation of property, it shall be lawful for her, on returning to the domicile where her marriage was contracted, to institute a suit there against her husband for the purposes above-mentioned, in the same manner as if they were still domiciliated in said place," etc. The compilers of the Code of 1870, in distributing these provisions to their appropriate headings, separated the provisions relating to separation from bed and board and those relating to a separation of property into two distinct articles, viz., the above article 2437 and article 142. But these articles must still be construed together, and it is apparent that the same kind of removal to the former domicile is required to support an action for separation of property as to support one for separation from bed and board, and consequent divorce. It would hardly be supposed that a married woman domiciled in Mississippi could run over into the state of Louisiana for a day, without any intention of remaining here, or resuming her residence, institute an action for a separation from bed and board leading to divorce, return instantly to her Mississippi domicile, and claim a decree in such a case that any court in christendom would grant or respect. We had occasion recently to consider the rights of a married woman in such a case, and the limitations upon her right to invoke the jurisdiction of her original matrimonial domicile. Smith v. Smith, 43 La. Ann. —, 10 South. Rep. 248. No such case was contemplated by the law, which only intended to extend its protection to women married here, whose husbands, domiciled in another country, had so mistreated them as to justify them in leaving the matrimonial domicile, and in returning to their former homes, to live under and to receive the protection of its laws.

Even if the return to the domicile were sufficient, the statute would not cover this case. It is confined to an action for separation of property, and in such action the relief could only extend to the rights of the parties as they stood at the date of the return. It could not authorize a judgment against the husband for paraphernal funds based on claims for personal property converted by him while husband and wife were both domiciled in Mississippi, and which therefore acquired no paraphernal character. It could not recognize a mortgage for such claims, nor would it support a dation in satisfaction thereof, to the prejudice of creditors. The only proper pertinency of this statute is to demonstrate that, outside of its exceptional provisions, the views we have herein expressed are correct, and that non-resident married women, though their marriage took place in this state, had not, independently of the statute, the right to bring an action for separation of property in this state, or to avail of similar relief extended by our laws in the protection of our own married women.

It is therefore adjudged and decreed that the judgment appealed from be amended by rejecting the demand of Mrs. C. Schlenker, and dismissing her intervention, and by maintaining the attachment of the plaintiffs, and recognizing their privilege on the property attached for the amount of the judgment in their favor, and that as thus amended the same be now affirmed, appellees to pay costs of appeal.

HERLISH v. LOUISVILLE, N. O. & T. R. CO.

(No. 10,729.)

RAILROAD COMPANIES—ACCIDENTS AT CROSSINGS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

On approaching a street crossing of a railway track, it is the duty of a traveler to exercise his senses of sight and hearing, and look and listen for an approaching train. His failure so to do is negligence, which, in case of collision, will prevent his recovery of damages for injuries sustained.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; ALBERT VOORHIES, Judge.

Action by Herman Herlish against the Louisville, New Orleans & Texas Railroad Company for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Farrar, Jonas & Kruttschnitt, for appellant. Henry L. Lazarus and Lionel Adams, for appellee.

WATKINS, J. This is an action in damages for serious and permanent injuries sustained by the plaintiff by reason of his having been struck by one of defendant's locomotives, through the gross and culpable fault and neglect of its servants and employes. The occurrence is alleged to have happened on the evening of the 20th of August, 1889, at the intersection of Clara and Poydras streets, in the city of New Orleans, as the plaintiff was crossing the former, the said locomotive moving westward from the company's depot at the time. Petitioner charges that, from the injuries inflicted, he suffered great pain in mind and body, and has thereby been rendered unable to perform any labor, or earn the means necessary to support himself and family, since the occurrence. He further charges that the injuries he sustained were the direct result of the gross and culpable negligence of defendant's employes in failing to observe the requirements of law,—to properly flag the crossing, to ring the bell, or to blow the whistle on the approach of the locomotive; also, in failing to have a gate, or adjustable bar, or other device, to warn pedestrians of the approach of a train, and prevent their crossing the company's track when same is approaching. He further specially charges that "the engineer was grossly and willfully negligent in driving said engine, * * * and was reckless in handling same, in utter disregard of the obligations imposed upon him, both in humanity and law." The amount demanded of the defendant, as compensation for injuries thus received by the plaintiff, is $30,000. Defendant's answer is that the plaintiff was injured by and through his own gross fault and negligence, and not by or through the fault and negligence of its servants or employes, plaintiff being a trespasser on its track at the time of the accident. The case was submitted to and tried by a jury, who rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $5,000; but upon rule taken for a new trial the court awarded the defendant a new trial, and, thereupon, the jury found for the plaintiff a verdict of $10,000. Upon this verdict, defendant failing to obtain a new trial, a judgment was accordingly entered up, and it has appealed.

Our only province, therefore, is to determine, between the parties, the question of negligence vel non, there seeming to be, from the general purport of the answer, but little doubt of the plaintiff having suffered injury, and none of the happening of the accident. And in the determination of the question of the defendant's negligence, as well as that of the plaintiff's contributory negligence vel non, the principal and much-mooted fact is that of the precise location of the plaintiff when he was overtaken by the defendant's train; the plaintiff's contention being that he was immediately on the crossing, or intersection of Clara and Poydras streets, while that of the defendant is that he was in its yard, which is situated between Magnolia and Clara streets, between the tracks numbered 4 and 5, near the north side of the yard, and a distance of about 65 feet from the crossing of Clara and Poydras streets. On this contention of the defendant it is claimed that the plaintiff was a mere trespasser, and therefore at fault, primarily, and guilty of negligence per se, because the whole of the property situated between North and South Poydras streets, adjacent to Clara street, is its private property, acquired by purchase and expropriation, it having been at one time filled with buildings, since demolished and replaced, and overlaid with its tracks and their switch connections, uniting them with its various yards and squares of ground and depots. To these are superadded others of minor importance which need no particular mention now.

From the record we glean the following salient facts, viz.: On the evening of August 20, 1889, the plaintiff started from his place of business on Front street, near the corner of Lafayette street, at 6 o'clock, or a little later, to go to his place of residence, No. 437½ Lafayette street, between Prieur and Johnson streets, west of Claiborne avenue, in the city of New Orleans; and, en route, he reached the defendant's depot, which is situated between North and South Poydras streets, at the intersection of Poydras and Howard streets. When he had arrived at this place, he found the banquettes were flooded with water from a recent heavy shower of rain, and, the waiting-rooms of the depot being closed, he passed on the outside, and under the shed which extends west from the depot to the intersection of Freret and Poydras streets, and continued his walk down the North side of the neutral ground between North and South Poydras streets, and had either reached or neared the crossing or intersection of Clara and Poydras streets, a distance of three blocks from the end of the shed. At this point the defendant had in use, on the space intervening between North and South Poydras streets, which is its private property, four parallel tracks, numbered, respectively, 1, 2, 3, and 4; and, also, another track, which extends transversely across the other four, whereby switch connections are formed by the various engines and trains of the company, with the several depot-yards adjacent to the depot. While the plaintiff was thus proceeding,—he being crippled of one foot, slightly, and the night being dark,—a switch-engine of the defendant shifted its position from the straight track No. 4 to the diagonal cut-off track, and struck him on the left side of his back, inflicting a severe blow at the base of the spine, and upon his hip, whereby he sustained serious injuries. The reason assigned by the plaintiff for his being in that situation was that he was, at the time, a sufferer from a sore heel, as above stated, and sought to escape the water on the flooded banquettes by resorting to the dry ground of defendant's location and property, over which he had just walked to the intersection of Clara street, when he was thus overtaken. To this statement both parties substantially agree.

On the disputed question—i. e., the exact point on the defendant's track at which Herlish had arrived when he was overtaken by its engine, and violently knocked down—there is a very great disparity of statement on the part of the witnesses pro et con; those of the plaintiff emphatically asserting that he was, manifestly, overtaken on the crossing, while those of the defendant are just as emphatic in asserting that the accident happened at a distance of 90 feet from the crossing, on the river side of Clara street. As a witness, plaintiff states that while he was in the act of crossing Clara street, at its intersection with Poydras street, endeavoring to pass obliquely from the north to the south side of Poydras, in order to reach a dry banquette on that side and having just reached track No. 3 on the south side, he was struck by the locomotive, and thrown about 10 feet, into the south-side roadway. By the blow received, and the accompanying fall, he was stunned and severely injured, and rendered unable to arise and walk, and he there remained until assistance arrived. That afterwards a man came running from the engine, which had passed beyond him about 25 feet, to where he lay; and this man was followed by another, whom he took to be the engineer, who approached him, and cursed him, and said he was drunk, and went off again. Another man, who was standing at the corner grocery opposite, came across, and assisted the man first named to carry him over there; and, presently, an ambulance was summoned, and he was carried to his residence.

A careful examination of all the testimony has fully satisfied us of the correctness of his statement, in the main; and it further satisfies us that the defendant's employes were neglectful of their duties, under the general principles of law, as well as under the ordiances of the municipality, in reference to keeping a flagman at the street crossing, the exhibition of a red light, etc.; and the evidence renders it exceedingly doubtful that a bell was rung, or whistle sounded. Taken all in all, however, the evidence fairly makes out a case of negligence on the part of the company. They were evidently unmindful of the rights of pedestrians, who had equal right to use this crossing, as they had to pass their trains over it. But while this is perfectly true, we are quite as thoroughly satisfied that the plaintiff was himself guilty of negligence which directly caused or contributed to the accident by which his injuries were inflicted. He fails to state any precautions taken by himself to avoid a collision with the defendant's locomotive, or that he either looked listened for its approach, although the proof is clear and uncontradicted that the locomotive head-light was burning; and that, although the night was dark and rainy, there was an electric light at the street-corner on either side. There is some statement made to the effect that there were, adjacent to the crossing, some box-cars which may have impeded the plaintiff's view, but in his testimony no reference is made to such an impediment. The rule is a fair and reasonable one which requires of travelers who resort to thoroughfares of a city, over which railroad companies possess a right of way, to exercise the greatest possible care to avoid collisions with their trains. This we take to be a settled rule of law, notwithstanding a like obligation is imposed on railroad companies. In Artz v. Railroad Co., 34 Iowa, 160,—which is a leading case, and cited by many text-writers as standard authority,—the court expressed this view, viz.: "Ordinarily the fact that the train neglected to make statutory and customary warnings does not relieve a person approaching an open crossing from the duty of lookout on approaching the road. When a person knowingly about to cross a railroad track may have an unobstructed view of the railroad, so as to know of the approach of a train a sufficient time to clearly avoid any injury from it, he cannot, as matter of law, recover, although the railroad company may have, also, been negligent, or have neglected to perform a statutory requirement." See Whart. Neg. § 384. Another author, in treating of the same subject says: "If a traveler, [at a railroad crossing of a public thoroughfare,] by looking, could have seen an approaching train in time to escape, it will be presumed, in case he is injured by the collision, either that he did not look, or, if he did look, that he did not heed what he saw. Such conduct is negligence per se." Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 63. That author further says: "Statutes and municipal ordinances, in every jurisdiction, prescribed specifically the duty of railway corporations in respect to railway crossings, but no failure on the part of the railroad company to do its duty will excuse any one from using the senses of sight and hearing upon approaching a railway crossing; and whenever the due use of either sense would have enabled the injured person to escape the danger, the injury is conclusive evidence of negligence, without any reference to the railroad's failure to perform its duty." Id. p. 195, § 64. But Mr. Wharton says: "If there are obstructions at the [street] crossing such as to make it impossible for a person approaching to see the train, and impossible or very difficult to hear it, in such and similar cases it would be the clear duty of the railroad company to ring the bell, or to sound the whistle, so as to warn persons of the approach of the train; and an omission to do so, even in the absence of any statute requiring it, would be negligence, if so found by the jury, rendering the company liable for any injury resulting therefrom." Section 804, 886; Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 86, p. 293; Artz v. Railroad Co., 34 Iowa, 160. But while the existence of obstacles, or obstructions of any kind, at or near a railway crossing of a public street, under the rules thus formulated, impose additional precautions as to prudence and care on the part of railroad companies, yet Mr. Beach states that "at an obstructed crossing it is the duty of the traveler to exercise a greater degree of care and caution than is incumbent upon him usually." Beach, Contrib. Neg. p. 203, § 65. Another author summarizes the duties of railroad companies and travelers, respectively, in respect to public crossings at the intersection of public streets, of a city and a railroad track, thus: "At the place of intersection there are concurrent rights. Neither the traveler on the common highway, nor the railroad company, has an exclusive right of passage. Even on a common road travelers must look out for the approach of other vehicles passing; and this is the more necessary at a railroad crossing because movement on such a road is more speedy, and because the consequences of such a collision are, usually, so disastrous. Precaution—looking out for danger—is, therefore, a duty." 1 Thomp. Neg. p. 403. See, also, Railroad Co. v. Heileman, 49 Pa. St. 60. The instant case is quite similar in many respects to the case of White v. Railroad Co., 42 La. Ann. 990, 8 South. Rep. 475, wherein the plaintiff sought to recover of the company for injuries inflicted upon her by coming in collision with one of their trains while crossing a public thoroughfare of the city of Shreveport, under circumstances far more aggravated than those apparently surrounding Herlish. In that case we said: "She was unquestionably bound to look and listen, and to exercise care and caution, to avoid the possible danger suggested by the very fact of the crossing." Vide Brown v. Railroad Co., 42 La. Ann. 350, 7 South. Rep. 682, also.

Plaintiff's counsel claim that the case of Curley v. Railroad Co., 40 La. Ann. 810, 6 South. Rep. 103, is strictly applicable, and should govern our decision. The facts of that case were quite different; for it appears that the train had just passed the street crossing going west, and the court say: "He had, we think, reason to believe that the track was clear,—that the train had passed on,—and that he could cross with safety; and he had no knowledge of its again returning on the main track. There was no light to give warning of the approach of the train. * * * The engine was not in front of the train." At pages 815, 816, 40 La. Ann., and page 105, 6 South. Rep. That case is exceptional, and is grounded on the facts recited, which take it out of the operation of the rule of law announced by the authors quoted from. Our conclusion is that plaintiff was primarily guilty of negligence, and is not entitled to recover, and that the judgment must be reversed. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled and reversed, and it is now ordered and decreed that the demands of the plaintiff be rejected, at his cost, in both courts.

ADMINISTRATION—REMOVAL TO COURT OF EQUITY—SETTLEMENT—PLEADING.

1. Where a bill is filed by devisees under a will to remove the administration into a court of equity, and compel a settlement by the executor, a plea by the executor setting up the pendency of a suit to prevent interference with certain water-works, in which the estate was largely interested, and alleging that a sale of the property pending the litigation would result in a sacrifice, and would be prejudicial to the interests of the owners, does not disclose a valid objection to the maintenance of the suit, since the court will only require such a settlement, whether partial or final, as the condition of the estate would have rendered proper, had the administration remained in the probate court.

2. Where the only matter in the bill that could be construed into a prayer for the sale of the said water-works was that the court would, if necessary, order the property of the estate to be sold, and the plea alleged merely that the interest of the estate in the water-works was an undivided part interest, but not that it was necessary for a settlement of the estate that the entire water-works property should be sold, or that the interest of the estate could not be sold by itself, or that the owners of the other interests were in any way concerned in the sale of the interest belonging to the estate, the plea did not disclose any right of the said owners to be made parties to the settlement.

Appeal from chancery court, Mobile county; THOMAS W. COLEMAN, Chancellor.

Bill by Emma Gordon and others against Louis Stein and others to have the administration of an estate, of which the said Louis Stein was executor, removed into a court of equity. From an order overruling certain pleas to the bill, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

L. H. Faith, for appellants. Fredk. G. Bromberg, for appellees.

WALKER, J. The bill in this case was filed by devisees under the will of Albert Stein, deceased, and its purpose was to have the court of chancery take jurisdiction of the administration of the estate and of the settlement thereof. The bill shows that Albert Stein died testate in July, 1874; that the defendant Louis Stein qualified as executor under his will in August, 1874, and has since that time been in possession and control of the property of the estate, and has made no accounting of his trust as executor since November, 1887, more than two years before the bill was filed. It is alleged that the estate is now ready for distribution. When the case was in this court at the last term, the will of the decedent was construed. Stein v. Gordon, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 741. The matter now presented for review is the ruling of the chancery court on three pleas interposed by the defendants.

The substance of the matter set up by the first plea is the pendency of a suit brought by the defendant Louis Stein, as executor, in the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of Alabama, to prevent an interference with or infringement of alleged rights and franchises of the Mobile city water-works, an interest in which is alleged to be the most valuable portion of the estate of his testator. The plea charges that a sale of the Mobile city water-works property pending the suit mentioned would result in a sacrifice of the property, and would not be to the interest of the owners thereof. The pendency of that suit is pleaded as a good and sufficient reason why the water-works property should not be sold before the termination of that suit, and why the estate of Albert Stein, deceased, is not now in a condition for a final settlement and distribution thereof. This plea does not disclose a valid objection to the maintenance of the present suit. The statutes which have conferred upon courts of probate large powers in reference to the estates of decedents have not divested the chancery court of the original equitable jurisdiction to enforce the trusts of an administration. Before the jurisdiction of the court of probate has been put in exercise for the purpose of making a final settlement, a devisee or an heir, a legatee or a distributee, may as a matter of right, and without assigning any special cause for equitable interposition, have the administration removed into a court of equity for a settlement. The court of equity, proceeding according to its own practice, is governed by and applies the law controlling the settlement of administrations, the distribution of assets, or the partition or division of property, which prevails in the court of probate. Bragg v. Beers, 71 Ala. 151; Teague v. Corbitt, 57 Ala. 529; McNeill v. McNeill, 36 Ala. 109; 3 Brick. Ala. Dig. p. 334, §§ 61-63. It is the duty of an executor to make annual settlements of his administration. He may, when necessary for the interests of the estate, he required to make a settlement at any time; and a final settlement may be made at any time after 18 months from the grant of letters, if the debts are all paid, and the condition of the estate, in other respects, will admit of it. Code, §§ 2133, 2134. When the administration is removed into the chancery court, that court may require such settlement, whether partial or final, as the condition of the estate would have rendered proper if the administration had remained in the probate court. A legatee or devisee cannot coerce a settlement until after the expiration of 18 months from the grant of letters, and a bill for such a purpose within that time is premature. Jackson v. Rowell, 87 Ala. 685, 6 South. Rep. 95. The bill cannot be regarded as premature if, at the time it was filed, the complainant was entitled to demand a settlement. The bill in the present case was filed more than 15 years after the grant of letters, and more than 2 years after the last settlement by the executor. The complainants were entitled to demand that the executor make a settlement; a partial one, at any rate. Alexander v. Steele, 84 Ala. 332, 4 South. Rep. 281. It is not necessary to the maintenance of the bill that, at the time it was filed, the estate was ready for an immediate final settlement. The court may take jurisdiction of the administration, though the condition of the estate does not admit of a final settlement at once. The plea under consideration suggests no reason at all why the executor should not be coerced to a partial settlement. The pendency of the suit referred to is, at most, a matter for the consideration of the court in determining whether the best interests of the estate require that a final settlement thereof be postponed until that litigation shall be disposed of. That suit presents no obstacle in the way of the exercise of the jurisdiction of the chancery court to have the estate administered under its orders.

As has been already stated, the bill was filed for the removal of the administration into the chancery court, and for the settlement of the estate. There is no prayer for the sale of the water-works property. The only prayer for the sale, if anything, is "that your honor will, if necessary, make a decree ordering the property of said estate to be sold for division." Of course, no decree could be made in the case for the sale or division of any property not belonging to the estate of the testator. It is averred in the second plea that the interest of the estate in the water-works property is an undivided sixty-two and a half hundredths share or part therein, and that the remaining shares therein are owned by other persons, who are named. It is not shown either by the bill or by the plea that it is necessary for a settlement of the estate of Albert Stein, deceased, that the entire water-works property be sold. It is not suggested that the interest of his estate in that property cannot be sold by itself, or that it cannot be equitably divided among the devisees. It is not shown that the owners of the other shares in that property are in any way concerned in the sale or division of the share belonging to Albert Stein's estate. The second plea does not disclose any right or interest of strangers to the estate to be made parties to a proceeding for its settlement, or for the sale or division of the property thereof.

The third plea is "to so much of said bill as seeks a sale of the Mobile water-works property." This plea strikes in the air, as it is aimed at a prayer not found in the bill. It refers to a contract between the city of Mobile and Albert Stein, deceased, in regard to the water-works property. Whatever rights the city of Mobile may have under that contract will not be impaired by the settlement of Albert Stein's estate. There is nothing in the contract to intercept the rights of the devisees to the interest of the testator in the water-works property. The contract presents no obstacle to a sale or division of that interest. Its existence does not require the indefinite extension of the executor's control over the property. Neither of the pleas presents a defense to the bill. The decree to this effect will be affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Alabama. Nov. 26, 1891.)

PAROL EVIDENCE TO VARY CONTRACT.

Where a contract for the sale of land provides that $7,000 of the purchase price is to be paid in "original ground floor or treasury stock" of a corporation into which the land is to be put by the purchaser, parol evidence is inadmissible in a suit by the seller on the contract to show that it was agreed that the land should be put in at a certain price, and that if it was put in at a greater price the seller was to receive a greater amount of stock than $7,000.

Appeal from circuit court, Tuscaloosa county; JAMES B. HEAD, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Peninah E. Williams against George A. Searcy, W. C. Jemmison, and W. H. Peck to recover $10,000 for breach of contract to purchase land. Plaintiffs offered evidence explaining the meaning of certain terms used in said contract, and the intention of the parties. The court excluded this evidence, and thereupon plaintiff took a nonsuit and appeals. Affirmed.

Foster & Jones and Frank S. Moody, for appellant. Wood & Wood, for appellee.

WALKER, J. The written contract between the parties was for the sale of certain land at the price of $21,000. Seven thousand dollars of the purchase money was made payable in cash, $7,000 in the stock of a proposed corporation, and for the balance the purchasers were to give their three notes, which were to be secured by a mortgage on the land. The complaint alleges a non-compliance with the contract only as to the provision for the payment which was to be made in stock. By the evidence which was excluded the plaintiff undertook to prove that she had not received as much stock as was due to her under the contract. The proposition was to prove the meaning of the term "original ground floor or treasury stock," so as to show that the amount of stock which was to be paid was dependent upon the price at which the land purchased by the defendants was put into the corporation when organized. As stated in the first count of the complaint, the claim was that "the plaintiff was to receive as part payment of said land seven thousand dollars of the stock of said company, provided said land was put into said company at the rate of one hundred and fifty dollars per acre. But, if said land should be put into said company at a greater rate per acre than one hundred and fifty dollars per acre, then in that event the plaintiff, by the terms of the contract, was to receive such an amount of said stock as would bear the same ratio to seven thousand dollars as the amount per acre at which the land was actually put into said company bore to one hundred and fifty dollars per acre." The complaint alleges that the land was put into the company by the defendants at $300 per acre, and that the plaintiff has been paid $7,000 of the stock of the company. Evidently, her claim is that she should have been paid $14,000 of the stock, and the evidence was introduced for the purpose of showing that she was entitled, by the terms of the contract, to more than $7,000 of the stock. The question presented by the offer to make such proof is whether it was permissible to show by parol that the amount of stock which the defendants were bound to deliver was different from the amount mentioned in the contract. The stock which was to be paid is mentioned only twice in the written instrument. In the clause providing for the payment of the purchase price the defendants undertook to deliver "seven thousand dollars in original ground floor or treasury stock of the proposed Tuscaloosa Coal, Iron and Land Company." The only other mention of the stock is the following provision: "It is understood herein that $7,000.00 of paid-up certificates of treasury stock shall be delivered to parties of the first part on the 15th day of February, 1887, as aforesaid, if said certificates are ready to be issued, and, if not ready, written guaranty of the management of said company that they shall be delivered as soon as ready will be sufficient."

It appears from these quotations that the amount of stock to be paid by the defendants was definitely and certainly ascertained, and that such amount was not to be diminished or enlarged by any contingency. It was not proposed to be proved that the word "thousand," when used in connection with land company stock, meant more or less than 1,000. Giving to that word, as found in this contract, its ordinary and generally accepted meaning, and the plain result is that the writing shows that the defendants undertook to pay $7,000 in stock. That amount is absolutely fixed. There is no hint in the contract that the amount should be greater or less in any event. Certificates for only $7,000 of stock could be demanded under the provision on that subject. Parol proof that the parties meant that a larger or a smaller amount of stock should be paid in certain contingencies necessarily involves a contradiction of the terms of the written contract. If the stock as actually issued by the corporation, when formed, was not such as was stipulated for, the plaintiff should have declined to receive it, and she would then have had her action for a breach of the contract. Instead of pursuing this course, she accepted $7,000 of the stock as issued. She retains that stock, and does not now complain that it is not the kind contracted for, but her claim is that she is entitled to more than $7,000 of it. The only kind of corporate stock authorized by our law is such as is issued for money, labor done, or money or property actually received. Section 6, art. 14, of the constitution of Alabama; Elyton Land Co. v. Elevator Co., (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 129. Where the law thus requires that the stock of corporations shall represent actual values received by it, it would be as anomalous to admit parol evidence to show that a written contract for the absolute payment of a named amount of stock was in certain contingencies, not mentioned in the writing, intended to mean another and wholly different amount, as it would be to admit such evidence to vary or contradict, as to the amount, a written obligation, without conditions, to pay a certain sum of money. No action would lie on the contract in reference to the stock if the stipulation on that subject meant that the payment should be made in stock issued in violation of law. Williams v. Evans, 87 Ala. 725, 6 South. Rep. 702. It is claimed for the appellant that the contract cannot be regarded as providing for the payment of any but lawfully issued stock. Conceding that meaning to the provision in question, and the result of the unequivocal language of the contract is to provide absolutely and unconditionally for the payment of a specified amount of a certain described thing. A simple promise to pay $7,000 of lawfully issued stock cannot also mean a promise to pay some wholly different amount of the same kind of stock. The evidence which was offered to show that the parties intended that, under certain contingencies, there should be paid an amount different from that mentioned, was in direct contradiction of the express terms of the written contract; and it was properly excluded, because parol evidence was inadmissible to alter, vary, or contradict the writing. Wilkinson v. Williamson, 76 Ala. 163; Bulwinkle v. Cramer, (S. C.) 3 S. E. Rep. 776; Smith v. Clews, (N. Y. App.) 21 N. E. Rep. 160, 11 Amer. St. Rep. 627, and note; 3 Brick. Dig. pp. 291, 417. It was not competent to prove by parol that the $7,000 in stock mentioned in the contract meant more or less than that amount. The evidence having been offered for the purpose of supporting a contradiction of the terms of the written instrument, it was properly rejected. Affirmed.

THORINGTON v. CITY COUNCIL OF MONTGOMERY.

CONTINUANCE IN EQUITY—SALE FOR TAXES—COLLUSIVE PURCHASE—CHANGE OF OWNERSHIP.

1. It is discretionary with the chancellor to refuse an application for continuance, made after the submission of an equity suit, and pending its trial, and his ruling is not revisable.

2. Where property is sold for taxes, and is purchased for 1 per cent. of its value by the husband and trustee of the owner, in the name of their daughter, but the trustee continues for five years to control the property and collect the rents, a decree that the original owner is still the real owner is proper in a suit by the daughter to enjoin the sale of the property for older taxes assessed against it.

Appeal from chancery court, Montgomery county; JOHN A. FOSTER, Chancellor.

Bill in equity, filed by Sallie G. Thorington against the city council of Montgomery to have the city council enjoined from selling certain property, alleged to have been purchased by her at a tax-sale, for further taxes that might be due. Decree dismissing the bill. Complainant appeals. Affirmed.

Arrington & Graham, T. H. Watts, and J. S. Winter, for appellant. J. M. Falkner and W. A. Gunter, for appellee.

STONE, C. J. The present suit was instituted in January, 1886. It has been twice before in this court. 82 Ala. 591, 2 South. Rep. 513; 88 Ala. 548, 7 South. Rep. 363. It grew out of the suit of Winter v. City Council of Montgomery, reported in 79 Ala. 481. At the spring term, 1890, of the chancery court a motion was filed by complainant for an order to compel the respondent to produce in court the testimony of J. S. Winter and others, alleged to have been taken by respondent; "and, if that may not be consistently and legally done, that reasonable opportunity be given complainant to further fortify her case herein, by allowing complainant reasonable opportunity to establish the said testimony as taken for use in complainant's behalf in this cause." This motion was accompanied by an affidavit of J. S. Winter, in which he set forth that the deposition of Sallie G. Thorington had been taken for respondent on interrogatories filed and crossed, and that in said deposition she had testified that the lots in controversy in this suit were purchased with her money, at her request, and in good faith. The affidavit further stated "that complainant, assuming that due return would be or had been made of the testimony so taken as aforesaid, leaned upon it to show the true status of the facts, and has not, therefore, taken, or caused to be taken, any testimony whatever; and, as counsel for complainant, he, the said affiant, cannot and does not advise going to trial in the cause without proof, directly made in terms, of the bona fides of the said purchase by the said complainant, of the property concerned as aforesaid, of the payment of the purchase money through a duly-authorized agent in that behalf; and that the money so paid was in fact and in truth hers, is a matter within the actual knowledge of this affiant. And affiant further says that the matters and facts so suggested are susceptible of proof, and, if allowed the opportunity, affiant expects to and will have due proof made of the same within reasonable time," etc. This motion and the accompanying affidavit were, by the register, marked, "Filed April 14, 1890." The case was not tried at that term, but no entry was made of record showing that the cause was continued. Neither is it shown that any action was taken on the motion, or that the attention of the court was called to it.

The next orders in this cause, shown by the record, were made at the October term, 1890. The first was an order of publication. Then follows an order of submission, with a note of the testimony. These are dated October 15, 1890. On October 16, 1890, a motion was made by complainant, accompanied by an affidavit of J. S. Winter, to set aside the submission, and grant to her further time to take testimony, by which she proposed to prove the purchase of the lots in good faith, and with her money. This affidavit sets forth the long protracted illness of affiant, one of the plaintiff's counsel, which disabled him to prepare the case for trial. Two other solicitors, it appears, had prepared and filed the bill. It was signed alone by them, and they join in the assignment of errors. The affidavit sets forth no reason why the testimony had not been procured by the other solicitors. The only excuse looking in this direction is the clause in the affidavit which asserts that J. S. Winter, the affiant, "has, in point of fact, looked after the details more, perhaps, than any other of the complainant's counsel herein, and accordingly was, perhaps, better informed as to these details." The chancellor responded to this motion and affidavit as follows: "The complainant, after the argument of this cause had progressed to the last speech to be made by J. S. Winter, the counsel and father of complainant, and the submission of the cause had been made, said J. S. Winter interposed for complainant an application that the submission be set aside in order that he might submit a motion, made at the last term of the court, which was filed by the register, but was not submitted to the court. This motion, which was filed by the register at the April term of the court, and which was never submitted to the court, or acted upon, was that the court should instruct the commissioner, Horace Stringfellow, to return into court how he had taken or acted under a commission issued to him to take the deposition of Mrs. Mary E. Winter and of complainant, at the instance of defendant, upon interrogatories filed by defendant, and to return the deposition of such witnesses, or either of them, which he had taken. Upon examination of the facts in this cause I find that, at a former term, said J. S. Winter had asked the court to instruct the commissioner to return said deposition of M. E. Winter to him, and to return the commission to the court, as having been improperly issued. Upon a hearing of the application of J. S. Winter, the court directed the commissioner to take whatever action in the matter he might choose, either to destroy said deposition or retain it, but in no event to permit either party to this suit to examine it. It was held that the deposition had been taken improperly, because no commission had been properly issued; and that, as Mr. Stringfellow had acted without legal authority in taking the deposition, it was the right of Mr. Winter, representing the complainant, to ask the court that the deposition should not be subjected to the scrutiny of defendant's counsel. The order which I made was verbal, and was made at Mr. Winter's suggestion, but was a little different from his request. His request was that I direct the commissioner to return the deposition of the witness or to himself, but I made the order that he keep the deposition secret from all parties to the suit or destroy it as he desired. If this deposition was now before the court, it could not be used for any purpose, unless in the mean time the deposition of the witness had subsequently been taken, and the deposition taken by Mr. Stringfellow should be offered to contradict any of the statements made therein. But I append hereto a statement of Mr. Stringfellow that the deposition had been destroyed. It could therefore do no good to any person now to take any action therein at this time. It cannot be disputed that, if any one desired to take action in the matter to get the deposition of either of these witnesses, there has been ample time to have done so. The submission in this cause was made without any application for a continuance in order to get the deposition of these witnesses, one of whom is the complainant. The complainant has never taken any steps during the time this case has been continued from year to year to get her own or her mother's deposition in the case. Under these circumstances, the motion to set aside the submission on that ground is denied."

It is manifest there is nothing in the foregoing which we can review. No ruling is shown to have been had, or even asked, on the motion of April, 1890, further than the indisputable fact that the cause was continued at that term. On what ground the continuance was granted is not shown. And the application made October 16, 1890, made, as it was, pending the trial, was addressed to the court's discretion, and we cannot revise it. In fact, motions for a continuance are never revisable. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 404, § 1 et seq. It is but just to appellant's counsel that we should state the question we have been considering is neither discussed nor claimed in his brief. We have considered it proper, however, that we should notice it, in view of the remaining points to be considered. The uncontradicted testimony is that, when the lots were sold for one year's assessment of city taxes, they were bid off by J. S. Winter, husband and trustee of Mary E. Winter, the owner, against whom the assessment had been made. The price was the amount of the one year's taxes, a sum less than 1 per cent. of the proven value of the property, and much less than one-tenth of the annual rental value. When asked who was the purchaser, he answered, "Sallie G. Thorington." Sallie G. Thorington is the daughter of J. S. Winter and Mary E. Winter. It is fully proven that for years preceding the tax-sale J. S. Winter superintended the renting, taking rent-notes, payable to himself, as trustee; and that he collected the rents. The proof is full also that since the tax sale there has been no change. He has continued to superintend the renting, still taking the rent-notes payable to himself as trustee, and still collecting the rent, as before. If there has been any change in the possession or control of the property or the rentals, there is no proof of it. It was clearly competent to prove this continued control of the property and its rents by J. S. Winter, the trustee of Mary E. Winter. The absence of visible change in the control and possession was and is a circumstance to be weighed in determining whether there was a real change in the ownership of the property. It is certainly unusual for real purchasers of property at public sale to permit it to remain, without change, in the hands of the original owner for nearly five years, with no offer of proof explanatory of so wide a departure from business methods. Grouping the whole facts,—the relationship of the parties, the insignificant sum for which such valuable property was sacrificed, and no offer or attempt made to redeem it, the continued possession and control of the property by the trustee of the original owner, the absence of proof even that Mrs. Thorington furnished the money with which the purchase was made,—we hold that a strong presumption is raised that the title to the property was collusively placed in Mrs. Thorington, in secret trust for Mary E. Winter, her mother, and that there is no real change in the beneficial ownership. There is no proof to overturn or weaken this presumption. It is contended that the chancellor erred in not ordering the three lots not claimed by Mrs. Thorington to be first sold. If that were shown to be an error in this case, we would correct it in this court. It being shown, however, that there has been no change in the ownership of the property, but that all the lots, so far as the testimony informs us, still belong to the taxpayer, there is neither duty nor propriety in directing which lot or lots shall be first sold. Nothing is shown in the record bearing on the question of priority of burden. Affirmed.

SALE OF DECEDENT'S LAND—ESTOPPEL—PETITION—AMENDMENT—MINOR HEIRS.

1. Under Code, § 2105, authorizing "lands of an estate" to be sold by order of the probate court, when the same cannot be equitably divided among the heirs, the probate court has no jurisdiction to order the sale of land, the title to which intestate did not have at the time of his death, but which was taken after his death, in the name of the heirs, by the administrator, who paid the balance of the purchase price out of the funds of the estate.

2. Where in such case the administrator petitions the probate court for an order for sale of the land, in order to divide it, and issues citations to the adult heirs, who with knowledge of the facts permit the sale to be made, reported, and confirmed, they are estopped from questioning its validity seven years afterwards, and after the purchasers have put valuable improvements on the land.

3 Where the petition for the order of sale recites that the sale is necessary for an equitable division of the land, and the citation to the heirs so states, the order itself, reciting that the lands are ordered to be sold to "pay debts," may be corrected by a nunc pro tunc amendment to conform to the petition.

4. Such sale is invalid as to minor heirs, though they were represented in the proceedings by a guardian ad litem.

5. It is competent for a court of equity to invest the legal title by its decree.

Appeal from city court of Anniston; B. F. CASSADY, Judge.

Alice Jones and others, heirs of James M. Jones, deceased, brought ejectment against the Woodstock Iron Company and others. Defendants then filed a bill in equity against plaintiffs, seeking to enjoin them from prosecuting the ejectment suit, and to have the title to the land in dispute invested in defendants in the ejectment suit. Alice Jones and the other heirs demurred to the bill, and the demurrer was overruled. Then Alice Jones and the other heirs filed an answer and cross-bill. A demurrer to the cross-bill was sustained, and plaintiffs in the cross-bill appeal. Affirmed in part and reversed in part.

The land in dispute was in the possession of James M. Jones at the time of his death intestate, but the entire purchase price had not been paid, and Jones did not have the legal title. After the death of Jones, his administrator paid the balance of the purchase price, and took a deed to Jones' heirs. Subsequent to this the administrator filed a petition in the probate court, praying for an order of sale of the land for the purpose of dividing it among the heirs. An order of sale was made, and the sale duly made, reported, and confirmed. A guardian ad litem was appointed for the minor heirs Alice Jones and Walter Jones, and citations were issued to the adult heirs. The order of sale recited that the lands "should be sold for the purpose of paying debts," but this was corrected by an amendment nunc pro tunc, ordering the sale to be made for distribution.

Parsons & Darby, Gordon McDonald, and Kelly & Smith, for appellants. Knox & Bowie and Caldwell & Johnston, for appellees.

COLEMAN, J. The bill was filed to enjoin suits in ejectment, commenced by the heirs of James M. Jones, to recover certain lands which were sold under an order of the probate court, and also to have the legal title to the lands sued for divested out of said heirs, and invested in complainants. The facts sufficiently appear in the statement of the facts of the case and in the further progress of the opinion. The petition to the probate court of Calhoun county in its allegations for the sale of the lands for distribution sufficiently complied with the statute to give jurisdiction to the court. Code 1886, § 2106; Code 1876, §§ 2449, 2450. Citations to the parties in interest regularly issued, and a guardian ad litem, who accepted the appointment to represent the minor heirs, appeared and represented them in the proceedings in the probate court to have the lands sold for distribution.

Even though a petition be subject to demurrer, or a judgment on the demurrer be reversible for error on appeal, yet, if the petition sufficiently alleges all the necessary jurisdictional facts, and final judgment is rendered thereon, from which no appeal is taken, such irregularities or reversible errors cannot avail when the judgment is collaterally assailed. Whitlow v. Echols, 78 Ala. 208; Pollard v. Hanrick, 74 Ala. 337; 3 Brick. Dig. p. 467, §§ 182, 183, 185. The probate court has jurisdiction to sell for division lands in which the decedent held only an equitable interest. Pettit v. Pettit, 32 Ala. 288; Vaughan v. Holmes, 22 Ala. 595; Rice v. Drennan, 75 Ala. 338; Jennings v. Jenkins, 9 Ala. 285; Duval v. McLoskey, 1 Ala. 708. The statute which authorizes the probate court to sell land for division is as follows, (Code, § 2105:) "Lands of an estate may be sold by order of the probate court having jurisdiction of the estate, when the same cannot be equitably divided among the heirs or devisees." A difficulty arises as to what constitutes "lands of an estate," within the meaning of the statute. The preceding section, in regard to the sale of lands for the payment of debts, uses the same broad term, "land." As we have seen, the statute includes a mere equity in lands; and in the case of Vaughan v. Holmes, 22 Ala., supra, it was held that a purchaser of lands, who died before paying the entire purchase money, had such inchoate interest or equity as was subject to sale under the statute by decree of the probate court.

When a sale of lands for distribution has been made in pursuance of an order of the court having jurisdiction of the question, and on proof taken as required by the statutes, and the sale and payment of the purchase money regularly reported to the court and confirmed by a decree of the court, and a conveyance of the title is executed to the purchaser in pursuance to an order of the court to that effect, no fraud being alleged, the validity of the sale and the title of the purchaser cannot be collaterally assailed by showing that the purchase money was not paid as reported, or that the sale in fact was not made as directed by the court. These questions are judicially ascertained and adjudicated by the judgment of confirmation. It makes no difference that the probate court is of limited jurisdiction. After it has properly acquired jurisdiction, its judgments have the same extent, and are as conclusive quoad rem and the parties properly before it, as judgments of courts of general jurisdiction. A purchaser at such sale is only bound to see that the court had jurisdiction. Wyman v Campbell, 6 Ala. 219; Whitlow v. Echols 78 Ala. 210; Farley v. Dunklin, 76 Ala. 530;

Kellam v. Richards, 56 Ala. 240; Stevenson v. Murray, 87 Ala. 442, 6 South. Rep. 301; Cantelou v. Whitley, 85 Ala. 248, 4 South. Rep. 610; Goodwin v. Sims, 86 Ala. 102, 5 South. Rep. 587; Morgan v. Farned, 83 Ala. 367, 3 South. Rep. 798.

These general propositions of law are subject to the qualifications that the statute which confers the power on the probate court to sell lands for distribution extends only to the title or estate as it descended, and not to an after-acquired title or interest, different and distinct from that which the intestate had at the time of his death. In support of this qualification of the general principle the following authorities are cited: Johnson v. Collins, 12 Ala. 336; Pettit v. Pettit, 32 Ala. 288, 305; Burns v. Hamilton, 33 Ala. 213; Cothran v. McCoy, Id. 65; Bishop v. Blair, 36 Ala. 80; McCain v. McCain, 12 Ala. 510; McKay v. Broad, 70 Ala. 380; Whorton v. Moragne, 62 Ala. 207; Mounger v. Burks, 17 Ala. 50; Rice v. Drennen, 75 Ala. 338. The citations from 36 Ala., 33 Ala., 32 Ala., and Johnson v. Collins, 12 Ala. 336, are not directly in point, though often quoted to the proposition. In the case of Pettit v. Pettit, 32 Ala., supra, the conclusion of the court rested upon the fact that the contract of the intestate for the purchase of the land was void as contravening public policy, and in violation of a statute of the United States, and this defect was apparent upon the petition to the probate court for the sale of the lands. In the case of Johnson v. Collins, 12 Ala 336, the conclusion of the court was that the intestate had no inheritable or devisable interest in the lands, either legal or equitable, and consequently there was nothing upon which the order of the court could operate; that under the pre-emption law the heir, by virtue of the statute, was entitled to perfect the inchoate pre-emption right of the settler, and not the administrator of the intestate. The other case cited from 33 Ala. merely reaffirms the same ruling. The proposition, however, is broadly stated and declared in McCain v. McCain, 12 Ala. 510. In this case the intestate had purchased the land, and died without making payment of the purchase money, and before receiving the title. His administrator paid the unpaid balance of the purchase money, and titles were made to the heirs of the decedent. The court held the power to sell lands for distribution "is only given when the land remains in the same condition, as to the title, as it was at the decease of the intestate, but has no power when the title of the ancestor has been divested and made to the heirs." The facts in the case of Bishop v. Blair show that Mrs. Bishop, with funds of her husband's estate, entered certain lands. Under a petition by her, as executrix, to the probate court, these lands were represented as belonging to the estate of her deceased husband, and as such were decreed to be sold for division. It was held that the court had no jurisdiction to sell the lands for distribution, and the order of the court for this purpose was null and void. The rule has been recognized without a single departure, to the present time, since it was first declared in McCain v. McCain, 12 Ala., supra. Whatever hardships may arise, it is now a rule of property too firmly fixed to be departed from, without legislation.

So far as the adult heirs are concerned, we are fairly convinced they are estopped from asserting any claim hostile to that of the purchasers. These adult heirs, with a full knowledge of all the facts, permitted the sale of the lands to be reported to the court, and the sale confirmed by the decree of the court. They were parties to the settlement by the administrator, in which he charges himself with the proceeds of the sale of the land, and decrees were rendered against him for their proportionate share of the purchase money. The principle is not unlike that which was applied in the case of Bell v. Craig, 52 Ala. 216, in which it was held that, although the sale of the lands was void, the settlement by the administrator, and decree against him, estopped the heirs from questioning the validity of the order under which the sale was made. See, also, Whitehead v. Jones, 56 Ala. 156; Bland v. Bowie, 53 Ala. 161; Pickens v. Yarborough, 30 Ala. 416, Robertson v. Bradford, 73 Ala. 118; Bishop v. Blair, 36 Ala. 83; Rice v. Drennen, 75 Ala. 338; Nunn v. Norris, 58 Ala. 202.

The decree of the court, ordering the sale of the land, was rendered in the year 1879, the sale was made in June, 1881, reported and regularly confirmed in September, 1881; and the purchasers have been in possession ever since, have erected valuable improvements thereon, and their title never questioned until January, 1888, when suit in ejectment was instituted by the two minor heirs to recover the land. It cannot be tolerated, in a court of equity, that the adult heirs can at this late day repudiate the sale and recover back the land. Their claim constitutes a cloud upon the title of the complainants, which entitles them to relief in a court of equity. Although the minor heirs, Alice and Walter Jones, waited several years after attaining their majority before commencing legal proceedings in ejectment to recover their interest, it does not appear from the record or in proof that personal knowledge of the proceedings in the probate court, for the sale of the land, and of the final settlement by the administrator, and the decree in their favor against him for the purchase money, was brought home to them, or that they have ratified the settlement or done any act which would estop them from asserting their claim. Complainants seem to have acted in good faith in their purchase and in making improvements thereon, and the equities of the parties as to rents, or in case of partition, if such proceedings should be instituted, can be fully adjusted upon proper pleadings in a court of equity. The answer, cross-bill, and demurrers of the minor heirs are filed jointly with the adult heirs, who are not entitled to relief. The pleadings should be amended, if desired, so as to separate the rights and interest of the minor heirs from the adult heirs.

If the decree of the court, upon the petition of the administrator for the sale of the lands, was not otherwise invalid, the amendment nunc pro tunc was properly made. The petition to the probate court sought to have the lands sold for an equitable division. The citation to the heirs so stated. Proof was taken by deposition to show that the lands could not be divided without a sale, and which depositions were ordered to be filed as a part of the record of the proceedings. The decree itself provides that the petition be granted. It is perfectly evident that the recital in the judgment that the lands be sold for the purpose of paying the debts was a mere clerical mistake, capable of correction nunc pro tunc, if, indeed, when considered in connection with all the quasi record memoranda and the record proper, it did not correct itself. The proceedings being in rem, as between the administrator and heirs, notice to the heirs of the motion to amend nunc pro tunc was not necessary. Farley v. Dunklin, 76 Ala. 532; Goodwin v. Sims, 86 Ala. 102, 5 South. Rep. 587; Nabers v. Meredith, 67 Ala. 333; Whorley v. Railroad Co., 72 Ala. 22. The record nowhere shows how the rights of A. H. Jones are involved in this case, and it does not appear upon what grounds the injunction was issued and made perpetual as against him.

It is insisted that the decree of the equity court is erroneous in that it undertook to "invest the legal title" in the complainants. The case of Prewitt v. Ashford, 90 Ala. 300, 7 South. Rep. 831, supports the contention. We would correct the decree in this respect, if we deemed it necessary. A deed made in pursuance of a decree of a court of equity, executed by any other person than the legal owner, proprio vigore, would not convey the legal title. Such an instrument derives its entire strength from the decree. It is the decree at last, and not the instrument itself, which makes it effectual to convey or invest the legal title. Courts of equity, in this state, have long pursued the practice of investing the legal title by their decrees. This practice was not only sanctioned, but expressly authorized, by the decision of the supreme court of this state. As far back as Brewer v. Brewer, 19 Ala. 481, 490, DARGAN, C. J., proceeding to render "such decree as the court below should have rendered, ordered, adjudged, and decreed that Thos. J. Brewer be invested with the legal title," etc. This early decision has become a rule of property, and to hold otherwise now would upset a great many legal titles. We adhere to the old rule; and so far as Prewitt v. Ashford, supra, conflicts with it, the latter is hereby qualified. Either cause would be efficient to invest a legal title. That no injustice may be done to litigants who, under the influence of the decision made in the case of Prewitt v. Ashford, 90 Ala., 7 South. Rep., supra, have instituted proceedings to procure the legal title, we declare and hold that as to such cases the case of Prewitt v. Ashford operates as a rule of property. Farrior v. Security Co., 92 Ala. 176, 9 South. Rep. 532.

The decree of the city court is affirmed so far as it granted relief to complainants against the adult heirs of James M. Jones, and reversed so far as relief was granted against Walter Jones and Alice Jones, who were minor heirs at the time of the sale and settlement, and against A. H. Jones. The judgment of this court reversing the decree rendered against the minor heirs and A. H. Jones is not to be construed as dissolving the temporary injunction enjoining the prosecution of the ejectment suits, but as to such matter the question is left open for the consideration of the lower court, if the pleadings should be amended and other proof offered in the further progress of the cause. One-half of the costs of the appeal must be paid by the adult heirs of James M. Jones, and the other half by the appellees. Affirmed in part and reversed in part.

TOMPKINS v. DRENNAN.

MORTGAGES—SALE UNDER POWER—ATTORNEY'S FEES.

Where a mortgage containing a power of sale stipulates that the proceeds of the sale shall be applied, first, to paying the expenses, "and all attorney's or solicitor's fees," and the notes secured by the mortgage provide that, in case they are not paid at maturity, the mortgagor shall pay not less than 10 per cent. for collecting them, the mortgagee cannot retain 10 per cent. out of the proceeds of the sale under the power, but is entitled to a reasonable attorney's fee only, since the stipulations in the notes and the mortgage in relation to attorney's fees are independent, and applicable to different contingencies,—one to the sale under the mortgage, the other to collection of the notes by suit.

Appeal from circuit court, Jefferson county; JAMES B. HEAD, Judge.

Action by D. M. Drennan against H. B. Tompkins for $3,000, being the amount realized by defendant from a sale of property under mortgage, in excess of the mortgage debt and expenses. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Roquemore, White & McKenzie, R. H. Pearson, and Jackson E. Long, for appellant. Gillespy & Smyer and Webb & Tillman, for appellee.

WALKER, J. The appellant, who was the defendant below, sold certain land in the city of Birmingham under a power of sale in a mortgage which had been made to secure two promissory notes payable to himself. The principal and interest due on the notes at the date of the sale amounted to $29,013.31. The mortgaged property was sold for the sum of $32,000. Out of this sum the defendant retained the amount of the principal and accrued interest on the notes, the amounts of the advertising and auction fees, and also the sum of $2,901.33 as attorney's fees. The claim of the plaintiff is based upon his alleged right to the sum retained by the defendant as attorney's fees. The uncontroverted evidence shows that, before the advertisement and sale by the defendant under the power in the mortgage, the mortgagors had sold the property covered by the mortgage, and all their interest therein, to the plaintiff, and had executed a deed to him. The plaintiff, as the grantee of the mortgagors, and as the owner of the equity of redemption in the mortgaged property, is entitled to recover, in an action for money had and received, the surplus of the proceeds of sale remaining in the hands of the mortgagee, after deducting the amounts which, by the terms of the power of sale, were authorized to be applied to the payment of the secured debt and interest thereon, and of such expenses and charges incident to the execution of the power as are provided for therein. Webster v. Singley, 53 Ala. 208; Cook v. Basley, 123 Mass. 396; Buttrick v. Wentworth, 6 Allen, 79; 2 Jones, Mortg. § 1940. The question, then, is as to the right of the defendant to the sum retained by him as attorney's fees.

There is one provision in the mortgage itself for the payment of attorney's fees, and another and different provision on the same subject in the notes which were secured by the mortgage. The mortgage confers upon the mortgagee a power to sell the property for cash, and to devote the proceeds of the sale "to the paying, first, the expenses of advertising and selling and all attorney's or solicitor's fees." This is the extent of the provision in the mortgage on the subject. A clause in the following words is found in each of the notes: "It is further agreed that the undersigned shall pay all costs for collecting the above, not less than ten per cent., on failure to pay at maturity." The two provisions are separate and distinct, without any reference in the one to the other. There is an independent field of operation for each of them. A creditor whose demand is evidenced by the debtor's personal obligation, which is secured by a mortgage upon land, has the choice of foreclosing the mortgage upon the breach of the condition thereof, or of proceeding against the debtor without regard to the mortgage security. If either of the two resources may be exhausted without satisfying the demand, resort may be had to the other. Until the demand is satisfied, the creditor may seek at the same time, but by separate and independent proceedings, both the enforcement of the personal liability of the debtor, and the foreclosure of the mortgage security. The power of sale in the mortgage affords a means of enforcing the security alone. In making a sale under the power, the creditor avails himself of a special provision for subjecting to the satisfaction of his demand only the property covered by the mortgage. The exercise of the power may involve the expense of attorney's or solicitor's fees. In the present case the payment of such fees out of the proceeds of the sale is authorized by the terms of the power itself. This provision covers only such fees as are incident to the exercise of the power, and does not cover expenses incurred for fees for the prosecution of an action at law on the notes, or of a bill in chancery for the foreclosure of the mortgage. Bedell v. Security Co., 91 Ala. 325, 8 South. Rep. 494; Lehman, Durr & Co. v. Comer, 89 Ala. 579, 8 South. Rep. 241; Bynum v. Frederick, 81 Ala. 489, 8 South. Rep. 198. There is nothing, either in the mortgage or in the notes, to show that it was the intention of the parties that the provisions in the notes on the subject of attorney's fees should apply in the case of a sale under the power; and as the provision in the mortgage itself fully covers that contingency, and there are other and different contingencies in which the provisions in the notes as to the attorney's fees would be applicable, our conclusion is that those provisions do not cover the case of a sale under the power. The effect of the provision in the mortgage was to authorize the mortgagee to pay, out of the proceeds of the sale, a reasonable compensation for the services of an attorney or solicitor rendered in and about the sale made under the power. The plaintiff conceded that the defendant was entitled to retain the amount of such reasonable compensation. The evidence showed, without conflict, that $700 was a reasonable fee, and the defendant was allowed a credit for this amount. The court properly rendered judgment for the balance of the sum which had been retained by the defendant as attorney's fees. It seems that the result would have been the same if the provisions in the notes could be regarded as applying to a sale under the power contained in the mortgage. In reference to the same provision in a note, this court has said: "Stipulations to pay a given per cent. for the services of attorneys are held to import a liability for reasonable compensation for legal services rendered in that behalf, not in excess of the amount limited. We do not think that the stipulation here is for more than this." Montgomery v. Crossthwait, 90 Ala. 553-575, 8 South. Rep. 498. Similar provisions have been given a like effect in other cases. Munter v. Linn, 61 Ala. 492; Camp v. Randle, 81 Ala. 240, 2 South. Rep. 287. Contracts for the payment of attorney's fees are recognized as legitimate when their operation is to provide for the reimbursement of the creditor who, in consequence of the debtor's default, has been put to the expense of employing an attorney to render services in the enforcement of his demand. Such stipulations must become convenient cloaks for usury whenever they are allowed to serve other purposes than the indemnity of the creditor for the expenses so incurred; and when, under the guise of a fee which the creditor has neither paid nor become liable to pay, he may really secure to himself compensation beyond legal interest for the withholding of the amount due to him. The defendant in this case is a lawyer, and rendered the legal services incident to the sale, except that his partner prepared the advertisement notice. The defendant retained the 10 per cent. himself, and it is not shown that any other attorney claims or is entitled to any part of it. Affirmed.

THORNTON et al. v. TYSON et al.

DECREE OF DISTRIBUTION—PERSONAL JUDGMENT AGAINST ADMINISTRATOR — JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT.

1. In a suit by a part of the distributees and heirs at law of an intestate against his administrator, the court has power, after determining the fund due from the administrator, to decree the separate sums due from such fund to the several distributees of the estate, though many of such distributees were not named as complainants in the bill.

2. Every such individual decree is a personal judgment against the administrator in the suit, irrespective of whether or not the person in whose favor it is rendered was named as a party complainant.

3. Whether or not the amount involved in such case was sufficient to give jurisdiction to the United States circuit court should be determined by the amount of the fund in the hands of the administrator for distribution, and not by the separate sums decreed to the several distributees.

Appeal from chancery court, Jefferson county; THOMAS COBBS, Chancellor.

Bill by Martha L. Agee and Elizabeth Tyson against R. J. Thornton and others to set aside certain conveyances made by defendants, and to have the property so sought to be conveyed sold, and its proceeds distributed among plaintiffs, and such others of the distributees of the estate of John Shackelford, deceased, as might join in the bill. Plaintiffs filed an amended bill, to which defendants demurred. Demurrer overruled. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

It was alleged in the amended bill that Martha L. Agee and others, who were citizens of the states of California and Arkansas, filed a bill in the circuit court of the United States, as distributees and heirs at law of John Shackelford, against R. H. Abercrombie, a citizen of Alabama, as administrator de bonis non, and R. J. Thornton, a citizen of the state of Alabama, as surety on the administration bond, to compel a settlement and distribution of the estate of said John Shackelford, deceased. The process was duly issued, and the defendant appeared, and, after reference to the register, there was a final decree that there was due from the defendants a sum over $17,000, and from this fund there was decreed separate sums in favor of the several distributees of the estate, whose names were ascertained by the register, and set forth in the decree, which was made an exhibit to the bill in the present case. The bill in this case was filed by Martha L. Agee and Elizabeth Tyson, who sue on behalf of themselves and such others of the distributees of the estate of John Shackelford as should come in and make themselves parties to the said suit. The defendant demurred to the bill as amended, on the grounds that the decree as set out as an exhibit to the bill was rendered in favor of the parties complainant who were not parties to the suit in the federal court, that because of the amount of the decree as alleged in the bill the federal court had no jurisdiction as to these claims, and because all the complainants had not shown themselves to be judgment creditors.

Hewitt, Walker & Porter, Smith & Lowe, and M. J. Gregg, for appellants. A. T. London and Tompkins & Troy, for appellees.

STONE, C. J. It has been long and well settled that a part, less than the whole, of the beneficiaries in a trust fund, may maintain a bill to bring the trustee to a settlement. And the same rule prevails when creditors have the right to proceed in equity to subject to their demands effects of their debtor held by an equitable title, or fraudulently attempted to be placed beyond the reach of his debts. In such cases it is not necessary that all the beneficiaries or creditors shall be made complainants. A part may proceed to coerce a settlement of the trust, or the utilization of the fund or effects in the liquidation of his or their demands; and in the one case must, while in the other he or they may, so frame the bill and proceedings as that the entire litigation and the entire administration may be had and accomplished in one suit. This, because in the settlement of a trust, in which there are many beneficiaries, the courts will not, as a rule, administer partial relief, but will take the entire account and distribute the entire fund. For this purpose the suit, in legal effect, is instituted. It results that, in many cases, decrees for their respective distributive shares are rendered in favor of many persons who are not named as complainants in the bill. And the same thing frequently occurs in what are known as "creditors' bills." Brown v. Bates, 10 Ala. 432; 3 Brick. Dig. p. 340, § 136; Bank v. St. John, 25 Ala. 566; Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 97, 99, 100, 104, 105; Lehman v. Meyer, 67 Ala. 396; Payne v. Hook, 7 Wall. 425.

When a suit is instituted, and rightly instituted, in either of the categories stated above, there can be no question that any decree rendered within the purview of the bill, although in favor of a person not named as a party complainant, is a binding personal judgment in the particular case. And we do not hesitate to hold that in the suit in the circuit court of the United States every individual decree rendered, irrespective of its amount, and irrespective of the fact that the person in whose favor it was rendered was or was not a party complainant in that suit, has all the elements of a personal judgment against the defendants in that cause. Johnson v. Waters, 111 U. S. 640, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 619. In the said suit of Agee et al. v. Abercrombie, Adm'r, et al., in the United States circuit court, the sum ascertained to be in the hands of the administrator de bonis non for distribution was in excess of $17,000. That was the amount in controversy in that suit, and not the separate sums decreed to the several distributees. That litigation was a single suit, not a multiplicity of suits between the several next of kin and the administrator de bonis non. Handley v. Stutz, 137 U. S. 366, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 117.

Affirmed.

HOWELL v. BOWMAN et al.

ACTION TO SET ASIDE TRUST-DEED — EVIDENCE — BURDEN OF PROOF — EXAMINATION OF WITNESS — INTENT OF GRANTEE.

1. In an action in which a deed of trust is attacked by a creditor of the grantor, the deed of trust, and the note which it purports to secure, are admissible in evidence, where independent evidence of the existence of a valuable consideration to support such instruments is subsequently introduced.

2. It was competent for the grantee of the deed of trust given to secure a note held by such grantee to testify concerning other notes he had held against the grantor, without producing them, as their existence was a collateral matter.

3. It was not error to admit the testimony of the grantee that he had paid claims against the grantor at his request, and that the money so paid constituted a part of the consideration for the note and deed of trust.

4. Where a deed of trust is attacked as fraudulent against the grantor's creditors, an inquiry as to the value of the property conveyed is material on the question of the good faith of the transaction.

5. It is error to permit a witness, against the objection of the adverse party, to refresh his memory by the use of a memorandum made some time before the trial, but long after the date of the transaction to which it referred.

6. Where it does not appear from the face of the instrument that it was made in trust for the use of the grantor, or with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, the court cannot declare it invalid as to such creditors.

7. Where a deed of trust, given to secure a debt of the grantor, is attacked as fraudulent against the grantor's creditors, and the attacking creditor proves the existence of his debt at the time the deed was executed, the onus shifts to the grantee to prove that the debt which the deed purports to secure was justly due at the time of its execution; but, if the attacking creditor goes further to show that the deed was made with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud the grantor's creditors, the burden of proof, as to such intent, rests on the attacking creditor.

8. Though a provision of a deed of trust permitted the grantor to retain possession of the property, though the effect of the transaction was to hinder, delay, or defraud the grantor's creditors, and though the grantor executed the instrument with that intent, the deed could not be pronounced invalid if the grantee did not participate in the intent of the grantor, but accepted the deed for the sole purpose of securing a bona fide debt of the amount named in the instrument.

9. On an inquiry as to whether a deed of trust was given in good faith, and solely for the security of a just debt, or was vitiated by a purpose to benefit the grantor at the expense of his other creditors, it is competent to show that the grantee had notice that there were other creditors; that the deed covered substantially all of the grantor's property, and more than enough to secure the grantee's debt; that by the arrangement the grantee unreasonably postponed the collection of his debt; that the grantor was allowed to retain and use the property; and that the property so retained and used was either perishable, or of such a character as to be profitable in its use; and the deed of trust cannot be pronounced invalid unless the jury find from such facts that it was made either in trust for the use of the grantor, or with an intent, participated in by the grantee, to hinder, delay, or defraud the grantor's creditors.

Appeal from circuit court, Cherokee county; JOHN B. TALLY, Judge.

Action by James H. Howell against James W. Bowman. Judgment for plaintiff. An execution was levied on certain personal property in the possession of defendant, and a claim to the property levied on was interposed by H. W. Cardon, as trustee under a deed of trust executed by defendant to secure the payment of his promissory note to R. T. Ewing. Judgment for claimant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

On November 15, 1884, previous to the claim of the present suit by the plaintiff, the defendant, James W. Bowman, executed a deed of trust to the claimant, H. W. Cardon, for the benefit of one R. T. Ewing, to whom said Bowman was indebted; the consideration named in the deed being $482. The testimony of the claimant tended to show that the consideration of said trust-deed was a past indebtedness due by the said Bowman to Ewing, and that the said indebtedness consisted of various transactions between the said Ewing and Bowman. Some of the items were notes given by said Bowman to one Mrs. Tate, the mother-in-law of Ewing, and transferred by her to Ewing. On these Tate notes a greater rate of interest than 8 per cent. was charged by Mrs. Tate, but in all the demands and debts due Ewing by said Bowman only 8 per cent. interest was charged. It was further shown for the claimant that, at the time of the execution of said trust-deed for the benefit of said Ewing, he did not know of the existence of the plaintiff's debt against said Bowman. The plaintiff objected and duly excepted to the court's allowing the claimant to introduce in evidence the trust-deed and the note made by said Bowman to said Ewing on November 15, 1884, which evidenced Bowman's indebtedness to Ewing. Upon the examination of said R. T. Ewing, he was allowed, against the plaintiff's objection and exception, to refresh his memory by reference to two memoranda,—one made shortly after the transactions which resulted in the execution of the trust-deed, and the other just a short time before the trial of the present suit, which took place in 1890. This witness further testified, against the objection and exception of the plaintiff, that there had been various transactions between him and said Bowman, and that there were other notes given by said Bowman to him, witnessing his prior indebtedness.

The court, among other things, charged the jury as follows: "The burden is first upon the plaintiff to make out his case. If the evidence satisfies you that the sheriff's deputy, having an execution issued by the justice of the peace on a judgment in favor of plaintiff against the defendant, found the property in controversy in the possession of the defendant, and he levied that execution upon such property, then, prima facie, that property would be liable to satisfy such execution. This would make out plaintiff's case. The burden would then be shifted upon the claimant to show a better claim to such property. If, upon considering the trust-deed under which claimant claims title to the property, in connection with the evidence offered with it, you find the same was given to secure a debt justly due from the defendant, then you would be authorized to find that the property, without more evidence, belongs to the claimant. Here the question of fraud in the execution of said trust-deed presents itself. The plaintiff insists that upon the whole evidence such conveyance is fraudulent and void. The burden of proving it is upon him. Upon proving a valuable consideration in the form of a just debt due from Bowman to Ewing, and the execution of the instrument to secure the same, the law presumes it was done in good faith, without further evidence, and the burden is cast upon the plaintiff to prove the fraud,—to prove a state of facts which will warrant you in drawing the conclusion that it was in bad faith, or done for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or defrauding creditors of Bowman." The plaintiff excepted to this portion of the general charge of the court, and separately excepted to the court's refusal to give each of the following charges requested by him in writing:

(1) "If the jury find, from the evidence, that, at the time of the execution of the deed of trust under which Capt. Ewing claims the property that was levied upon by the execution in favor of Howell, Howell was a creditor of Bowman, and Ewing knew it, and Ewing knew that Bowman was in failing circumstances, and took the deed of trust upon all of Bowman's visible and tangible property, stipulating in said trust-deed for a postponement of foreclosure of said trust-deed for a period of twelve months, and permitted Bowman to retain the possession of the personal property mortgaged, and Howell's execution was levied upon the property described in the officer's return on said execution, Ewing is not entitled to recover in this action." (2) "If the jury find from the evidence that the property in controversy was of a perishable nature, and it, with other property included in the deed of trust, was all the visible property that Bowman had, and he was permitted to remain in possession of the property, and use it for his own benefit, by the trustee or Capt. Ewing, and Capt. Ewing knew at the time of the execution of the deed of trust that Bowman had other creditors, who would be hindered or delayed in the collection of their debts, the trust is void as to the property levied on, and, if it was in possession of Bowman at the time of the levy of the execution, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action." (3) "That unless the jury find, from the evidence, that the notes in evidence, claimed by Ewing to have been paid off by him, were based on a valuable consideration, then they are no part of the consideration of his debt claimed by him to support the claim suit. The mere fact that he paid them off at the request of Bowman does not raise any consideration in favor of the claimant." (4) "If the jury find, from the evidence, that, at the time of the execution of the deed of trust upon which the claimant relies in this case, (to-wit, the trust-deed executed on the 15th November, 1884,) Bowman was in failing circumstances, and Ewing knew it, and knew that Bowman had other creditors, who would be hindered or delayed in the collection of their debts against Bowman, and Ewing knew that the property conveyed by said trust-deed was all, or almost the whole, of the visible and tangible property that Bowman owned, and that the property conveyed by the deed of trust was equal in value to fifty per cent. more than the debt secured by it, and that Ewing gave Bowman twelve months' time within which to pay the debt secured by the mortgage or trust-deed, then the deed of trust is void, and the claimant can't recover in this action." (5) "That if Bowman executed the deed of trust to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, then if any fact or circumstance which, if followed up by Ewing, would have led him to discover the fraudulent intent of Bowman, had come to Ewing's knowledge previous to the execution of said deed of trust, in that event Ewing would be held in law as being a party to the fraud, and the deed of trust void as to plaintiff." (6) "If the jury find, from the evidence, that Bowman executed the deed of trust for the purpose of hindering or delaying his other creditors, (if they find he had other creditors,) and Ewing knew it, or knew facts that were sufficient to excite suspicion in the mind of a reasonable man as to the good faith of Bowman in executing the deed of trust, which, if followed up, would have led to a discovery of his bad faith, then Ewing is chargeable with knowledge of the bad faith of Bowman in executing said trust-deed, and the claimant cannot recover in this action." (9) "Every man is presumed to intend the necessary consequence of his acts; and if an act necessarily delays, hinders, or defrauds creditors, then the law presumes that it is done with the intent to delay, hinder, or defraud them." (11) "If the jury, from the evidence in this cause, believe that, at the time the execution in favor of Howell was levied upon the property in controversy, the property was in possession of Bowman; that the plaintiff thereby established a prima facie case, and it then became incumbent upon the claimant to establish his right to the property, and in order to do so he must show not only the existence of a debt, but that it is a valid debt, and that the conveyance was executed in good faith to secure that debt, and for no other purpose, before the claimant is entitled to recover; and if the jury find, from the evidence, that the deed of trust was executed and accepted for the purpose of hindering or delaying other creditors of Bowman; if they find that Bowman had other creditors, or, for the purpose of tying up the property of Bowman from his other creditors, Bowman was permitted to retain the possession of the property mortgaged,—then the claimant is not entitled to recover." (14) "That unless the jury find, from the evidence, that the deed of trust introduced in this case was executed for a valuable consideration and in good faith, they must find for the plaintiff." (17) "That if the plaintiff has made out a prima facie case in this action under the charge of the court, then it devolves on the claimant to show, by proof to a reasonable certainty, that his claim suit is based on a claim for valuable consideration, and that his deed of trust was executed in good faith." (20) "The law does not permit a person in failing circumstances to mortgage all his property to pay a selected creditor, and to put off the law-day of the mortgage to a distant day, and in the mean time retain the possession for his own benefit; and a mortgage so doing, when it is shown that the grantee had notice of the insolvency of the debtor, or was put on inquiry as to the condition of the debtor, is void as to existing creditors." (22) "That the giving of the deed of trust by Bowman to H. W. Cardon for the benefit of Ewing upon all of his property was an admission on the part of Bowman of his inability to pay all of his debts, or at least renders his ability to pay doubtful; and, if Ewing took such a deed upon all of Bowman's property, Ewing was put on notice or inquiry as to Bowman's creditors." (23) "A particular intent to defraud creditors is not necessary, in order to render a conveyance fraudulent and void as against them. If the necessary consequence of the deed is to hinder and delay them, then it is fraudulent and void as to such existing creditors." (24) "The use to which a deed is applied is a circumstance or fact which the jury may look to in determining the intent with which it was made; and if the jury find, from the evidence, that Ewing and Bowman have made use of the deed of trust last executed by Bowman to Cardon for the benefit of Ewing to tie up the property of Bowman from his other creditors, then they are authorized to infer that it was executed by Bowman, and received by Ewing, for the purpose of hindering or delaying the other creditors of Bowman, if they find that Bowman had other creditors." (f) "If the jury find, from the evidence, that Ewing's debt against Bowman, that the deed of trust was executed to secure, is tainted with usury, then Ewing is not a bona fide purchaser for value of the property included in his said trust-deed, and it cannot prevail against the plaintiff in this suit, if the jury find from the evidence that plaintiff was a creditor of Bowman at the time it was executed."

Matthews & Daniel, for appellant. Reeves & Cardon, for appellees.

WALKER, J. An execution upon a judgment rendered by a justice of the peace in favor of the appellant and against J. W. Bowman was levied upon personal property which was in the possession of Bowman. A claim to the property levied on was interposed by H. W. Cardon, as trustee, under a deed of trust by which Bowman had undertaken to convey certain property, including that levied on, to secure the payment of his promissory note to R. T. Ewing. The contest was upon the claim so interposed. Exceptions were reserved to rulings of the circuit court in the admission of evidence, and in giving and refusing charges.

1. The objections to the introduction in evidence of the deed of trust to the claimant, and of the note which it purported to secure, were properly overruled. The subsequent introduction of independent evidence of the existence of a valuable consideration to support those instruments removed the principal ground of the objections. The validity of the deed of trust being assailed by the plaintiff as a creditor whose debt was in existence at the time of its execution, its recitals of a consideration were not evidence against him. The onus was on the claimant to prove the existence of the alleged debt to Ewing, and the statements in the note and in the deed of trust could not help him in this regard. Bolling v. Jones, 67 Ala. 508. The plaintiff was entitled to have the jury instructed to this effect. But the rule that the recitals of consideration are not evidence against an attacking creditor would not justify the entire exclusion of the instruments. They were admissible to prove the fact of their existence, so as to show that, as between Bowman and the claimant, there had been an effectual transfer of title to the property in question. It was necessary for the claimant to go further, and prove the additional fact, necessary to the support of his claim as against the plaintiff, that the mortgage was supported by a valuable and sufficient consideration. The instruments were admissible in connection with the evidence, afterwards adduced, tending to show such a consideration.

2. It was competent for the witness Ewing to speak of one of the former notes he had held against Bowman without producing it. The fact of the existence of such note was a collateral matter, and the rule requiring the production of the note itself did not apply. Wollner v. Lehman, 85 Ala. 274, 4 South. Rep. 643; 3 Brick. Dig. p. 439, § 486. A valid debt against a person may as well be created by paying off his debts to others, at his instance and request, as by advancing money directly to him. There was no error in permitting the witness Ewing to state that he had paid debts for Bowman, and that the money so used constituted part of the consideration for the note and deed of trust. The older deeds of trust on the land were admissible upon the question of the value of the property covered by the deed of trust to the claimant. The existence of prior incumbrances lessened the value of the property taken as security. The inquiry as to the value of the property conveyed as security was material upon the question of the good faith of the transaction.

3. One of the memoranda which the witness Ewing was permitted to use for the purpose of refreshing his recollection was made in the fall of the year preceding the trial, and long after the date of the transaction to which it referred. It is not permissible for a witness, against the objection of the adverse party, to use a memorandum to revive his memory, unless it was made at the time of the transaction concerning which he is questioned, or so recently thereafter that it may be inferred that the matter was then fresh in his mind. Calloway v. Varner, 77 Ala. 541; Jaques v. Horton, 76 Ala. 238; 7 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 111. It is plain that a contemporaneous record of a transaction as it was originally impressed upon the mind must be much more trustworthy than a memorandum made so long thereafter as to be itself but the result of an effort of the memory. The former leads the mind of the witness directly to the matter sought to be recalled, while the latter does not go beyond a former recollection, which may not have been distinct. The authenticity of a memorandum to which a witness may look for a revival of his memory should be vouched for by the fact that it was made so near to the date of the transaction to which it refers that the original impression thereof could not have grown dim in the mind of the person who made it. A witness exposes himself to the hazard of being misled when he relies on a memorandum made at a time when his memory may already have become uncertain or indistinct. The witness should not have been permitted to refer to the memorandum mentioned above.

4. The owner of personal property has the right to mortgage it to secure the payment of his debts. To protect creditors and purchasers without notice, the statutes provide for the record of such conveyances. Code 1886, §§ 1806–1814. These statutory provisions impliedly recognize the right of the mortgagor to stipulate in the instrument for his retention of possession of the mortgaged property, or to retain such possession with the consent of the mortgagee. The courts cannot pronounce a recorded mortgage of personal property void, as against unsecured creditors, merely because the mortgagor is left in possession; for the law permits that to be done, the recording being regarded as a substitute for a change of possession. Jones, Chat. Mortg. (3d Ed.) §§ 329–330; Benedict v. Renfro, 75 Ala. 121. It is plain that this power of incumbering personal property, the possession of which is retained by the owner, may be readily perverted to the unlawful purpose of securing an unauthorized benefit to the grantor, or of hindering, delaying, or defrauding his creditors. But the law sanctions the bona fide use of this form of security, even though the debtor may be embarrassed or insolvent. The legitimate scope of such an instrument, as against the grantor's creditors, is the bona fide appropriation of property to secure a debt honestly due. If any part of the purpose of the parties thereto is that it shall avail or be used for the ease or favor of the grantor, it is void as to his creditors. Reynolds v. Crook, 31 Ala. 634. Whenever such purpose, or a trust for the use of the grantor, appears upon the face of the instrument, the court, without looking further, pronounces it void as against the grantor's creditors. Thus, a mortgage of merchandise which expressly or impliedly leaves the mortgagor in possession, and free to make sales from the mortgaged property for his own benefit, in its very nature involves such a reservation of a benefit to the mortgagor as invalidates the instrument, and the court will pronounce it invalid as a conclusion of law. Benedict v. Renfro, 75 Ala. 121; Owens v. Hobbie, 82 Ala. 466, 3 South. Rep. 145. If, however, the mortgage of such property provides for the sale thereof by the mortgagor for and on account of the mortgage, and that the proceeds of such sales be applied to the mortgage debt, then such mortgage is not fraudulent on its face. Murray v. McNealy, 86 Ala. 234, 5 South. Rep. 565. A mortgage of personal property cannot be pronounced fraudulent without evidence aliunde to this effect, unless it appears from an inspection thereof that the purpose of the parties embraces the reservation of a benefit to the mortgagor, or that there was an intent to have the transaction go beyond the legitimate object of securing a debt, and to operate, in part at least, to hinder, delay, or defraud the mortgagor's other creditors. Unless such infirmity is disclosed upon the face of the instrument, the question of its validity as against the grantor's other creditors is one of fact, to be determined on the evidence as to the situation of the parties and the circumstances attending the transaction. In Wiley v. Knight, 27 Ala. 336, the facts were that a creditor, who had implied notice that the debtors were insolvent, took from them a mortgage of substantially all their property, the value of which greatly exceeded the amount of the debt to be secured. The law-day of the mortgage was postponed nearly six years; the possession, in the mean time, remaining in the mortgagors. The transaction was held to be fraudulent, because its necessary effect was to tie up more of the debtor's property than was reasonably necessary to secure the debt, and because of the unauthorized benefit reserved to the grantors. If the question as to whether there was fraud in the transaction is triable by the court, and it appears from the evidence that a creditor, knowing that there are other creditors, who may be delayed or hindered in the collection of their debts, or, having knowledge of some fact calculated to put him on inquiry, and thus charge him with notice, yet takes a mortgage whereby he ties up greatly more of the debtor's property than is reasonably sufficient to secure his debt, and in the mean time permits the debtor to remain so long in the possession and enjoyment of the property that the necessary consequence of the transaction is to favor the debtor, and to help him to baffle his other creditors, then such mortgage will be declared fraudulent in fact as against such other creditors. Reynolds v. Welch, 47 Ala. 200. The same result follows whether the unauthorized operation of the instrument is disclosed by the terms thereof or by evidence of the circumstances connected with its execution. In the present case there is nothing in the impeached deed of trust, as it is described, without being copied, in the bill of exceptions, to authorize the court to pronounce it fraudulent on its face. The question, then, as to the validity of the transaction, was one of fact to be submitted to the jury. When the instrument shows upon its face that it was made in trust for the use of the mortgagor, or with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, the court must pronounce the legal conclusion that it is invalid as to such creditors. When such infirmity is not disclosed upon an inspection of the instrument, and it is attacked as fraudulent as against the mortgagor's creditors, unless both the law and the facts are submitted for decision by the court it is for the jury to ascertain from the evidence as to the circumstances attending its execution whether, as matter of fact, it was made in trust for the use of the mortgagor, or with the intent, participated in by the mortgagee, to hinder, delay, or defraud the mortgagor's creditors.

When the attacking creditor proves the existence of his debt at the time the mortgage was executed, the onus is then cast on the mortgagee to show that the debt which the mortgage purports to secure was justly due at the time of its execution. If this proof is made, and the evidence stops here, the attack upon the mortgage is not sustained. But the assailing party may go further, and prove that the mortgage was made with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud the creditors of the mortgagor. In this inquiry as to the intent, the burden of proof is shifted upon the complaining creditor. Moog v. Farley, 79 Ala. 246; Gordon v. Tweedy, 71 Ala. 202. The charge of the court on this subject was correct. Charges 11 and 17 requested by the plaintiff were properly refused, because each of them asserts, in effect, that when the plaintiff made out a prima facie case the burden was then cast upon the claimant, not only to prove that the secured debt was justly due, but also to negative the existence of a fraudulent purpose or intent in the making of the mortgage.

The mere retention of possession by the mortgagor, or a provision in the mortgage to that effect, is not such a reservation of a benefit to him as invalidates the instrument against his existing or subsequent creditors. Such a reservation of possession until default is authorized by the law, if the debt which the instrument purports to secure was justly one, and the mortgagee was not a party to any intent to use the instrument to hinder, delay, or defraud the mortgagor's creditors. It is the existence of such actual or necessarily imputed evil intent which will justify the impeachment of the instrument as a fraud upon creditors. It is not permissible for one creditor to use his claim for the purpose of shielding the debtor's property from his other creditors. Though one of the objects of such creditor is to secure the payment of his own debt, yet, if the arrangement by which this is done involves the intent on his part to aid the debtor in holding his property against his other creditors, then such arrangement is fraudulent and void as to creditors participating therein. To be valid, the arrangement must be "without any intent to lock up the property from creditors for the use of the debtor." When the creditor taking the security knows that there are other creditors who may be delayed or hindered in the collection of their debts, or has knowledge of facts or circumstances calculated to put him on inquiry, and thus charge him with notice, the arrangement which he makes must not go beyond the permissible purpose of securing his own demand; and if, with such knowledge or notice, he participates in a purpose of the debtor to thwart his other creditors, and with such intent takes a mortgage which ties up greatly more of the debtor's property than is reasonably sufficient to secure his debt, and in the mean time permits the debtor to hold and use the property for his own benefit, so that the necessary result is to favor the debtor, and to help him to baffle his other creditors, then the transaction is fraudulent and void as against other creditors. If it is any part of the purpose of the mortgagee, in taking the mortgage under such circumstances, to secure thereby a benefit to the mortgagor which involves the hindering, delaying, or defrauding of any other creditors, the instrument cannot stand against the attack of such other creditors. Benedict v. Renfro, 75 Ala. 121; Constantine v. Twelves, 29 Ala. 607; Price v. Mazange, 31 Ala. 701; Reynolds v. Welch, 47 Ala. 200; Price v. Masterson, 35 Ala. 483; Seaman v. Nolen, 68 Ala. 463; Hayes v. Westcott, 91 Ala. 150, 8 South. Rep. 337. Though the natural effect of the transaction was to hinder, delay, or defraud the grantor's creditors, and though he executed the instrument with that purpose, yet if the grantee did not participate in such intent, but accepted the conveyance for the sole purpose of securing a bona fide debt of the amount named in the instrument, then the security could not be pronounced invalid because of its effect upon the rights of other creditors, or because of the fraudulent purpose of the grantor. Shealy v. Edwards, 75 Ala. 411.

Whether the mortgagee participated with the debtor in an intention to have the mortgage serve the purpose of putting the property included therein in such a position as to secure an unauthorized benefit to the mortgagor, or to hinder, delay, or defraud other creditors, is generally a matter of inference or deduction from the circumstances attending the transaction. Such transactions may be presented in various aspects, and it is not for the court to suggest what facts may warrant unfavorable inferences. On the inquiry as to whether the mortgage was given in good faith, and solely for the security of a just debt, or was vitiated by a purpose to benefit the mortgagor at the expense of his other creditors, it is competent to show that the preferred creditor, having notice that there were other creditors, took a mortgage covering substantially all of the debtor's property, and greatly more than enough to afford him ample security; or that by the arrangement he unreasonably postponed the collection of his demand, and in the mean time allowed the mortgagor to retain and use the property; or that the whole or a material part of the mortgaged property which was retained and used by the mortgagor was perishable, or of such a character as to be profitable in its use. It is for the jury to draw the deductions or inferences from the facts proved. The impeached instrument cannot be pronounced invalid unless they find from the evidence that it was made in trust for the use of the grantor, or with an intent, participated in by the grantee, to hinder, delay, or defraud the grantor's creditors.

It is unnecessary to review in detail the numerous charges given and refused. The propositions contained in most of them may be readily tested by the rules above stated. Defects in the several charges requested by the plaintiff will be briefly noted. Charges 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, and 20, which were refused, were faulty in failing to
